1. V. 1—4. He charges him with idle, endless talk, as Eliphaz had done, v. 2. Here he reflects, not only on Job himself, but either on all the managers of the conference, or on some present, who, possibly, took part with Job, and put in a word now and then in his favor, though it be not recorded. Bildad was weary of hearing others speak, and impatient till it came to his turn; which cannot be observed to any man's praise, for we ought to be swift to hear, and slow to speak. It is common for contenders to monopolize the reputation of wisdom, and then to insist on it as their privilege to be dictators. How unbecoming that is in others, every one can see; but few that are guilty of it can see it in themselves. Time was, when Job had the last word in all debates, ch. 29: 22. Then he was in power and prosperity; but now that he was impoverished and brought low, he could scarcely be allowed to speak at all, and every thing he said was as much vilified, as formerly it had been magnified: Wisdom, therefore, (as the world goes) is good with an inheritance; (Eccl. 8: 11.) for the poor man's wisdom is despised, and, because he is poor, his words are not heard, Eccl. 9: 16.

2. With a regardlessness of what was said to him, intimated in that, Mark, and afterwards we will speak: it is to no purpose to speak, though what is said be ever so much to the purpose, if those to whom it is spoken will not mark and observe it. It is an encouragement to those that speak of the things of God, to see the hearers attentive.

3. With a haughty contempt and disdain of his friends, and of that which they offered, v. 3. This was invidious: Job had indeed called them mockers, had represented them both as unwise and as unkind, but he did not count them beasts; his high spirit resented what Job had said, as the greatest affront. Proud men are apt to think themselves slighted more than really they are; and his hot spirit was willing to find a pretence to be hard on Job. Those that incline to be severe on others, will have it thought that they have first been so on them.

4. With outrageous passion, v. 4. Herein he seems to reflect on what Job had said, ch. 13: 14. 'It is thine own fault,' says Bildad; or he reflected on what he said, (ch. 16: 9.) where he seemed to charge it on God; or, as some think, on Eliphaz; He teareth me in his wrath. 'No,' says Bildad, 'thou alone shalt bear it.' Note,

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

If constrained to dwell with mockers and revilers, we should endeavor to withdraw our attention from them, by meditating on the blessed society in heaven, that our tempers may not be ruffled by [*] continuing in their provocation.'—Through our divine Surety, the believer shall not only be justified from his sins against God, but from all the false accusations of man.—To be so judicially blinded, that the Lord hides the heart from understanding, forms a most dreadful case, and forebodes everlasting shame and misery: but this never befalls those who humbly trust and serve Him; nor should we rashly conclude it to be the case of any, merely because they mistake in some things, which appear to us of great importance.—The Lord abhors the flattering of the prosperous, and the contemning of the afflicted: we should therefore study godly simplicity, and candid compassion.—Vain is the praise of men: they extol a person one day, and insult him the next; they idolize and then execrate, perhaps without any other cause, than a change in a man's outward circumstances. Let us then be indifferent about human applause, and 'seek the honor which cometh from God.'—As we, at this distance of time, may derive encouragement and instruction from the sufferings of Job, so may others from our lighter afflictions; and this may serve to reconcile us to them. Indeed, the upright believer will extract benefit from every event. The falls of those, who once seemed to run well, will teach him humble watchfulness and jealous fear; and stir him up to guard against hypocrisy, and protest against hypocrites; the afflictions of the godly will teach him the nature of his warfare, and warn him to prepare for the conflict: and the heaviest affliction which is laid on him, will eventually tend to strengthen his faith, increase his patience, and encourage his hope, while he is walking in the ways of God and doing his work.

NOTES.

CHAP. XVIII. V. 2—4. It must be allowed, that Job had spoken contemptuously enough concerning the discourses of his friends, declaring that 'God had hid their hearts from understanding,' and that 'he could not find one wise man among them;' for he had been too much moved by their unjust suspicions and erroneous principles. Bildad, however, seems to have been much more angry; as if Job had counted him and his friends senseless as beasts.—And because he had said, that he 'took his flesh in his teeth,' (13:13, 14.) alluding to his exquisite pain; Bildad ascribed it to his furious anger, which prompted him to do himself a mischief: and as he would not allow himself to be a wicked man, Bildad concluded that he wished to alter the fixed laws of God's righteous government, in order that he might be exempted from punishment. SCOTT.

Verses 5—21.

The remainder of this ch. is a rhetorical declamation on the miseries of the wicked. There is indeed a great deal of truth and animation in the description; but it does not contain a single proof of the doctrine maintained by Bildad, namely, that the wicked are uniformly exposed to peculiar calamity in this world; or one evidence of the wickedness of Job.—Yet if we include the state of retribution, as well as that of probation, we may deduce from this passage much useful instruction.

Anger is a sin that is its own punishment. Fretful, passionate people tear and torment themselves. He teareth his soul, so the word is; every sin wounds the soul, tears, wrongs that, (Prov. 8: 36.) unbridled passions particularly.

5. With a proud and arrogant expectation to give law even to Providence itself; 'Shall the earth be forsaken for thee? Dost thou think the world cannot stand without thee; but that, if thou art ruined, all the world is ruined and forsaken with thee?' Some make it a reproof of Job's justification of himself, falsely insinuating, that either Job was a wicked man, or we must deny a Providence, and suppose that God has forsaken the earth, and the Rock of ages is removed. It is rather a just reproof of his passionate complaints; when we quarrel with the events of Providence, we forget, that, whatever befalls us, it is according, (1.) to the eternal purpose and counsel of God. (2.) To the written Word. in the world we must have tribulation; since we sin daily, we must expect to smart for it; and, (3.) To the usual way and custom of Providence, nothing but what is common to men: and to expect that God's counsels should change, his method alter, and his word fail, to please us, is as absurd and unreasonable, as to think that the earth should be forsaken for us, and the rock removed out of its place.

V. 5—10. The rest of Bildad's discourse is entirely taken up in an elegant description of the miserable condition of a wicked man, in which there is much truth, which will be of excellent use, if duly considered. But, it is not true that all wicked people are visibly and openly made thus miserable in this world; nor, that all who are brought into great distress and trouble in this world, are therefore to be deemed and adjudged wicked men, though no other proof appears against them; therefore, though Bildad thought the application of it to Job easy, yet it was not safe nor just. In these verses,

1. The destruction of the wicked is foreseen and foretold, under the similitude of darkness, v. 5, 6.

2. The preparatives for that destruction are represented under the similitude of a beast or bird caught in a snare, or a malefactor arrested and taken into custody, in order to his punishment, v. 7—10. (1.) Satan is the robber; v. 9. as he was a murderer, so he was a robber, from the beginning. He hunts for the precious life. (2.) The wicked is himself preparing for it, *v.*7. In the transgression of an evil man there is a snare. (3.) God is preparing for it. The sinner by his sin is preparing the fuel, and then God by his wrath is preparing the fire. See here how the sinner is infatuated, embarrassed, entangled, and so secured and kept from outrunning the judgments of God, 2 Pet. 2: 9.

V. 11—21. Bildad here describes the destruction itself which wicked people are reserved for in the other world, and which, in some degree, often seizes them in this. Come, and see what a miserable condition the sinner is in, when his day comes to fall.

1. See him disheartened and weakened by continual terrors, arising from the sense of his own guilt and the dread of God's wrath, v. 11, 12. Terror shall make him afraid on every side: the terrors of his own conscience shall haunt him, so that he shall never be easy. It will make him tremble, to see himself fought against by the whole creation, to see Heaven frowning on him, hell gaping for him, and earth sick of him. He that carries his own accuser, and his own tormentors, always in his bosom, cannot but be afraid on every side.

No marvel the sinner is dispirited, and distracted with fear. He sees his ruin approaching, and feels he can neither grapple with it, nor escape it, nor bear up under it. His strength, (his wealth, power, pomp, friends, and the hardiness of his own spirit,) shall do him no more service than a famished man, pining away for hunger, would do in work or war. Note, The way of sin is a way of fear, and leads to everlasting confusion, of which the present terrors of an impure and unpacified conscience are earnests, as they were to Cain and Judas.

2. See him devoured and swallowed up by a miserable death; miserable indeed a wicked man's death is, how secure and jovial soever his life was.

(1.) See him dying, arrested by the first born of death, some disease, or stroke that has in it a more than ordinary resemblance of death itself; so great a death, as it is called, (2 Cor. 1: 10.) a messenger of death, that has in it an uncommon strength and terror. Thy soul shall be required of thee.

(2.) See him dead, and see his case then with an eye of faith. He is then brought to the king of terrors. Death is terrible to nature; our Savior Himself prayed, Father, save Me from this hour; but to the wicked it is, in a special manner, the king of terrors, [the chief of those fears, v. 11.] both as it is a period to that life in which they placed their happiness, and a passage to that life where they will find their endless misery. How happy then are the saints, and how much indebted to the Lord Jesus, by whom death is so far abolished, and the property of it altered, that this king of terrors is become a friend and servant! He is then driven from light into darkness, v. 18. from the light of this world, and his prosperous condition in it, into the darkness of the grave, the darkness of hell, into utter darkness, never to see light, (Ps. 49: 19.) not the least gleam, nor any hopes of it. He is then chased out of the world, hurried and dragged away by the messengers of death, sore against his will; chased as Adam out of paradise, for the world is his paradise. It intimates, he would fain stay here, but go he must. This is death to a wicked man.

3. See his family sunk and cut off, v. 15. The wrath and curse of God light and lie, not only upon his head and heart, but upon his house too, Zech. 5: 4. Death itself shall dwell in his tabernacle, and, having expelled him, take possession of his house; even the dwelling shall be ruined for the sake of its owner, as Sodom, to the destruction of which this seems to have reference. Some think he here upbraids Job with the burning of his sheep and servants with fire from heaven. The reason is here given why his tabernacle is thus marked for ruin, because it is none of his; i. e. it was unjustly got, and kept from the rightful owner.

His children shall perish, either with him or after him, v. 16. Thus the houses of Jeroboam, Baasha, and Ahab were cut off; none that descended from them were left alive. Sin entails a curse on posterity, and the iniquity of the fathers is often

No doubt, he meant this application for Job; as the whole description is full of evident references to his varied calamities, and his desponding complaints. (M. R.)—But how different was the event of his troubles, and the sentiments of posterity respecting him, from what Bildad supposed they would be! SCOTT.

(8, 9, 10.) Net, snare, gin, snare, trap.] Resheth, sebakah, pach, chabel, malkudoth. Here are 5 words denoting modes of taking animals; we may guess that these were nets, or nooses, thrown over the head, crocodile traps, lassos, (used for taking the ostrich, by entangling his legs,) gins, or slip-nooses for the feet, pitfalls, &c. Trammim (robbers) is rendered by Mont. sitibundos, 'the thirsty,' so the Sept. and by the Chal. 'the diggers.' The easterns have still many contrivances for taking the rhinoceros, tiger, hippopotamus, foxes, and game in general: comp. the note on ancient Egyptian hunting, 41:7. 'From the beginning of verse 7. to the end of ver. 13, there is an allusion to the various arts and methods practised in hunting. 1. Persons extend themselves in a forest, and drive the game before them, still straitening the space from a broad base to a narrow point in form of a triangle, so that the farther they go the less room have they on the right and left, the hunters lining each side, while the drovers with their dogs are coming up behind. v. 7. [Sometimes the chase is driven over a precipice.] 2. Nets, gins, and pitfalls, are laid or formed, so that many are taken before they come to the point where the two lines close. v. 8, 9, 10. [Spence says, the Polynesians surround a large tract with a circle of nets, and, contracting this circle by degrees, drive the beasts into a narrow compass, where they are slaughtered; which was also practised,' says he, 'in Italy and the E. from the remotest times. Statius alludes to it.' Good.] 3. The howling of the dogs, with the shouts of the huntsman, [rouse the chase from his lair,] fill him with dismay, and cause him to run himself beyond his strength, and out of breath, v. 11. 4. While spent with hunger and fatigue, he is entangled in the spread nets; and the huntsman either pierces him with an arrow or a spear, or cuts the sinews of his legs, so that he is easily captured and destroyed; v. 9, 12. "Strength of skin," (v. 13.) may refer to the elephant, rhinoceros, [crocodile, or hippopotamus]; taken in a pitfall, the first born of death, a sudden and overwhelming stroke, deprives him of life. See accounts of elephant hunts.' Dr. A. CLARKE.

(14.) King of terrors.] Osiris is sometimes represented on the ancient Egyptian monuments, as the king of the regions of darkness, seated on a throne, and receiving to the gloomy realms of death, those who have passed a favorable judgment: note, Ps. 62:9. or else directing the condemned to be driven away. Thus the Dis and Pluto of the 17 His [d] remembrance shall perish from the earth, and he shall have no name in the street.

18 * He shall be [e] driven from light into darkness, and [f] chased out of the world.

19 He shall [g] neither have son nor nephew among his people, [h] nor any remaining in his dwellings.

20 They that come after him shall be [i] astonied at [k] his day, as they that † went before ‡ were affrighted.

visited on the children. Herein, also, it is probable Bildad reflects on the death of Job's children and servants, as a further proof of his being a wicked man; whereas all that are written childless, are not thereby written graceless; there is a name better than that of sons and daughters.

4. See his memory buried with him, or made odious; he shall either be forgotten or spoken of with dishonor, v. 17. Thus the judgments of God follow him, after death, in this world, as an indication of the misery his soul is in after death, and an earnest of that everlasting shame and contempt to which he shall rise in the great day. The memory of the just is blessed, but the name of the wicked shall rot, Prov. 10: 7.

5. See a universal amazement at his fall, v. 20. They that see it are affrighted, so sudden is the change, so dreadful the execution, so threatening to all about him; and they that come after, and hear the report of it, are astonished at it; their ears are made to tingle, and their hearts to tremble, and they cry out, Lord, how terrible art Thou in thy judgments! A place or person, utterly ruined, is said to be made an astonishment, Deut. 28: 37. 2 Chr. 7: 21. Jer. 25: 9, 18. Horrible sins bring strange punishments.

Lastly, See all this averred as the unanimous sense of the patriarchal age, grounded on their knowledge of God, and their many observations of his providence, v. 21. See here what is the beginning, and what is the end, of the wickedness of this wicked world; ignorance of God, wilful ignorance; and the end of it, utter destruction. Such, so miserable, are the dwellings of the wicked. Vengeance will be taken of those that know not God. For, those whom He has not honor from, He will get Him honor on. Let us therefore stand in awe and not sin, for it will certainly be bitterness in the latter end.

CHAP. XIX. This ch. is Job's answer to Bildad's discourse in the foregoing ch. Though his spirit was grieved and much heated, and Bildad was very peevish, yet he gave him leave to say all he designed to say; but, when he had done, he gave him a fair answer. If the remonstrance Job here makes of his grievances may sometimes justify our complaints, yet his cheerful views of the future state, at the same time, may shame us Christians, and silence our complaints, or, at least, balance them.

V. 1—7. 1. Job's friends vexed his soul, v. 2.—brake him in pieces with words, surely hard and very cruel words to break a man to pieces:—reproached him, made themselves strange to him. Those are governed by the spirit of the world, and not by any principles of true honor or love, who make themselves strange to their friends, or God's friends, when in trouble: a friend loves at all times. They magnified themselves against him, v. 5. It is mean and base thus to trample on those that are down. They pleaded against him his reproach, i. e. made use of his affliction as an argument against him to prove him a wicked man. They should have pleaded for him his integrity, and helped him to take the comfort of that under his affliction, and so have pleaded that against his reproach, as Paul; (2 Cor. 1: 12.) but, instead of that, they pleaded his reproach against his integrity, which was not only unkind, but very unjust; for where shall we find an honest man, if reproach may be admitted for a plea against him?

2. He aggravates their unkindness. They had thus abused him often, v. 3. These ten times, i. e. very often, as Gen. 31: 7. Num. 14: 22. Five times they had spoken, and every speech was a double reproach. He spake as if he had kept a particular account of their reproaches, and could tell just how many they were: it is but a peevish and unfriendly thing to do so, and looks like a design of retaliation and revenge: we better befriend our own peace by forgetting injuries and unkindnesses, than by remembering them and scoring them up. They continued still to do it, and seemed resolved to persist in it; 'How long will ye do it?' v. 2, 5. Those that speak too much, seldom think they have said enough; and, when the mouth is opened in passion, the ear is shut to reason. They had reason to be ashamed of their hard-heartedness, uncharitableness, and deceitfulness; but though told again and again, yet they could not blush, v. 3.

3. He answers their harsh censures, by showing them, that what they condemned was capable of excuse, which they ought to have considered.

(1.) The errors of his judgment were excusable, v. 4. 'Be it indeed that I have erred, through ignorance or mistake,' it is nothing strange for any man, even a good man. Error cleaves to humanity; and it is folly to think ourselves infallible. 'But be it so,' said Job, 'mine error remaineth with myself,' i. e. 'I speak according to the best of my judgment, with all sincerity, and not from a spirit of contradiction.' Or, 'If I be in an error, I keep it to myself, and do not impose it on others as you do. I only prove myself and my own work by it, I meddle not with other people, either to teach them or to judge them.' Men's errors are the more excusable, if they keep them to themselves, and do not disturb others with them. Some give this sense of these words, 'If I be in an error, it is I that must smart for it; therefore you need not concern yourselves; nay, it is I that smart, and you need not add to my misery by your reproaches.'

(2.) The breakings out of his passion, though not justifiable, yet were excusable, considering the vastness of his grief, and the extremity of his misery. 'If you will go on to cavil at every complaining word I speak, yet take the cause of the complaint along with you, and weigh that, before you pass a judgment on the complaint, and turn it to my reproach: know then that God has overcome me.' v. 6. It is barbarous to persecute him whom God hath smitten, and to talk to the grief of one whom He hath wounded. He could not hope, v. 7. He complained of his pain, but got no ease; begged to know the cause of his afflictions, but could not discover it; appealed to God's tribunal for the clearing of his innocency, but could not obtain a hearing, much less a judgment, on his appeal; I cry out of wrong, but I am not heard. God, for a time, may seem to turn away his ear from his people, to be angry at their prayers, and overlook their appeals to Him, and they must be excused if, in that case, they complain bitterly. Wo unto us if God be against us!

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The eagerness and asperity, even of good men, when heated in controversy, are often very indecent. They are slow to hear, swift to speak, and swift to wrath; (Jam. 1:19—21.) and ready to give affronts, but unable to bear them: sometimes they are led even to boast, and revile, as well as to misunderstand and misinterpret each other; to overlook all the wise and pious sentiments of their opponents; and to make the worst of every apparent error, or sally of passion. We all perceive the folly of such violence in others, and many are afterwards ashamed of it in themselves; but few are able to avoid it at the time. It is therefore generally our wisdom, especially if our spirits be eager, to shun controversy: and it is always our duty to watch and pray against pride; for if we duly considered how mean, guilty, polluted, and ignorant we really are, we should not be so much offended, even if we were 'counted as stupid as beasts,' and reputed vile in the sight of all others.—In this world there is no exact external discrimination betwixt the righteous and the wicked. Yet even on earth, which is as the wicked man's heaven, he meets with continual anxiety, terror, and vexation; with pain and sickness; with bitter disappointments to his pride, avarice, or ambition; and with galling affronts and injuries: he experiences stings of conscience, and the dread of the wrath of God; and death is to him emphatically 'the king of terrors,' which threatens to tear him from all he loves, and plunge him into all he fears. SCOTT.

Greeks and Romans are kings. 'Virgil speaks of "the gates of the king of hell;" Ovid, of the "direful king of hell," the "tyrant" of "his gloomy court;" and Sophocles, of "Pluto, king of shades."' See Dr. A. Clarke. But Schultens tr. 'terrors shall invade him like a king.' So, nearly, Jerome, Rosenm. Stock, Good, Dr. A. Clarke, Parkhurst, &c. The Chal. has 'angel of death consume his sons.' ED.

22 Why do ye [p]persecute me as God, [q]and are not satisfied with my flesh?

V. 8—22. Bildad had very disingenuously perverted Job's complaints, by making them the description of the miserable condition of a wicked man; yet he repeats them here, to move their pity, and to work on their good nature, if they had any left.

I. How doleful are the accents of his complaints of God's displeasure, v. 11. It is a gross mistake, but a very common one, to think that whom God afflicts, He treats as his enemies; whereas, on the contrary, as many as He loves, He rebukes and chastens; it is the discipline of his sons.

Which way soever Job looked, backward, (v. 9.) on his present troubles, (v. 12.) or forward, (v. 8.) he thought he saw the tokens of God's displeasure against him, v. 10. He concludes, v. 10. My hope hath He removed. Hope in this life is a perishing thing, but the hope of good men, when cut off from this world, is but removed like a tree, transplanted from this nursery to the garden of the Lord. We shall have no reason to complain, if God thus remove our hopes from the sand to the rock, from things temporal to things eternal.

II. In his complaints of the unkindness of his relations, and acquaintance, also, he owns God's hand, v. 13. As it was their sin, God was not the Author of it; it is Satan that alienates men's minds from their brethren in affliction; but as it was Job's trouble, God ordered it for the completing of his trial. Every creature is that to us, which God makes it: yet this does not excuse them from the guilt of horrid ingratitude and injustice to Job; and few could have borne it so well as he.

1. His kindred and acquaintance, his neighbors, kinsfolk, and familiar friends; nay, his inward friends, the men of his secret, whom he was most intimate with, and laid in his bosom, not only forgot, but abhorred him, kept as far off him as they could, because he was poor, and could not entertain them as he used to do, and because he was sore, and a loathsome spectacle, v. 19. So uncertain is the friendship of men; but, if God be our Friend, He will not fail us in a time of need. But let none that pretend either to humanity or Christianity, ever use their friends as Job's friends used him: adversity is the proof of friendship.

2. The master of a family expects to be attended, and taken care of, by those of his family, even then when, through weakness of body or mind, he is become despicable to others: but Job's own servants slighted him: his maids did not attend him in his illness, but counted him for a stranger and an alien, v. 15. His other servants never heeded him, v. 16. though he had been a good master to them, ch. 31: 13. Though now sickly, he was not cross, and imperious, as is too common: but entreated his servants with his mouth, when he had authority to command: yet they would not be civil to him, neither kind nor just. Note, Those that are sick and in sorrow are apt to take things ill, be jealous of a slight, and lay to heart the least unkindness: when Job was in affliction, even his servants' neglect troubled him.

3. But, one would think, when all forsook him, the wife of his bosom should have been tender of him: no, because he would not curse God and die, as she persuaded him, she cared not for coming near him, nor took any notice of what he said, v. 17. Though he entreated her, by that conjugal love of which their children were the pledges, yet she regarded him not. Some read it, 'Though I lamented, or bemoaned myself, for the children,' i. e. 'for the death of the children of my own body;' an affliction in which she was equally concerned with him. Now, it appeared, the devil spared her to him, not only to be his tempter, but to be his tormentor. By what she said to him at first, Curse God and die, it appeared that she had little religion; and what can one expect, that is kind and good, from those that have not the fear of God before their eyes, and are not governed by conscience?

4. Even the little children born in his house, the children of his own servants, his servants by birth, despised him, and spake against him; (v. 18.) though he arose in civility to speak friendly to them, or with authority to check them, they let him know, that they neither feared him, nor loved him.

III. He complains of the decay of his body; he could take as little pleasure in himself as others took in him, v. 20. ch. 16: 8. He was nothing but skin and bones. Nay, his skin too was almost gone, little remained unbroken but the skin of his teeth, his gums, and perhaps his lips, all the rest was fetched off by his sore boils. See what little reason we have to indulge the body.

Lastly, On all these accounts, he recommends himself to the compassion of his friends, and justly blames their harshness with him. God may do what He pleases with me; but do you think you may do so too? v. 22. If they delighted in his calamity, let them be satisfied with his flesh, which was wasted and gone, but let them not, as if that were too little, wound his spirit, and ruin his good name. Great tenderness is owing to the afflicted, especially to those that are troubled in mind.

V. 23—29. In all the conferences between Job and his friends, we do not find any more weighty and considerable lines than these; would one have expected it? Here is much both of Christ and heaven, and he that said such things, declared plainly that he sought the better country, that is, the heavenly; as the patriarchs of that age did, Heb.

Skin of my teeth.] 'Meaning his gums: "lips about my teeth." Jerome.' Rosenm. It was formerly a custom among heathen kings, to knock out the teeth of prisoners, leaving only the gums. Those thus treated, said; "We have escaped with the gums of our teeth." When a man is angry with another, he says, "Take care; I will knock thy teeth out. Thou shalt only have thy gums left." "What," asks the person thus threatened, "am I thy slave, to have my teeth knocked out?" "See the miserable man; the sickness has left him his gums only."' Roberts. Some refer this to the enamel of the teeth, as most incorruptible. Ed.

11:14. We have here Job's creed, or confession of faith: the principles of natural religion, he had often professed; but here we find him no stranger to revealed religion. The revelation of the Promised Seed, and the promised inheritance, was then discerned only like the dawning of the day, yet Job was taught of God to believe in a living Redeemer, and to look for the resurrection of the dead, and the life of the world to come, for of these, doubtless, he must be understood to speak. For, beside that the expressions he here uses, of the Redeemer's standing at the latter day upon the earth, of his seeing God, and seeing Him for himself are wretchedly forced, if they be understood of any temporal deliverance, it is very plain he had no expectation of return to a prosperous condition in this world. He had just now said, that his way was fenced up, v. 8. and his hope removed like a tree, v. 10. Nay, and after this, he expressed his despair of any comfort in this life, ch. 23: 8, 9.—30: 23. So that we must necessarily understand him of the redemption of his soul from the power of the grave, and his reception to glory, which is spoken of, Ps. 49: 15. We have reason to think Job was just now under an extraordinary impulse of the blessed Spirit, which raised him above himself, gave him light, and utterance, even to his own surprise. And some observe, that, after this, we do not find him passionate and peevish, as before: this hope quieted his spirit, stilled the storm, and, having here cast an anchor within the veil, his mind was kept steady from this time forward.

I. Never did any thing come in more pertinently, or to better purpose, than Job's confession of faith, here. His friends reproached him as a hypocrite, and condemned him as a wicked man; but he appeals to his creed, to his faith, to his hope, and to his own conscience; which not only acquitted him from reigning sin, but comforted him with the expectation of a blessed resurrection: these are not the words of him that has a devil. He appeals to the coming of the Redeemer, even to Him to whom all judgment is committed, who, he knew, would right him. The consideration of God's day coming, will make it a very small thing with us to be judged of man's judgment. This was Job's cordial.

II. With what a solemn preface he introduces it, v. 23, 24. He breaks off his complaints abruptly, to triumph in his comforts; which he does, not only for his own satisfaction, but for the edification of others. Those now about him, he feared, would little regard what he said, and so it proved; he therefore wished it might be recorded for the generations to come. As if he had said, 'I own I have spoken many unadvised words, which I could wish might be forgotten, for they will neither do me credit, nor do others good. But I am now going to speak deliberately, and what I desire may be published to all the world, and preserved for the generations to come;' what Job here somewhat passionately wished for, God graciously granted him; his words are written, they are printed in God's book; so that wherever that book is read, there shall this be told for a memorial concerning Job; he believed, therefore he spake.

III. His confession itself; the words he would have written, v. 25—27.

1. He believes the glory of the Redeemer, and his own interest in Him; (v. 25.) I know that my Redeemer liveth; is in being, is my Life; shall stand at last, or the last, or at the latter day, on (or above) the earth; be raised up, or, be (at the latter day, i. e. in the fulness of time; the gospel-day is called the last time, because the last dispensation) on the earth: so it points at his incarnation; or, He shall be lifted up from the earth; (so it points at his crucifixion;) or, raised up out of the earth; so it is applicable to his resurrection; or, as we commonly understand it, At the end of time, He shall appear over the earth, for He shall come in the clouds, and every eye shall see Him, so close shall He come to this earth. He shall stand upon the dust, so the Word is; upon all his enemies, which shall be put as dust under his feet; and He shall triumph over them.

Observe, (1.) There is a Redeemer provided for fallen man, and Jesus Christ is that Redeemer. (2.) He is a living Redeemer, both almighty and eternal, and therefore able to save to the uttermost. Of Him it is witnessed that He liveth, Heb. 7: 8. Rev. 1: 18. We are dying, but He liveth, and hath assured us, that because He lives, we shall live also, John 14: 19. (3.) There are those that, through grace, have an interest in this Redeemer, and can, on good grounds, call Him theirs. When Job had lost all his wealth, and all his friends, yet he was not separated from Christ, nor cut off from his relation to Him. 'Still He is my Redeemer.' That next Kinsman adhered to him when all his

Verses 23—27.

The Spirit of God seems, at this time, to have powerfully operated on the mind of Job. The gloom and tempest of his soul were dispersed; and he afterwards discoursed with more serenity and resignation. At some times he had appeared ready to despair: but here he 'witnessed a good confession,' declared the soundness of his faith, and the assurance of his hope; and seemed to emerge from his temptations, in the extremity of his afflictions, even as the expiring Jesus, when the depth of his inward sufferings was over, exclaimed, 'It is finished,' and, 'Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit.' (6:8—13. 9:14—21. 10:13—22. Matt. 26:36—39. 27:50.)—The word translated 'Redeemer,' signifies a kinsman, or near relation, to whom the redemption of captives, or of alienated estates, belonged by custom, even before the giving of the law. (Lev. 25:25—28. Ruth 4:1—8.) The promised Seed of the woman, who was to assume the nature of man, and be his Redeemer, was evidently intended. Job was assured that this Redeemer of sinners, who ransoms and restores to them their forfeited inheritance, was his Redeemer; he was conscious that he embraced the promise of his coming, and expected salvation through Him. He had no doubt that He was even at that time a living Redeemer: which accords to the words of Jesus, 'Before Abraham was, I AM.'—He believed also that 'He would stand at the latter day upon the earth;' that 'in the fulness of time,' He would appear as 'the Seed of the woman, to bruise the serpent's head,' while his 'own heel would be crushed;' that after his resurrection He would stand up as the 'First-fruits of them that sleep' in the dust of the earth; and that, at the last day, He would appear as the Judge of the world, to raise the dead, to destroy this earth, and to complete the redemption of his people.—As to Job himself, he should be raised again from the dead, and behold his God and Savior. Him he should certainly behold 'for himself,' as his Portion and Felicity; not only as the Object of mental contemplation, but with his own eyes, in his own body raised from the dead, and not in another. All this he firmly believed and assuredly hoped for, though at present his reins, or vitals, were consumed within him by disease, and he despaired of recovery in this world.—Other interpretations have been given of this extraordinary testimony; but none that will bear comparison with this most obvious explanation of the original.—The old translation of two vs. is very literal, and worthy of notice: 'For I am sure that my Redeemer liveth, and he shall stand at last upon the earth: and though after my skin, worms shall destroy this body: yet shall I see God in my flesh.' The last clause indeed may either refer to the Redeemer's incarnation, or to his own future resurrection, or to both. SCOTT.

(24.) An evident allusion to the carving on stone, so ancient in Egypt. 'Some render "with a pen of iron or lead," but lead is too soft to carve with.' ROSENM. But the sculptures in Egypt show that the figures to be drawn, were first designed and sketched out with red lead, by the artist, these outlines were then painted by the sculptor, who submitted his lines to the correction of the artist, after which the sculptor cut them in the rock. See Wilkinson. May not Job allude to this? Iron was known from the earliest times in Egypt, and steel, too, says Wilkinson, and the temper of their instruments enabled them to cut the hardest rocks. Lead is generally understood of leaves or tablets of lead, which were of very ancient use. See Pliny. 'Pausanias states that, near Helicon, in Bœotia, "they showed him lead, near a fountain, on which were written the works of Hesiod, in great part destroyed by time." But understand rather melted lead, [poured into the chisellings,] by which the letters engraved in marble or other rock were rendered distinct. So Castell: "He who writes on stone first marks the stone with his style, and hollows out a cavity, then fills it, that it may last for ever."' ROSENM. ED.

(25.) Redeemer.] Goel. 'Vindex. 16:6.' See Num. 35:12, 19, 21. Deut. 19: 6, 12. &c. Rosenm. 'Redemptor.' Jerome. 'Vindicator.' Peters, Stock. 'The Everlasting.' Sept. 'Redeemer.' Good. Boothr. Clarke, &c. referring it to Christ. Warburton, Kennicott, &c. refer it only to a temporal deliverance; and commentators seem divided into classes, according to their theological views. The editor is constrained to adopt those, mainly, which give the passage a reference to the general resurrection, and the glorious appearance of the Savior and Judge of men. ED

(26.) In my flesh shall I see God. The construction of beshari (my flesh) with the prep. min, appears to militate against the opinion, that Job expressed his expectation of seeing God in human nature. He says, 'From my flesh, &c.' I. e. 'My soul, residing again in my body, shall, out of it, behold God.' And he then mentions the eyes, which are, as it were, the windows of the body, and through which the soul views objects. SCOTT.

Worms.] 'Disease.' Good. 'But the opinion of the orientals, as expressed in their ancient and modern writings, is, that worms exist in the skin and in all parts of the body, and that they principally cause its destruction. They say the life is first destroyed by them, and afterwards the body. A man very ill will exclaim, "Ah! my body is but a nest for worms." Have not medical men of late discovered some such animalcules?' ROBERTS.

Verses 28, 29.

CHAP. XX.

Zophar, with eagerness and warmth, enlarges on the certain ruin and manifold calamities of the wicked, 1—29.

THEN answered [a] Zophar the Naamathite, and said,

2 Therefore do [b] my thoughts cause me to answer, [c] and for this * I make haste.

3 I have heard [d] the check of my reproach, and [d] the spirit of my understandi g causeth me to answer.

4 Knowest [f] thou not this of old, since [g] man was placed upon earth,

5 That [h] the triumphing of the wicked is † short, and [i] the joy of the hypocrite but for a moment?

6 Though [j] his excellency mount up to the heavens, and his head reach unto the ‡ clouds;

7 Yet he shall [k] perish for ever like his own dung: they which have seen him [l] shall say, Where is he?

8 He shall [m] fly away as a dream, and shall not be found: yea, he shall be chased away, as a vision of the night.

9 The [n] eye also other kindred forsook him, and he had the comfort of it. (4.) Our interest in the Redeemer is a thing that may be known; and, where it is known, it may be triumphed in, as sufficient to balance all our griefs. Observe with what an air of assurance he speaks, as one confident; I know that my Redeemer lives. His friends had often charged him with ignorance, or vain knowledge; but he knows enough, and knows to good purpose, who knows Christ to be his Redeemer. (5.) There will be a latter day, a last day, a day when time shall be no more, Rev. 10: 6. That is a day we are concerned to think of every day. (6.) Our Redeemer will, at that day, stand on the earth, or over the earth, to summon the dead out of their graves, and determine them to an unchangeable state, for to Him all judgment is committed. He shall stand, at the last, on the dust to which this earth will be reduced by the conflagration.

2. He believes the happiness of the redeemed, and his own title to that happiness; that, at Christ's second coming, believers shall be raised up in glory, and so made perfectly blessed in the vision and fruition of God; and this he believes with application to himself.

(1.) He counts on the corrupting of his body in the grave, and speaks of it with a holy carelessness and unconcernedness, v. 26. Christ's body saw not corruption, but ours must! And Job mentions this, that the glory of the resurrection he believed and hoped for, might shine the more bright. Note, It is good for us often to think, not only of the approaching death of our bodies, but of their destruction and dissolution in the grave; yet let not that discourage our hope of their resurrection, for the same power that made man's body at first, out of common dust, can raise it out of its own dust. This body, which we now take such care about, and make such provision for, will, in a little time, be destroyed; Even my reins (says Job) shall be consumed within me; (v. 27.) the innermost part of the body, which perhaps putrifies first.

(2.) He comforts himself with the hopes of happiness on the other side death and the grave; After I shall awake, (so the marg.) though this body be destroyed, yet out of my flesh shall I see God.

[1.] Soul and body shall come together again. Job speaks of seeing God with eyes of flesh; the same body that died shall rise again, a true body, but a glorified body, fit for the employments and entertainments of that world; and therefore a spiritual body, 1 Cor. 15: 44. Let us therefore glorify God with our bodies, because there is such a glory designed for them.

[2.] Job and God shall come together again; In my flesh shall I see God, i. e. the glorified Redeemer, who is God. I shall see God in my flesh, so some read it; the Son of God clothed with a body which will be visible even to eyes of flesh. Job now complained, he could not get a sight of God, (ch. 23: 8, 9.) but hopes to see Him shortly, never more to lose the sight, and that sight the more welcome after the present darkness and distance. Note, It is the blessedness of the blessed that they shall see God, shall see Him as He is, see Him face to face, and no longer through a glass darkly. See with what pleasure holy Job enlarges on this, v. 27. 'Whom I shall see for myself,' i. e. 'see and enjoy, see to my own unspeakable comfort and satisfaction. I shall see Him as mine, as mine with an appropriating sight,' Rev. 21: 3. God Himself shall be with them, and be their God, they shall be like Him, for they shall see Him as He is, i. e. seeing for themselves, 1 John 3: 2. Mine eyes shall behold Him, and not another: 'He, and not another for Him, not a type or figure of Him, but He Himself.' Glorified saints are perfectly sure they are not imposed on. 'I, and not another for me, shall see Him. Though my flesh and body be consumed, yet I shall not need a proxy, I shall see Him with my own eyes.' This was what Job hoped for, and what he earnestly desired; which, some think, is the meaning of the last clause, My reins are spent in my bosom, i. e. 'All my desires are summed up and concluded in this; this will crown and complete them all; let me have this, and I shall have nothing more to desire; it is enough, it is all.'

IV. The application of this to his friends. His creed spake comfort to himself, but warning and terror to them that set themselves against him.

1. It was a word of caution to them, not to proceed and persist in their unkind usage, v. 28. Let this direct us, (1.) In our care for ourselves. We are all concerned to see to it, that the root of the matter be found in us. A living, quickening, commanding principle of grace in the heart: love to God and our brethren, faith in Christ, hatred of sin—these are the root of the matter, other things are but leaves in comparison with this; serious godliness is the one thing needful. (2.) In our conduct toward our brethren. We are to believe that many have the root of the matter in them, who are not in every thing of our mind, who have their follies, and weaknesses, and mistakes: and, to conclude [illegible] is at our peril if we persecute any such. We [illegible]e to him, that offends one of those little ones! God will resent and avenge it. Job and his friends differed in some notions concerning the methods of Providence, but they agreed in the root of the matter, the belief of another world, and therefore should not persecute one another for these differences.

2. It was a word of terror to them. Christ's second coming will be very dreadful to those that are found smiting their fellow servants, Matt. 24: 49. therefore, v. 29. 'Be ye afraid of the sword, the flaming sword of God's justice, lest you make yourselves obnoxious to it.' Good men need to be frightened from sin by the terrors of the Almighty, particularly from the sin of rashly judging their brethren, Matt. 7: 1. Jam. 3: 1. Those that are peevish and passionate with their brethren, censorious of them, and malicious toward them, should know, not only that their wrath, whatever it pretends, works not the righteousness of God, but, (1.) They may expect to smart for it in this world; it brings the punishments of the sword: wrath leads to such crimes as expose men to the sword of the magistrate; however, God often takes vengeance for it, and those that showed no mercy, shall find no mercy. (2.) If they repent not, that will be an earnest of worse. By these you may know there is a judgment, not only a present government, but a future judgment, in which hard speeches must be accounted for.

CHAP. XX. One would have thought, such an excellent confession of faith as Job made in the close of the foregoing ch. should have satisfied his friends, or, at least, have mollified them; but they do not seem to have taken any notice of it; therefore Zophar here takes his turn, enters the lists

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

No true believer will, in any possible case, be left entirely comfortless. (John 14:18—20.) 'There is a Friend, who loveth at all times, and a Brother, who is born for adversity.' The long-expected Redeemer once 'stood upon the earth' in human nature, as our Surety, to ransom our souls by his precious blood; we are assured, that in heaven 'He ever liveth to make intercession for us;' and at the last day He will again appear, in glory, to raise the dead and to judge the world. At that solemn period all his enemies shall weep and wail because of Him; but his people, raised up incorruptible, immortal, and glorious, shall see Him as their God and Savior, for themselves, in their own persons, and for their complete felicity; being made like Him, and admitted to be for ever with Him. Let us then give diligence, that we may be assured He is our Redeemer; and that we shall be 'numbered with his saints in glory everlasting.' SCOTT.

with Job, and attacks him with as much vehemence as before. His preface is short, but hot; his discourse long, and all on one subject, the same Bildad was large upon, (ch. 18.) the certain misery and ruin of wicked people. He asserts it in general, and proves it by many instances—That he should have a diseased body, a troubled conscience, a ruined estate, a beggared family, an infamous name, and he himself perish under the weight of divine wrath. All this is most curiously described here in lofty expressions and lively similitudes; and it often proves true in this world, and always in another, without repentance. But the great mistake was, (and common to him with the rest,) he imagined God never varied from this method, and therefore Job was, without doubt, a very bad man, though it did not appear he was, any other way than by his infelicity.

V. 1—22. The instances here given of the miserable condition of the wicked man in this world, are expressed with great fulness and fluency of language, and the same thing returned to again, and repeated in other words. Let us reduce the particulars to their proper heads; and observe,

I. What his wickedness is.

1. The lusts of the flesh, here called the sins of his youth, v. 11. for those are the sins which, at that age, people are most tempted to. Forbidden pleasures of sense are said to be sweet in his mouth, v. 12. he keeps it still within his mouth, (v. 13.) he will never part with that for spiritual and divine pleasures, for which he has no relish, nor affection. It denotes both his obstinate persisting in his sin, (he spares when he should kill and mortify it, forsakes it not, but goes on frowardly in it,) and also his re-acting of his sin, by revolving it, and remembering it with pleasure, as that adulterous woman, Ezek. 23: 19. Or, it denotes his industrious concealment of his beloved lust: being a hypocrite, to save the credit of his profession, he has secret haunts of sin; but He who knows what is in the heart, knows what is under the tongue too, and will discover it shortly.

2. The love of the world and the wealth of it. See here, (1.) How greedy he is of it, v. 15. still crying, 'Give, give.' It is that he sets his heart upon, v. 20. (2.) What pains he takes for it; it is that he labored for, v. 18. right or wrong, to be rich. [Notes, Ex. 20: 17. latter part.] We must labor, not to be rich, (Prov. 23: 4.) but to be charitable, that we may have to give, (Eph. 4: 28.) not to spend. (3.) What great things he promises himself from it, v. 17. his being disappointed of them supposes he had flattered himself with the hopes of them: he expected rivers of sensual delights.

3. Violence, and oppression, and injustice, to his poor neighbors, v. 19. This was the sin of the giants of the old world, and a sin that, as much as any other, brings God's judgments on nations and families. It is charged on this wicked man, (1.) That he has forsaken the poor, taken no care of them, showed no kindness to them, nor made any provision for them; perhaps he gave alms like the Pharisees, to gain a reputation; but, when he had served his turn with it, he left it off: those who do good, but not from a good principle, though they may abound in it, will not abide in it. (2.) That he has oppressed them, crushed them, taken all advantages against them: to enrich himself, he has made the poor poorer. (3.) That he has violently taken away their houses, which he had no right to, as Ahab Naboth's vineyard.

II. His punishment.

1. Disappointed expectations, v. 17. The world is not that to those who love, court, and admire it, which they fancy it will be. The enjoyment sinks far below the raised expectation.

2. He shall be diseased and distempered in his body; and how little comfort a man has in riches, if he has not health! what real happiness can he enjoy, when his bones are full of the sins of his youth, (v. 11.) i. e. of the effects of those sins? But can he get no ease, no relief? No, he is likely to carry his pains and diseases with him to the grave, or rather, they are likely to carry him thither, and so the sins of his youth shall lie down with him in the dust. The sin of sinners follows them to the other side death.

3. He has not that ease in his own mind that people think he has, but is continually troubled, v. 20. Let none expect to enjoy that comfortably which they have gotten unjustly. The unquietness of his mind arises, (1.) From his conscience looking back, and filling him with the fear of the wrath of God against him, for his wickedness. Even that wickedness which was sweet in the commission, when it is reviewed, fills him with horror and vexation, v. 14. Such a thing is sin; it is turned into the gall of asps, than which nothing is more bitter, the poison of asps, (v. 16.) than which nothing more fatal, and so it will be to him; so will all unlawful gains be. The fawning tongue will prove the viper's tongue. All the charming graces thought to be in sin, when conscience is awakened, will turn into so many raging furies. (2.) From his cares looking forward, v. 22. When he thinks himself most happy, and most sure of the continuance of his happiness, he shall be in straits, i. e. shall think himself so, through the anxieties and perplexities of his own mind, as that rich man who, when his ground brought forth plentifully, cried out, what shall I do? Luke 12: 17.

4. He shall be dispossessed of his estate; that shall sink and dwindle away to nothing, so that he shall not rejoice therein, v. 18. He shall not only never rejoice truly, but not long rejoice at all.

(1.) What he has unjustly swallowed, he shall be compelled to disgorge, v. 15. Or, if he do not himself refund what he has violently taken away, God shall, by his providence, force him to it, and bring it about, one way or other, that ill-gotten goods shall return to the right owners, v. 10. His children shall seek to please the poor, while his own hands shall restore them their goods with shame, v. 18. To be made to restore what was unjustly gotten, by the sanctifying grace of God, as Zaccheus was, is a great mercy; he voluntarily and cheerfully restored four-fold, and yet had a great deal left to give to the poor. But to be forced to restore, as Judas was, merely by the horrors of a despairing conscience, has none of that benefit and comfort attending it; he threw down the pieces of silver, and went and hanged himself.

(2.) He shall be stripped of all he has, and become a beggar. But though the innocent, whom he has wronged, have forgiven him, and will make no reprisals, divine justice will, and often makes the wicked to avenge the quarrel of the righteous, and squeezes and crushes one bad man by the hand of another upon him. Thus when he is plucked on all sides, he shall not save of that which he desired, v. 20. There shall none of his meat be left, v. 21. All his neighbors and relations shall look upon him to be in such bad circumstances,

CHAP. XX. V. 14. Asps.] 'The true asp of the ancients seems to be entirely unknown. CHAP. XXI.

Job entreats a patient hearing, because of his singular calamities, 1—6. He shows that wicked men sometimes so prosper as to grow bold in presumption, 7—16. Yet that they at length fall into destruction, 17—22. And that the dealings of God with them in life and death are greatly varied, as their judgment is deferred to the day of wrath, 23—34.

BUT Job answered and said,

2 [a] Hear diligently my speech, and [b] let this be your consolations.

3 Suffer me [c] that I may speak; and after that I have spoken, [d] mock on 4 As for me, [e] is my complaint to man? and [f] if it were so, why that, when he is dead, no man shall look for his goods, none of his kindred shall expect to be a penny the better for him, nor be willing to take out letters of administration for what he leaves behind him. In all this Zophar reflects on Job, who had lost all, and was reduced to the last extremity.

V 23—29. Zophar, having described the many embarrassments and vexations which commonly attend the wicked practices of oppressors and cruel men, here comes to show their utter ruin at last.

1. Their ruin will take its rise from God's wrath and vengeance, v. 23. Every word here speaks terror. It is not only the justice of God, that is engaged against them, but his wrath, the deep resentment of provocations given to Himself: it is the fury of his wrath, incensed to the highest degree; it is cast upon him with force and fierceness; rained upon him in abundance; like the fire and brimstone on Sodom, to which the psalmist also refers, Ps. 11: 6. There is no fence against this, but in Christ, who is the only Covert from the storm and tempest, Isa. 32: 2. This wrath shall be cast on him, when he is just going to glut himself with what he has gotten, and promising himself abundant satisfaction in it; as the ruin of the old world and Sodom came, when they were in the depth of their security, and the height of their sensuality, as Christ observes, Luke 17: 26, &c. Perhaps Zophar here reflects on the death of Job's children, when they were eating and drinking.

2. Their ruin will be inevitable, and there will be no possibility of escaping it, v. 24. Flight argues guilt: he will not humble himself under the judgments of God, nor seek means to make his peace with Him; all his care is, to escape the vengeance that pursues him, but in vain: if he escape the sword, yet the bow of steel shall strike him through. God has weapons of all sorts, a sword for those that think to fight it out with Him by their strength, and a bow for those that think to avoid Him by their craft. See Isa. 24: 17, 18. Jer. 48: 43, 44. He that is marked for ruin, though he may escape one judgment, will find another ready for him.

3. It will be a total, terrible, ruin. When the dart that has struck him through, comes to be drawn out of his body, O what terrors are upon him! How strong are the convulsions, how violent are the dying agonies! How terrible are the arrests of death to a wicked man!

4. Sometimes it is a ruin that comes on him insensibly, v. 26. He is wrapped up in a hidden darkness: utter darkness hid in his secret place, whither he is retreated, and where he hopes to shelter himself; he never retires into his own conscience, but he finds himself in the dark, and utterly at a loss. The fire he is consumed by is a consumption every body sees the effect of, but nobody sees the cause of; the gourd is withered, but the worm at the root is out of sight. When the fuel is very combustible, the fire needs no blowing, and that is his case; he is ripe for ruin; the proud, and they that do wickedly, shall be stubble, Mal. 4: 1. An unquenchable fire shall consume him, so some read it; and that is certainly true of hell-fire.

5. It is a ruin, not only to himself, but to his family. The curse shall reach him that is left in his tabernacle, who shall be cut off perhaps by the same grievous disease; there is an entail of wrath on the family, which will destroy both his heirs and his inheritance, v. 28. Numerous and growing families, if wicked and vile, are soon reduced, dispersed, and extirpated, by the judgments of God.

6. It is a ruin which will manifestly appear to be just and righteous, and what he has brought on himself by his own wickedness, v. 27. The God of heaven, who sees all the secret wickedness of the wicked, will, by some means or other, let all the world know, what a base man he has been, that they may own the justice of God in all that is brought on him. The earth also shall rise up against him, both to discover his wickedness, and to avenge it. Isa. 26: 21. If the God of heaven and earth be his enemy, neither heaven nor earth will show him any kindness, but all the hosts of both are, and will be, at war with him.

Lastly, Zophar concludes like an orator, v. 29. This is the portion of a wicked man from God; it is allotted him, it is designed him as his portion. He will have it at last, as a child has his portion, and he will have it for a perpetuity, it is what he must abide by: this is the heritage of his decree from God; it is the settled rule of his judgment, and fair warning is given of it. O wicked man, thou shalt surely die! Though impenitent sinners do not always fall under such temporal judgments as are here described, (therein Zophar had mistaken,) yet the wrath of God abides on them, and they are made miserable by spiritual judgments, which are much worse, their consciences being either, on the one hand, a terror to them, and then they are in continual amazement, or, on the other hand, seared and silenced, and then they are given up to a reprobate sense, and bound over to eternal ruin. Never was any doctrine better explained, or worse applied, than this by Zophar, who intended by all this to prove Job a hypocrite. Let us receive the good explication, and make a better application, for warning to ourselves, to stand in awe, and not to sin.

CHAP. XXI. V. 1—6. Here Job, in his reply to Zophar's discourse, complains less of his own miseries, than he had done in his former dis-

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

They are frequently the most forward to dispute, who are most evidently in the wrong. We are pleased with our own thoughts, as with our own children; and fancy that others will equally admire them. Thus we are led to make indecent haste to speak, lest we should lose the credit and gratification of our pertinent observations; and lest others should lose the benefit of them. In this eagerness we consider each 'check' as a reproach, and every effusion of passion is esteemed a demonstration. But others generally judge very differently: nay, we ourselves can seldom reflect afterwards on such debates, without shame and remorse. It is very difficult for men of warm passions entirely to repress this unbecoming tendency: but watchfulness and prayer will do great things, in a course of time: and we may profit by observing our own and others' errors, and by the rebukes and corrections of our Heavenly Father.—Some kinds of wickedness generally ruin men's constitutions, if they are not cut off before they entail pain and disease on their old age, which carries them down to the grave; and the pleasures and gains of sin, like drinking sweet poison, or like the lulling venom of the asp, terminate in remorse, in anguish, and in ruin. A curse from God often corrodes the oppressor's abundance: he hath no enjoyment of it, and suffers none of those connected with him to have any ease or pleasure; and very often it is torn from him in an awful and sudden manner. 'There is no peace, saith my God, for the wicked.' (Is. 48:20—22. 57:20,21.)—But what are all weapons of iron and steel; yea, what is darkness or consuming fire, compared with the eternal vengeance of the Almighty, which is the heritage appointed unto the wicked in the world to come? 19 God [f] layeth up his  iniquity [g] for his children: [h] he rewardeth courses, and comes closer to the general question betwixt him and his friends.

1. What he entreats is very fair, that they would not break in upon him, (v. 3.) as Zophar, in the midst of his discourse. He entreats they would hear (v. 2.) as persons willing to understand, and, if under a mistake, to have it rectified; and that they would mark him; (v. 5.) for we may as well not hear, as not heed what we hear.

2. They came to comfort him, (v. 2.) If you have no other comforts to administer to me, yet give me a patient hearing, and that shall pass for your consolations. Or, 'It will be a consolation to yourselves, in the reflection, to have dealt tenderly with your afflicted friend, and not harshly.' 'If you will but give me a fair hearing, mock on if you can, but I believe I shall say that which will change your note, and make you pity me, rather than mock me.' 'If my complaint were to men, my spirit would be troubled, for they would not regard me, nor rightly understand me; but my complaint is to God, who will suffer me to speak, though you will not.' 'I would be sad if God should deal as unkindly with us as our friends sometimes do.

3. There was that in his case, which was very surprising and astonishing, and therefore both needed and deserved their most serious consideration. It was not a common case, but a very extraordinary one. 'Instead of expounding my troubles, you should awfully adore the unsearchable mysteries of Providence, in afflicting one thus, of whom you know no evil; you should therefore silently wait the issue, and judge nothing before the time,' ch. 17: 8.

V. 7—16. I. All Job's three friends, in their last discourses, had been very large in describing the miserable condition of a wicked man in this world; 'It is true,' says Job, 'remarkable judgments are sometimes brought on notorious sinners, but not always; sometimes, though they are hardened in their wickedness by their prosperity, yet they are still suffered to prosper.' It is worth while to inquire into the reasons of the outward prosperity of wicked people. It is because the measure of their iniquities is not full: but the chief reason is, because God will make it to appear there is another world, which is the world of retribution, and not this.

1. Some observe, that v. 11. instances none of that care taken of their children, which Abraham took of his, to teach them the way of the Lord, Gen. 18: 19. Their children do not pray, or say their catechism, but dance, and sing, and rejoice at the sound of the organ. Sensual pleasures are all the delights of carnal people; and as men are themselves, so they breed their children.

2. They spend their days, all their days, in wealth, and never know want; (v. 13.) in mirth, and never know sadness; and at last, without any previous alarms to frighten them, without any anguish, or agony, in a moment they go down to the grave, and there are no bands in their death. If there were not another life after this, it were most desirable to die by the quickest, shortest strokes of death.

II. He shows how they abuse their prosperity, and are confirmed and hardened by it in their impiety, v. 14, 15. He mentions this, either, 1. To increase the difficulty. It is strange any wicked people should prosper thus, but especially that those should prosper, who are arrived at such a pitch of wickedness as openly to bid defiance to God Himself, and tell Him to his face they care not for Him; nay, use their very prosperity as a weapon to fight with Him, and yet are not disarmed. Or, 2. To lessen the difficulty, God suffers them to prosper; but let us not wonder at it, for the prosperity of fools destroys them, by hardening them in sin, Prov. 1: 32. Ps. 73: 7—9.

(1.) See how light these prospering sinners make of God and religion, as if, because they have so much of this world, they had no need to look after another.

(2.) See how ill affected they are to God and religion; they abandon them, and cast off the thoughts of them. The world is the portion they have chosen. Justly will God say to them, Depart, (Matt. 25: 41.) who have bid Him depart. They dread the knowledge of God, and of his will, and of their duty to Him. Observe how slightly they speak of God; What is the Almighty? As if He were a mere name, a mere cipher, or one they have nothing to do with, and that has nothing to do with them. How hardly they speak of religion! They call it a service, and mean a hard service. Observe also how highly they speak of themselves; 'That we should serve Him: we, who are rich and mighty in power, shall we be subject and accountable to Him? No, we are lords,' Jer. 2: 31. All the world are for what they can get, therefore wisdom's merchandise is neglected, because they think there is nothing to be got by it; It is vain to serve God, Mal. 3: 13, 14. Praying will not pay debts, nor portion children; nay, perhaps serious godliness may hinder a man's preferment, and expose him to losses; and what then? But is nothing to be called gain but the wealth and honor of this world? If we obtain the favor of God, and spiritual and eternal blessings, we have no reason to complain of losing by our religion. But if we have not profit by prayer, it is our own fault, (Isa. 58: 3, 4.) it is because we ask amiss, Jam. 4: 3. Religion itself is not a vain thing; if it be so to us, we may thank ourselves for resting in the outside of it, Jam. 1: 26.

III. He shows their folly herein, and utterly disclaims all concurrence with them, v. 19. They did not get it without God, therefore they are very ungrateful to slight Him thus. Nor can they keep it without God, therefore they are very unwise to lose their interest in Him, and bid Him to depart from them. Some give this sense of it; 'Their good is in their barns and bags, hoarded up there; not in their hand, to do good to others with it; and then, what good does it do them?' 'Therefore,' says Job, 'the counsel of the wicked is far

What profit, &c.] Perhaps this may allude to the contrast between the patriarchal worship, and surrounding idolatry. 'The heathen,' says Roberts, 'ask us sometimes, "When we go to our own temples, we have often fruit given to us; but when we come to yours, nothing is offered: give us something, and we will pray to Him." Martin states, doubtless in allusion to a heathen custom, that, when Rammohun Roy's monotheistic Hindoo chapel was dedicated to the pure primitive worship, 'about 500 Hindoos were present, and among them many Brahmins, who, after the prayers and singing of hymns had been concluded, received gifts in money to a considerable extent.' Hist. of British Colonies. Ed.

1. Opposes this to what his friends had maintained concerning their certain ruin in this life. Perhaps there are as many instances of notorious sinners ending their days in pomp, as ending them in misery; which observation is sufficient to invalidate their arguments against Job, and to show that no certain judgment can be made of men's character by their outward condition.

2. He reconciles this to the holiness and justice of God; though wicked people prosper thus all their days, yet we are not therefore to think, that God will let their wickedness always go unpunished.

3. He resolves this difference, which Providence makes between one wicked man and another, into the wisdom and sovereignty of God, v. 22. Dare we arraign God's proceedings, or blame his conduct? PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

It is not easy to obtain an attentive hearing from eager disputants. We might well yield to inward disquietude, if we had none to complain to in our distresses but man; or if the Lord were as severe against us, as our brethren sometimes are. But the true believer may speak to God at all times; and He will compassionately regard those complaints, and bear with those infirmities, which men disregard or condemn.—The afflictions of the faithful, compared with the prosperity of the wicked, have caused astonishment and discouragement to the servants of God in all ages. But we should adore the depths of those judgments which we cannot fathom: and the clear light of the Gospel, with the discoveries of the eternal world, will explain the difficulty, and show the wise designs of God in all these dispensations. Yet, under severe trials and temptations, the most established believer finds it as hard to apply his principles for immediate encouragement, as the most skilful mariner in a furious storm does to manage the vessel by the rules of navigation.—Prosperity adds strength to men's pride, and fuel to their lusts; and thus they grow hardened in presumptuous wickedness.—Alas, what numbers do we see in this land, where the light of the Gospel clearly shines, whose actions say unto God, 'Depart from us!' Their open and constant violation of his law, and their contempt of his gospel; their profanation of his day, and desertion of his ordinances; their families left without the least appearance of religion; their incessant course of riot or dissipation; their inordinate pursuit of wealth or power; their discourse, devoid of all reverence to the name, truths, or precepts of God, and full of levity and folly, if not of ribaldry and profaneness:—these things seem to 'say unto God, Depart from us; we desire not the knowledge of thy ways.' Such persons do not desire to think, hear, speak, or read about Him: they treat religion, as if it were beneath their rank, spirit, or genius: they do not deem the Almighty on any account entitled to their obedience or gratitude; and they suppose his service to be a mere drudgery, which can yield neither pleasure nor profit, and in neglecting which there can be no danger! Yet 'these prosper in the world, and have riches in possession.' And, though the Lord is sometimes 'known by the judgments that He executes;' yet they and their families are seldom visited by remarkable calamities. But as they have said to God, 'Depart from us, we desire not the knowledge of thy ways:' they cannot reasonably expect any other event, than that He, the Fountain of felicity, and Judge of the world, should at last say to them, 'Depart from Me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil, and his angels.' (Matt. 25:41—46.)

The wicked man may suffer many dreadful calamities on earth, and must have many peculiar terrors and vexations; he wants that peace of conscience, that confidence in God, and that hope of heaven, which the believer enjoys: prosperity increases his guilt, and strengthens his distempered passions: he has all his good things here, and nothing to look for hereafter, but unmixed and eternal misery, and may expect to be banished from the presence of God hereafter; while the righteous has all his evil here, and unmingled and eternal good in another world. SCOTT.

these and similar judgments: yet, in fact, instances in which they were clearly thus distinguished from others, but seldom occurred. And if they prospered till death, whether they lived till old age, or died in the vigor of life, the subsequent condition of their families would not affect them, either with pleasure or pain. Indeed, who shall presume to teach the Judge of the most exalted creatures, in what way He should administer his government? Or who shall presume to explain, or decide on, any of his dispensations, as if inconsistent with his justice or wisdom? SCOTT.

Verses 23—26.

The words translated, 'His breasts are full of milk,' (24) are differently interpreted. The word rendered breasts is not elsewhere used in the Hebrew; and some think it means milk-pails. But others, supposing it to coincide with the subsequent clause, thus translate the passage, 'His ribs, (sides, or intestines, viscera,) are full of fat.' Probably this is the true sense of the words. ID.

(24.) 'Of a man who is very rich, it is common to say, "His chattues (vessels) are full of milk." But of a good king or governor it is said, "He nourishes like the king, whose breasts are full of milk." "Yes, he so rules, that the breasts of the goddess of the earth are full of milk." ' Roberts. The act of nursing is often represented on the monuments of Egypt, as expressive of the maternity both of a queen and a goddess. See also coins with Diana's image, and Isa. 60:16. ED.

Verses 27—30.

Here Job brings the matter to an issue. (22:5—14. 24:1—20. 29: 12—17. 31:35—40. Rom. 2:4—6. 2 Pet. 2:4—9.) SCOTT.

(29.) Those that go by the way.] 'Transeuntes viam. Travellers; having, from wider observation, more knowledge and experience. The interrogation is here used for the imperative mood, as Ruth 2:8, &c. Tokens.] Their (that is, the travellers') evident examples and documents (observed by them) all over the earth, confirm the truth asserted.' ROSENM.

Verses 31—33.

None, except two, have been, or ever shall be, exempted from this common doom: so that it is evident, there is no exact discrimination between the righteous and the wicked, in the outward dispensations of Providence. (Ec. 4:1—3. 5:8. Hab. 1:2—4.) SCOTT. Remain, &c.] 'Think on providing his tomb.' ROSENM.

Verse 34.

Job concluded with inquiring, why his friends comforted him in vain, with the hopes of returning worldly prosperity, in case he repented and sought unto the Lord. For there was no truth in their system; nay, there was falsehood interwoven with all their answers, which rendered them inconclusive, and inapplicable to the subject. SCOTT.

CHAP. XXII.

Eliphaz shows that man's goodness cannot profit God, 1—4. He accuses Job of various crimes, which he supposes had brought on him his calamities, 5—14. He contrasts the doom of sinners visited by divine judgments, with the security of the righteous, 15—20. He exhorts Job to repent, and encourages him to hope for mercy, 21—30.

THEN Eliphaz the Temanite answered and said,

2 Can [a] a man be profitable unto God, * as [b] he that is wise may be profitable unto himself?

3 Is it [c] any pleasure to the Almighty, that thou art righteous? or is it gain to him, that [d] thou makest thy ways perfect?

which seemed to contradict one another, He can make, not only mutually to agree, but jointly to serve his own purposes.

The little difference there is between one wicked man's dying impenitent in peace and pomp, and another wicked man's dying so in pain and misery, when both will, at last, meet in hell, he illustrates by the little difference there is between one man's dying suddenly and another's dying slowly, when they will both meet shortly in the grave. So vast is the disproportion between time and eternity, that, if hell be the lot of every sinner at last, it makes little difference, if one goes singing thither, and another sighing.

V. 27—34. See, in these verses,

I. Job opposes the opinion of his friends, which he saw they still adhered to. 'I know your thoughts,' says Job, v. 27. 'I know you will not agree with me; for your judgments are tinctured and biassed by your piques and prejudices against me, and the devices you wrongfully imagine against my comfort and honor: and how can such men be convinced?'

Job's friends were ready to say, in answer to his discourse concerning the prosperity of the wicked, 'Where is the house of the prince? (v. 28.) Where is Job's house, or the house of his eldest son, in which his children were feasting: inquire into the circumstances of Job's house and family, and then ask, Where are the dwelling-places of the wicked? and compare them together, and you will soon see, that Job's house is in the same predicament with the houses of tyrants and oppressors, and may therefore conclude that doubtless he was one.'

II. He lays down his own judgment to the contrary, and, for proof of it, appeals to the sentiments and observations of all mankind. So confident is he that he is in the right, that he is willing to refer the cause to the next man that comes by, v. 29. 'Have ye not asked them that go by the way—any indifferent person? I say not, as Eliphaz, (ch. 5: 1.) To which of the saints—I ask, To which of the children of men, will you turn? Turn to which you will, you will find them all of my mind; that the punishment of sinners is designed more for the other world than for this, according to the prophecy of Enoch, the seventh from Adam, Jude 14. Do you not know the tokens of this truth, which all that have made any observations on the providences of God concerning mankind in this world, can furnish you with?' Ps. 92: 7. The sinner is here supposed,

1. To live in great power, so as to be not only the terror of the mighty in the land of the living, (Ez. 32: 27.) but the terror of the wise and good too, whom he keeps in such awe, that none dares declare his way to his face, v. 31.

2. To die, and be buried in great pomp and magnificence, v. 32, 33. He shall have a stately monument erected over him, he shall remain in the tomb. Perhaps it is meant of the embalming of his body, to preserve it, which was a piece of honor anciently done by the Egyptians to their great men. [Notes, 3: 14.—11: 14.] He shall watch in the tomb, so the word is, shall abide solitary and quiet there, as a watchman in his tower. The clods of the valley shall be sweet to him; there shall be as much done as can be with rich odors, to take off the noisomeness of the grave, as by lamps to set aside the darkness of it, which perhaps was referred to in the foregoing phrase of watching in the tomb: but it is all a jest; what is the light, or what the perfume, to a man that is dead? It shall be alleged, for the lessening of the disgrace of death, that it is the common lot; he has only yielded to fate, v. 33. as there is a plain track before, so there is a long train behind.

Lastly, From all this, Job infers the impertinency of their discourses, v. 34. Their foundation is rotten, and they went on a wrong hypothesis. Their building was therefore weak and tottering. 'You comfort me in vain.' Where there is not truth, there is little comfort to be expected.

CHAP. XXII. V. 1—4. Eliphaz here leads on a third attack upon Job, in which Bildad followed him, but Zophar drew back, and quitted the field. It was one of the unhappinesses of Job, as it is of many an honest man, to be misunderstood by his friends. He had spoken of the prosperity of wicked men in this world, as a mystery of Providence, but they took it for a reflection on Providence, as countenancing their wickedness; and reproached him accordingly. Eliphaz here insinuates that, because Job complained so much of his afflictions, he thought God was unjust in afflicting him; a strained inuendo, Job was far from thinking so. What Eliphaz says here, is therefore unjustly applied to Job, but in itself it is very true and good:

1. That when God does us good, it is not because He is indebted to us; if He were, there might be some color to say, when He afflicts us, 'He does not deal fairly with us:' but whoever pretends that he has by any meritorious action made God his debtor, let him prove this debt, and he shall be sure not to lose it, Rom. 11: 35. But Eliphaz here shows, that the righteousness and perfection of the best man in the world are no real benefit or advantage to God, and therefore cannot be thought to merit any thing from Him.

(1.) Man's piety is no profit to God, no gain, v 1, 2. If any thing could be so, it would be our piety. If that will not merit, surely nothing else will; as wit, learning, and worldly policy. Note, Our wisdom and piety are that by which we ourselves are, and are likely to be, great gainers. Eccl. 10: 10. 1 Tim. 4: 8. Prov. 9: 12. But can a man be thus profitable to God? No, for such is the perfection of God, that He cannot receive any benefit or advantage by men; and such the weakness and imperfection of man, that he cannot offer any benefit or advantage to God. We are undone, for ever undone, without God; but He is happy, for ever happy, without us. Is it any gain to Him, any real addition to his glory or wealth, if we make our way perfect? Suppose it were absolutely perfect, yet what is God the better? Much less when it is so far short of being perfect.

(2.) It is no pleasure to Him. God has indeed expressed Himself in his Word well pleased with the righteous; his countenance beholds them, and his delight is in them and their prayers; but all that adds nothing to the infinite satisfaction and complacency which the Eternal Mind has in itself. God can enjoy Himself without us, though we could have but little enjoyment of ourselves without our friends. This magnifies his condescension, in that, though our services be no real profit or pleasure to Him, yet He invites, encourages, and accepts, them.

2. That, when God restrains or rebukes us, it is not because He is in danger from us, or jealous of us, v. 4. 'Will He reprove thee for fear of thee?'

NOTES.

CHAP. XXII. V. 1—4. Eliphaz still supposed Job to maintain that God favored the wicked; and therefore he addressed him the third time. He intended, in this introduction, to show that God, in all his appointments, acted out of pure love to justice, and was not influenced by interested or selfish affections. The Lord indeed approves and delights in holiness, because it is right in itself, and conducive to personal and social happiness; but not because He is any gainer by it. His justice therefore must be invariable and impartial; his rewards are the result of his love of good; and his punishments spring entirely from hatred of evil. (Ps. 16:2, 3. Luke 17:7—10.)—These are great truths, and were well understood by the disputants, though here rather incautiously stated: but Eliphaz and his associates, confounding this state of trial with that of future retribution, misapplied them to the case of Job; as if the justice of God could not be vindicated, unless he were proved to be a wicked man! SCOTT.

(2, 3.) No man considers that he merits any reward of God by the act of taking food, clothing himself, or obeying any natural law of his being; why then should he arrogate merit to himself for obeying any moral law of God, when the consequences will also be his own good simply? Each of these classes of effects on his own happiness may be called rewards, but it is simply in accommodation to man's way of talking of and with his fellows. ED.

Verses 5—14.

All have committed innumerable sins, in which there is an inconceivable degree of criminality: but Eliphaz did not mean such transgressions as were common to Job with other believers, or even with men in general; but flagrant iniquities and impieties, which he had cloaked with the mask of hypocrisy.—Some think, he meant that Job was blinded by his selfish prejudices, or judicially involved in mental darkness; or he would readily have perceived the reason of his calamities. SCOTT.

17 Which said unto God, Depart from us: and what can the Almighty do for them?

18 Yet he filled their houses with good things: but the counsel of the wicked is far from me.

19 The righteous see it, and are glad:

Satan indeed suggested to our first parents, that God forbade them the tree of knowledge, for fear of them, lest they should be as gods, and so become his rivals; but it was a base insinuation. God rebukes the good because He loves them, but He never rebukes the great because He fears them. He does not enter into judgment with men, i. e. pick a quarrel with them, and seek occasion against them, through fear they should eclipse his honor, or endanger his interest. Magistrates punish offenders for fear of them; Pharaoh oppressed Israel because he feared them; it was for fear that Herod slew the children of Bethlehem; that the Jews persecuted Christ and his apostles. But God does not, as they did, pervert justice for fear of any. See ch. 36: 5—8.

V. 5—14. Eliphaz and his companions had condemned Job, in general; but none of them had descended to particulars, until Eliphaz did it here, where he positively and expressly charges him with many high crimes, which if he had really been guilty of, they might well have justified themselves in their harsh censures of him. 'Come,' says Eliphaz, 'we have been too tender of Job; it is time to deal plainly with him; we have condemned him by parables, but that does not answer; he is not prevailed with to condemn himself; we must therefore plainly tell him, 'Thou art the man, the tyrant, the oppressor, the atheist, we have been speaking of all this while. Is not thy wickedness great? Certainly it is, else thy troubles would not be so great. I appeal to thy own conscience; are not thine iniquities infinite, both in number and heinousness?' By infinite, he means his sins were more than could be counted, and more heinous than could be conceived. Sin, being committed against Infinite Majesty, has in it [infinite effects, as it were, and] a kind of infinite malignity. But when Eliphaz charges Job thus high, and ventures to descend to particulars too, laying to his charge that which he knew not, we may take occasion hence, 1. To be angry at those who unjustly censure and condemn their brethren. For aught I know, Eliphaz was here guilty of as great a sin, as the Sabeans and Chaldean robbers; for a man's good name is more precious than his wealth. It is against all the laws of justice, charity, and friendship, either to raise, or receive, calumnies, jealousies, and evil surmises, concerning others; and it is the more base and disingenuous, if we thus vex those that are in distress, and add to their affliction. Eliphaz could produce no instances of Job's guilt in any of the particulars that follow here, but seems resolved to calumniate boldly, and throw all the reproach he could on Job, not doubting but that some would cleave to him. 2. To pity those who are thus censured and condemned. Innocency itself will be no security against a false and foul tongue. Job, whom God Himself praised as the best man in the world, is here represented by one of his friends, and he a wise and good man too, as one of the greatest villains in nature. Let us not think it strange, if at any time we be thus blackened, but learn how to pass by evil report as well as good, and commit our cause, as Job did, to Him that judgeth righteously.

Let us see the particular articles of this charge.

I. He charges him with oppression and injustice; that, when he was in prosperity, he not only did no good with his wealth and power, but did a great deal of hurt with it. This was utterly false, as appears by the account Job gives of himself, ch. 29: 12. &c.) and the character God gave of him, ch. 1. And yet,

1. Eliphaz branches out this charge into divers particulars, with as much assurance as if he could call witnesses to prove on oath every article of it. He tells him, (1.) He had been cruel and unmerciful to the poor, v. 6, 7. contrary to the law of Moses. (Exod. 22: 26. Deut. 24: 13.) See Prov. 3: 27. 'Poor widows, who, while their husbands were living, troubled nobody, but now were forced to seek relief, thou hast sent away empty from thy doors with a sad heart, v. 9. and, worst of all, the arms of the fatherless have been broken; those that could help themselves but little, thou hast quite disabled to help themselves.' This is but insinuated; The arms of the fatherless have been broken: he does not say, 'Thou hast broken them,' but he would have it understood so: and, if they be broken, and those who have power do not relieve them, they are chargeable with it. (2.) He had been partial to the rich and great, v. 8. 'As for the mighty man, if he was guilty of any crime, he was never questioned for it; he had the earth, he dwelt in it: if he brought an action ever so unjustly, or if an action were ever so justly brought against him, yet he was sure to carry his cause in thy courts. The poor were not fed at thy door, while the rich were feasting at thy table.' Contrary to this is Christ's rule for hospitality; (Luke 14: 12—14.) and Solomon says, He that gives to the rich shall come to poverty.

2. He attributes all his present troubles to these supposed sins, v. 10, 11. Note, Those that have not showed mercy may justly be denied the comfortable hope of mercy; and then what can they expect but snares, and darkness, and continual fear?

II. He charges him with atheism, infidelity, and gross impiety; and thought this was at the bottom of his injustice and oppressiveness: he that did not fear God did not regard man. He would have it thought that Job was an Epicurean, who did indeed own the being of God, but denied his providence, and fancied that He confined Himself to the entertainments of the upper world, and never concerned Himself in the inhabitants and affairs of this. Bad men expel the fear of God out of their hearts, by banishing the eye of God out of the world; (Ezek. 8: 12.) and care not what they do, if they can but persuade themselves that God does not know. Eliphaz suspects Job had such a notion of God as this, because He is in the height of heaven, v. 12. But distance of place creates no difficulty to Him who is infinite, any more than distance of time to Him who is eternal. Or, That Job thinks it is therefore below Him, and a diminution to his glory, to take cognizance of this inferior part of the creation. This, too, is gross absurdity, as well as gross impiety, which Eliphaz here fathers on Job; for it supposes, that the administration of government is a burden and disparagement to the Supreme Governor; and that acts of justice and mercy were a toil to a mind infinitely wise, holy, and good.

V. 15—20. Eliphaz, having endeavored to convict Job, by setting his sins (as he thought) in order before him, here endeavors to awaken him to a sight and sense of his misery and danger, by reason of sin; and this he does, by comparing his case with that of the sinners of the old world, and the Sodomites, who, in comparison of the old world, were but a remnant, v. 16, 20. These two instances of the wrath of God against sin and sinners, are more than once put together, for warning to a careless world: as by our Savior, Luke 17: 26, &c. and the apostle, 2 Pet. 2: 5, 6. Note, There is an old way which wicked men have trodden, v. 15. Religion had but newly entered, when [illegible] immediately followed it: but though it is an [illegible]d way, a broad way, a tracked way, it is a dangerous way, and it leads to destruction; and it is good for us to mark it, that we may not dare to walk in it.

Eliphaz here puts Job in mind of it, perhaps in opposition to what he had said of the prosperity of the wicked; 'Thou canst find out here and there a single instance, it may be, of a wicked man ending his days in peace; but what is that to those two great instances of the final perdition of ungodly men—the drowning of the whole world, and the burning of Sodom?' In which he thinks Job may, as in a glass, see his own face.

Observe, 1. Their ruin, v. 16. They were cut down out of time; i. e. in the midst of their days, when, as man's time then went, many of them might, in the course of nature, have lived some hundreds of years longer, out of time, to be hurried into eternity; and their foundation, the earth on which they built themselves, and all their hopes, was overflown with a flood. Those who build on the sand, choose a foundation which will be overflown, when the rains descend, and the floods come, Matt. 7: 27.

2. Their sin, which brought that ruin, v. 17. Job had spoken of some who said, 'Depart from us,' and yet prospered, ch. 21: 14. But these did not; (says Eliphaz;) they found, to their cost, what it was to set God at defiance. They said to God, Depart from us; and then, (so some,) what could the Almighty do with them, but cut them off? Those who will not submit to God's golden sceptre, must expect to be broken to pieces with his iron rod. Others make it to denote the injustice of their sin; But, what hath the Almighty done against them? What iniquity have they found in Him? or, Wherein has He wearied them? Mic. 6: 3. Jer. 2: 5. Others make it to denote the reason of their sin; They say unto God, Depart, asking what the Almighty can do to them? 'What has He done to oblige us? What can He do, in a way of wrath, to make us miserable, or, in a way of favor, to make us happy?' As they argue, Zeph. 1: 12. The Lord will not do good, neither will He do evil. Eliphaz shows the absurdity of this in one word, and that is, calling God The Almighty; for, if He be so, what cannot He do? But it is not strange, if those cast off all religion, who neither dread God's wrath, nor desire his favor.

3. The aggravation of this sin; Yet he had filled their houses with good things, v. 18. Both those of the old world, and those of Sodom, had great plenty of all the delights of sense, Luke 17: 27. Many have their houses full of goods, but their hearts empty of grace, and thereby are marked for ruin.

4. The protestation Eliphaz makes against the principles and practices of those wicked people; But the counsel of the wicked is far from me. Job had said so, (ch. 21: 16.) and Eliphaz will not be behind. If they cannot agree in their own principles concerning God, yet they agree in renouncing the principles of those that live without God in the world. Note, Those that differ from each other in some matters of religion, and are engaged in disputes about them, yet ought unanimously and vigorously to appear against atheism and irreligion, and to take great care that their disputes do not hinder either their vigor or unanimity, in that common cause of God, that righteous cause.

5. The pleasure and satisfaction which the righteous shall have in this. (1.) In seeing the wicked destroyed, v. 19. They shall see it, i. e. observe, and notice it; (Hos. 14: 9.) and they shall be glad, not to see their fellow creatures miserable, or any secular turn of their own served, or point gained, but to see God glorified, the Word of God fulfilled, the power of oppressors broken, and thereby the oppressed relieved; to see sin shamed, atheists and infidels confounded, and fair warning given to all others to shun such wicked courses. Nay, they shall laugh them to scorn, i. e. they justly might do it; they shall do it, as God does it, in a holy manner, Ps. 2: 4. Prov. 1: 26. They shall take occasion thence to expose the folly of sinners, and show how ridiculous their principles are, though they call themselves wits. Ps. 52: 7. Some understand this of righteous Noah and his family, who beheld the destruction of the old world, and rejoiced in it, as he had grieved for their impiety. Lot, who saw the ruin of Sodom, had the same reason to rejoice, 2 Pet. 2: 7, 8. (2.) In seeing themselves distinguished, v. 20. The same rule that served him to condemn Job by, served him to magnify himself and his companions by. His substance is cut down, therefore he is a wicked man; ours is not, therefore we are righteous. But it is a deceitful rule to judge by; for none knows love or hatred by all that is before him. If others be consumed, if the very remnant of them be consumed, and we be not, instead of censuring them, and lifting up ourselves, as Eliphaz does here, we ought to be thankful to God, and take it for a warning to ourselves to prepare for the like calamities.

V. 21—30. Methinks I can almost forgive Eliphaz his hard censures of Job, which we had in the beginning of the ch., though very unjust and unkind, for this good counsel and encouragement in these vs. with which he closes his discourse, and than which nothing could be better said, or more to the purpose. Good men, though they may perhaps be put into a heat, yet sometimes will talk themselves into a better temper, and, it may be, sooner than another could talk them into it.

Eliphaz had laid before Job the miserable condition of a wicked man, that he might frighten him into repentance. Here, on the other hand, he shows him the happiness those may be sure of, who repent, that he might allure and encourage him to it. Ministers must try both ways in dealing with people, set before them both life and death, good and evil, the blessing and the curse. Observe,

I. The good counsel of Eliphaz.

1. Acquaint now thyself with God. Acquiesce in God; so some. It is our duty, at all times, especially when in affliction, to accommodate ourselves to, and quiet ourselves in, all the disposals of the Divine Providence. Join thyself to Him; so some; Fall in with his interests, and act no longer in opposition to Him. Our translators render it well; 'Acquaint thyself with Him; be not such a stranger to Him, as thou hast made thyself, by casting off the fear of Him, and restraining prayer before Him.' This is the duty and interest of every one of us. We must get the knowledge of God, fix our affections on Him, join ourselves to Him in a covenant of friendship, and then set up, and keep up, a constant correspondence with Him in the ways He has appointed. It is our [highest] honor, that we are made capable of this acquaintance; our misery, that by sin we have lost it; our privilege, that through Christ we are invited to return to it; and it will be our unspeakable happiness to contract and cultivate it.

2. 'Be at peace; at peace with thyself, not fretful, uneasy, and in confusion with thy God; be reconciled to Him. Do not carry on this unholy war. Thou complainest that God is thine Enemy; be thou his friend.' It is the great concern of every one of us to make our peace with God quickly, and it is necessary in order to our comfortable acquaintance with Him; for can two walk it was always matter of exultation and triumph to the righteous, when wicked oppressors were thus ruined; Job had no reason to wonder that they seemed to mock at his calamities and complaints, whom they considered to be such an one. Eliphaz's arguments and precedents by no means proved, that wicked men were always thus visited in this world. SCOTT.

Verses 21—30.

The former part of Eliphaz's answer must be condemned; but much of this conclusion merits great commendation, though it implied that Job had hitherto been a stranger to true religion, and that temporal prosperity would be the sure consequence of his sincere conversion. It contained excellent advice and suitable encouragements. (1 Chr. 28:9. John 17:1—3.) Eliphaz perhaps meant, that when the righteous were afflicted or cast down, Job would be honored as their helper and comforter.—The word rendered island, sometimes signifies region, or country. to receive it, we must retain it, Prov. 3: 18. We must lay it up as a thing of great value, that it may be safe: and we must lay it up in our hearts, as a thing of great use, that it may be ready to us on occasion, and we may neither lose it wholly, nor be at a loss for it in a time of need.

5. Return to the Almighty, v. 23. 'Do not only turn from sin, but turn to God and thy duty. Do not only turn toward the Almighty in some good inclinations and good beginnings, but return to Him; return home to Him, quite to Him, so as to reach to the Almighty, by a universal reformation, an effectual, thorough change of thy heart and life, and a firm resolution to cleave to Him;' so Mr. Poole.

6. Put away iniquity far from thy tabernacle. This was the advice Zophar gave him, ch. 11: 14. 'Thou must not only not be wicked thyself, but reprove and restrain sin in those under thy charge.' Note, Family reformation is most needful reformation; we and our house must serve the Lord.

II. The good encouragement Eliphaz gives Job, that he should be very happy, if he would but take this good counsel. In general, 'Thereby good shall come unto thee,' v. 21. the good that is now departed from thee; all the good thy heart can desire, temporal, spiritual, eternal. God shall come to thee, into covenant and communion with thee; and He brings all good with Him, all good in Him. The promises of Eliphaz are reducible to three heads;

1. His estate should prosper, and temporal blessings be abundantly bestowed; for godliness has the promise of the life that now is. Silver of strength, (so the word is,) which, being honestly got, will wear well; silver like steel. He should, by the grace of God, be kept from setting his heart so much on it, as Eliphaz thought he had done. Then wealth is a blessing indeed, when we are not insnared with the love of it. So little shalt thou value it or expect from it, that thou shalt lay it at thy feet, (Acts 4: 35.) not in thy bosom. Whereas men's riches usually expose them to danger, and he had owned that in his prosperity he was not in safety, (ch. 3: 26.) now he might be secure; for the Almighty shall be thy Defender; nay, thy Defence, ℣. 25. He shall be thy gold; (so the marg.) and it is the same word used, (v. 24.) for gold, but it signifies also a strong hold, because money is a defence, Eccl. 7: 12. Worldlings make gold their god, saints make God their gold; and they that are enriched with his favor and grace, may truly be said to have abundance of the best gold, and best laid up. We understand it, 'He shall be thy Defence against the incursions of neighboring spoilers: as Sabeans and Chaldeans;' which, some think, is the meaning of that, Thou shalt put away iniquity far from thy tabernacle; taking it as a promise. 'The iniquity or wrong designed against thee shall be put off, and not reach thee.' Ps. 91: 1—3.

2. His soul should prosper, and he should be enriched with spiritual blessings,—the best blessings. (1.) He should live a life of complacency in God, v. 26. The way to have our heart's desire, is to make God our heart's Delight, Ps. 37: 4. If God give us Himself to be our Joy, He will deny us nothing that is good for us. No delight is comparable to the delight which gracious souls have in the Almighty; and those that acquaint themselves with Him, and submit themselves entirely to Him, shall find his favor to be, not only their strength, but their song. [Note, Ex. 20: 3.]—(2.) He should have a humble, holy confidence toward God, (v. 26.) such as they are said to have, whose hearts condemn them not. (3.) He should maintain a constant communion with God; 'The correspondence, once settled, shall be kept up to thine unspeakable satisfaction,' v. 27. 'Thou shalt make thy prayer' (the Word is, Thou shalt multiply thy prayers) 'unto Him, and He will not think thy letters troublesome, though many and long. The oftener we come to the throne of grace, the more welcome. Under all thy burdens, in all thy wants, cares, and fears, thou shalt send to heaven for guidance and strength, wisdom, comfort, and good success.' 'He shall hear thee, and make it to appear so, by what He does for thee and in thee.' 'Then thou shalt, by thy praises, reply to the gracious answers which He sent thee: thou shalt pay thy vows, and that shall be acceptable to Him, and fetch in further mercy.' Note, When God performs that we prayed for in our distress, we must make conscience of performing what we then promised, else we deal not honestly. If nothing else, we promised to be thankful, and that is enough, for it includes all, Ps. 116: 14. (4.) He should have inward satisfaction in the management of all his outward affairs, v. 28. Thou shalt decree a thing, and it shall be established unto thee, i. e. 'Thou shalt frame all thy projects and purposes with so much wisdom and grace, and resignation to the will of God, that the issue of them shall be to thy heart's content; nay, sometimes the providence of God shall give thee the very thing thou didst desire and pray for, and in thine own way, and manner, and time; be it unto thee, even as thou wilt.' When an affair succeeds just according to the scheme we laid, and our measures are in nothing broken, nor are we put on new counsels, then we must own the performance of this promise,

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

True wisdom consists with seeking our own interest, yea, in seeking it, provided it be our true and everlasting interest, and we seek it in that way which God hath revealed: and godliness is always profitable to the possessor, having 'the promise both of the life that now is, and of that which is to come.' (1 Tim. 4:6—10. 6:6—10.) But it is absurd to suppose, we can be profitable to God, or merit any thing at his hands. Even the perfect obedience of angels, in these respects, is entirely unavailing: how much more, then, the defective services of polluted sinners! All our comforts therefore flow from the unmerited mercy of our God; and under all our afflictions we should acknowledge, that we suffer less than we deserve. He indeed acts as a Sovereign; but his sovereignty is perfectly wise, righteous, faithful, good, and merciful. He approves of the image of his own holiness, and delights in the fruits of his own Spirit; and He graciously accepts the thankful services of the humble believer, while He rejects the proud claim of the self-confident Pharisee.—It is, however, grievous to reflect, that many who speak excellently on the perfections of God, so far from being 'imitators of Him, as beloved children,' behave towards others in direct contrariety to this perfect pattern; and even cloke their own injustice and severity, by expatiating on the divine mercy and justice! Let us then beware of this common offence. And if suffering under the cruel injury of slanderous tongues, let us examine ourselves, whether there be not some plausible ground for the reproach: that our minds may feel a deeper abhorrence of the crimes, of which we are accused, and that we may more watchfully avoid all appearance of them.

Blessed be the name of the LORD, we have immense advantages, which these ancient believers had not; we have both his precepts and his promises, his law and his gospel, in our hands: may we receive them as the words of his mouth, and treasure them up in our hearts: may we return unto Him by living faith, and cleave to Him in holy love; and show the reality of our conversion, by casting away our transgressions, renouncing all idols, obeying his commandments, and acquiescing in his will. CHAP. XXIII.

Job longs to plead his cause before God, being assured of a favorable event, 1—7. He laments that he cannot perceive the presence of God: but is confident that God knows his way, and will bring him forth as gold, 8—10. He attests his own integrity, 11, 12; but is troubled by the immutable counsel of God, 13—17.

THEN Job answered and said,

2 Even to-day is [a] my complaint bitter: my * stroke is [b] heavier than my groaning.

3 [c] Oh, that I knew [d] where I might find him! that [e] I might come even to his seat!

5 I would [h] know the words which he would answer me, and understand what he would say unto me.

6 Will he [i] plead against me with his great power? No, [k] but he would put strength in me.

7 There [l] the righteous might dispute with him: [m] so should I be delivered for ever from my Judge.

8 Behold, [n] I go forward, but he is not there; and backward, but I cannot perceive him:

Thou shalt decree, and it shall be established, Ps. 90: 17. (5.) Even in times of common calamity and danger, he should have abundance of joy and hope, v. 29. Thou shalt find that in thyself, which will lift thee above thy troubles. When men's hearts fail them for fear, then shall Christ's disciples lift up their heads for joy, Luke 21: 26—28. Thus are they made to ride upon the high places of the earth; Isa. 58: 14. and that which will lift them up, is, the belief that God will save the humble person. They that humble themselves shall be exalted, not only in honor, but in comfort.

3. He should be a blessing to his country, and an instrument of good to many, v. 30. God shall, in answer to thy prayers, deliver the island of the innocent, and have a regard therein to the pureness of thy hands, which is necessary to the acceptableness of our prayers, 1 Tim. 2: 8. But, because we may suppose the innocent not to need deliverance, (it was guilty Sodom that wanted the benefit of Abraham's intercession,) I incline to the marginal reading, The innocent shall deliver the island, by their advice, (Eccl. 9: 14, 15.) and by their prayers, and their interest in heaven, Acts 27: 24. Or, He shall deliver those that are not innocent, and they are delivered by the pureness of thy hands; so it may be read, and most probably. Note, A good man is a public good. Sinners fare the better for saints, whether they are aware of it or no. If Eliphaz intended hereby, (as some think,) to insinuate that Job's prayers were not prevailing, nor his hands pure, he was afterward made to see his error, when it appeared that Job had a better interest in Heaven than he and his three friends, ch. 42: 8.

CHAP. XXIII. V. 1—7. This ch. begins Job's reply to Eliphaz; in which he takes no notice of his friends; either because he saw it was to no purpose, or because he liked the good counsel Eliphaz gave him in the close of his discourse so well, that he would make no answer to the peevish reflections he began with; but he appeals to God; begs to have his cause heard, and doubts not but to make it good, having the testimony of his own conscience concerning his integrity. Here seems to be a struggle between flesh and spirit, fear and faith, throughout this ch. Job is confident he has wrong done him by his friends, and therefore, ill as he is, he will not give up the cause, nor let them have the last word. Here,

I. He justifies his own resentments and representations of his trouble, v. 2. Even to-day is my complaint counted rebellion; so some. 'But,' says he, 'I do not complain more than there is cause, for my stroke is heavier than my groaning.' We wrong God, if our groaning be heavier than our stroke; like froward children, who, when they cry for nothing, have justly something given them to cry for; but we do not wrong ourselves, though our stroke be heavier than our groaning, for little said is soon amended.

II. He appeals from the censures of his friends to the just judgment of God; an evidence he thought that he was not a hypocrite, for then he durst not have made such an appeal as this. Paul comforts himself in this, that He that judged him was the Lord, therefore he valued not man's judgment, but was willing to wait till the appointed day of decision comes; whereas Job is impatient, and passionately wishes to have the judgment-day anticipated, and to have his cause tried quickly, as it were, by a special commission. The apostle found it necessary to press it much on suffering Christians, patiently to expect the Judge's coming, James 5: 7—9.

1. He is so sure of the equity of God's tribunal, that he longs to appear before it, v. 3. This may properly express the pious breathings of a soul convinced that it has, by sin, lost God, and is undone for ever if it recover not its interest in his favor. Mic. 6: 6, 7. It is the cry of a poor, deserted soul, 'Saw ye Him whom my soul loveth? Oh that I knew where I might find Him! But Job here seems to speak it too boldly. A patient waiting for death and judgment is our wisdom and duty; and, if we duly consider things, that cannot be without a holy fear and trembling; but a passionate wishing for death or judgment, without any such fear and trembling, is our sin and folly, and ill becomes us. Do we know what death and judgment are, and are we so very ready for them, that we need not time to get readier? Wo to them that, thus in a heat, desire the day of the Lord, Amos 5: 18.

2. He is so sure of the goodness of his own cause, that he longs to be opening it at God's bar, v. 4.

3. He is so sure of a sentence in his favor, that he even longed to hear it, v. 5. Let the Word of God determine all controversies.

III. He comforts himself with the hope that God would deal favorably with him, and that the issue would be comfortable, v. 6, 7.

Now, even the upright are often chastened of the Lord, and cannot dispute against it; integrity itself is no fence either against calamity or calumny; but in that day, they shall not be condemned with the world, though here God may afflict by prerogative. Mal. 3: 18. Those that are delivered up to God as their Owner and Ruler, shall be for ever delivered from Him as their Judge and Avenger: and there is no flying from his justice, but by flying to his mercy.

V. 8—12. I. Job here complains, that he cannot understand the meaning of God's providences concerning him, but was quite at a loss, v. 8, 9. Job, no doubt, believed that God is everywhere present; but complains that he could not fix his thoughts, nor form any clear judgment of things in his own mind, so hurried and discomposed with his troubles; he was like a man in a fright, or at his wit's end, who runs this way, and that, but brings nothing to a head. He was quite at a loss to know the cause or end of his troubles, or what God designed to do with him; and whatever conjecture he advanced, still something or other appeared against it.

II. He satisfies himself with this, that God himself was a Witness to his integrity, and therefore did not doubt but the issue would be good. After Job had almost lost himself in the labyrinth of the divine counsels, how contentedly does he sit down, at length, with this thought, 'Though I know not the way He takes, yet He knows the way I take,' v. 10. Afflictions are to us, as we are; those that go gold into the furnace, will come out no worse.

What encouraged Job was, the testimony of his conscience, that God's way was the way he walked in, (v. 11.) and God's Word, the rule he walked by, v. 12. He could as well have lived without his daily bread, as without the Word of God. I have laid it up; so the word is, as those that lay up provision for a siege, or as Joseph laid up corn before the famine. Note, The Word of God is to our souls, as our necessary food is to our bodies; it sustains the spiritual life, and strengthens us for the actions of life; it is that which we cannot subsist without, and the want of which nothing else can make up: we ought therefore so to esteem it, to take pains for it, hunger after it, feed upon it with delight, and nourish our souls with it; and this will be our rejoicing in the day of evil, as it was Job's here.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXIII. V. 2. Job's complaints were bitter, and his friends thought them rebellious; (as the word properly signifies;) but he maintained, that the calamities with which he had been visited, and the anguish which he felt, exceeded all that he could express.—The v. may be read as an exclamation: 'Oh, that to-day my complaint should be accounted rebellion!' Or, as an interrogation: 'Is my complaint, even to-day, rebellion? When my stroke is heavier than my groaning!' SCOTT.

Verse 3—7.

From my judge. (7) Some think that he meant Eliphaz, who, as his self-constituted judge, had already most unjustly brought him in guilty of many atrocious crimes, and pronounced sentence against him.—Job's consciousness of his integrity, and his confidence that the Lord would graciously decide in his favor, were well grounded: but there was a great want of reverence, humility, and patience, in his vehement manner of stating his desires; and in fact, the Lord did at last silence Job, by showing him his presumption, in thus pleading against his almighty Sovereign. (38:1—3. 40:1—8. 42:1—6. 1 Cor. 4:3—5.) SCOTT.

Verses 8—12.

The powerful operations of God were discernible, but his gracious presence was hid in anger; and He seemed to stand at a distance, or [r] I shall come forth as gold.

11 My [s] foot hath held his steps, [t] his way have I kept, and not declined.

12 Neither [u] have I gone back from the commandment of his lips; [x] I have * esteemed the words of his mouth more than my † necessary food.

13 But he is in one mind, and [y] who can turn him? [z] and what his soul desireth, even that he doeth.

14 For he performeth the thing that is [a] appointed for me: and [b] many such things are with him.

15 Therefore [c] am I troubled at his presence: when I consider, I am afraid of him.

16 For God [d] maketh my heart soft, and [e] the Almighty troubleth me:

17 Because I was not [f] cut off before the darkness, neither hath he covered [g] the darkness from my face.

CHAP. XXIV.

Job inquires why the judgments of God on the wicked are not evident to his people, 1. He shows that the most atrocious offenders often go unpunished in this life, and die as all other men, 2—24. He challenges any man to confute him, 25.

WHY, [a] seeing times are not hidden from the Almighty, do [b] they that know him [c] not see his days?

2 Some remove the [d] landmarks; they [e] violently take away flocks, and feed thereof.

3 They drive away the ass of the fatherless, they take the widow's ox for a pledge.

4 They turn the needy out of the way: the poor of the earth hide themselves together.

5 Behold, as wild asses in the desert go they forth to their work; rising betimes for a prey: the wilderness yieldeth food for them and for their children.

6 They reap every one his corn in the field: and they gather the vintage of the wicked.

7 They cause the naked to lodge without clothing, that they have no covering in the cold.

8 They are wet with the showers of the mountains, and embrace the rock for want of a shelter.

9 They pluck the fatherless from the breast, and take a pledge of the poor.

10 They cause him to go naked without clothing, and they take away the sheaf from the hungry;

11 Which make oil within their walls, and tread their winepresses, and suffer thirst.

12 Men groan from out of the city, and the soul of the wounded crieth out: yet God layeth not folly to them.

13 They are of those that rebel against the light; they know not the ways thereof, nor abide in the paths thereof.

14 The murderer rising with the light killeth the poor and needy, and in the night is as a thief.

15 The eye also of the adulterer waiteth for the twilight, saying, No eye shall see me: and disguiseth his face.

16 In the dark they dig through houses, which they had marked for themselves in the day-time: they know not the light.

17 For the morning is to them even as the shadow of death: if one know them, they are in the terrors of the shadow of death.

18 He is swift as the waters; their portion is cursed in the earth: he beholdeth not the way of the vineyards.

19 Drought and heat consume the snow waters: so doth the grave those which have sinned.

20 The womb shall forget him; the worm shall feed sweetly on him; he shall be no more remembered; and wickedness shall be broken as a tree.

21 He evil entreateth the barren that beareth not: and doeth not good to the widow.

22 He [f] also [g] prolongeth his power by his [h] might: he riseth up, and no man is sure of life.

23 Though it be given him to be in safety, whereon he [i] resteth; yet his eyes are upon their ways.

24 They are exalted for a little while, but are gone and brought low out of the way as all other, and cut off as the tops of the ears of corn.

25 And if not now, who will make me a liar, and make my speech nothing worth?

CHAP. XXV.

Bildad proves the majesty and purity of God, 1—3. Man cannot be righteous before him, 4—6.

THEN answered Bildad the Shuhite, and said,

2 Dominion and fear are with him, he maketh peace in his high places.

3 Is there any number of his armies? and upon whom doth not his light arise?

4 How then can man be justified with God? or how can he be clean that is born of a woman?

5 Behold even to the moon, and it shineth not; yea, the stars are not pure in his sight.

6 How much less man, that is a worm? and the son of man, which is a worm?

V. 13—17. Some make Job to complain here, that God dealt unjustly and unfairly with him, in proceeding to punish him without the least relenting or relaxation, though he had such incontestable evidences to produce of his innocency. I am loath to think so; but he reasons himself into a sort of patience per force; the worst he says, is, that God deals unaccountably with him, according to his will, v. 14.

1. To consider, that, when God was appointing us to eternal life and glory as our end, He was appointing to this condition, this affliction, whatever it is, in our way, this may do more than silence us, it may satisfy us that it is all for the best [note, 7: 1.]; though what He does we know not now, we shall know hereafter.

2. He makes but a bad use of these good truths, v. 13, 14. or, had he duly considered them, he might have said, 'Therefore am I easy and pleased, and will rejoice in hope!' But he said, Therefore am I troubled at his presence, v. 15. his heart was made, not graciously, but fearfully, peevishly, soft, v. 16. and he quarrels with God, (v. 17.) instead of making the best of his lot. See what confusion poor Job was now in, for he contradicted himself: just now, he was troubled for God's absence; (v. 8, 9.) now he is troubled at his presence. What he now felt, made him fear worse: there is indeed that which, if we consider it, will show that we have cause to be afraid of God—his infinite justice and purity, compared with our own sinfulness and vileness; but if, withal, we consider his grace in a Redeemer, and our compliance with that grace, the fears will vanish, and we shall see cause to hope in Him.

CHAP. XXIV. Job having, by his complaints in the foregoing chapter, given vent to his passion, and thereby gained some ease, breaks them off abruptly and now applies himself to a further discussion of the doctrinal controversy between him and his friends, concerning the prosperity of wicked people. He lays down his general proposition, That the punishment of the wicked is not so visible and apparent as his friends supposed; and then proves it by an induction of particulars. So that, upon the whole, we cannot say, that all who are in trouble are wicked; for it is certain, that all who are in prosperity are not righteous.

V. 1—12. Job's friends had been very positive they should soon see the fall of wicked people, how much soever they might prosper for awhile. By no means, says Job, though times are not hidden from the Almighty, yet they that know Him do not presently see his day, v. 1. 1. He takes it for granted, times are not hid from the Almighty: past times are not hid from his judgment, (Eccl. 3: 15.) present times from his providence, (Matt 10: 29.) future times from his prescience, Acts 15: 18. God governs the world, therefore we may be sure He takes cognizance of it: bad times are not hid from Him, though the bad men, that make them, shy one to another, He has forsaken the earth, Ps. 94: 6, 7. Every man's times are in his hand and under his eye, therefore it is in his power to make the times of wicked men in this world miserable; He foresees the time of every man's death; therefore, if wicked men die before they are punished for their wickedness, we cannot say, 'They escaped Him by surprise;' He foresaw it, nay, He ordered it. Before Job will inquire into the reasons of the prosperity of wicked men, he asserts God's omniscience, as one prophet, in a like case, asserts his righteousness, (Jer. 12: 1.) another his holiness, (Hab. 1: 13.) another his goodness to his own people, Ps. 73: 1. General truths must be held fast, though we may find it difficult to reconcile them to particu-

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

They, and they alone, who have experienced the conflict between faith and unbelief, hope and despondency, the desire to submit, and the opposing power of self-will, during severe trials and sharp temptations, can clearly understand or account for the fluctuations observable in Job's language, and the state of his mind whence they arose: (9:14—21.) and the consideration, that so eminent a servant of God was harassed and perplexed, exactly as they are, cannot fail to afford them some relief. But our bitter complaints are very apt to savor of rebellion; and we should watch over ourselves in such circumstances, lest we provoke the Lord to increase his corrections.—When we meet with unkind treatment or unjust censures, we should seek help and comfort from Him: yet we ought to come in humble reverence, and wait his time with patience. He will answer our inquiries by his Word, and our prayers in his providence, and by his Spirit; and cause us to understand and approve his decisions. The Christian is conscious of having uprightly embraced the salvation of God, and set out in his ways, by repentance, faith, and true conversion; he has held his steps, and kept his path, without turning aside for the sake of worldly advantages, or for fear of the cross. Many false steps indeed he has made; but he has not been left to walk in the way of allowed sin: he obeys unreservedly, from love, and with the constancy of patient expectation. The Word of God has been the food of his soul: he has an appetite for it; he relishes and digests it, converts it into nourishment, and is strengthened by it for service and for conflict. In his habitual judgment, he would rather want animal recreation, and starve with hunger, than be deprived of the spiritual sustenance of his soul: and therefore he takes pleasure in searching the Scripture, [doing his duty,] and attending on the ordinances of God. Nothing can come upon such, but what is appointed by infinite wisdom and love, and in order to humble, soften, and sanctify them; nothing, but what shall terminate in their benefit, and that of their brethren, and redound to the glory of God: and, in their sober judgment, they would be willing to endure darkness and distress for a time, for these important purposes. May we then learn to obey and trust the Lord, even under tribulation; be willing to die when He pleases, for we know not from what evils we may thus be exempted; and to live as long as He sees good, as we are not aware for what good purposes our lives may be prolonged. to frown upon him.—In these and similar protestations, it is evident that Job continually referred to the charges brought against him, and the advice given him, by his friends. (M. R.) SCOTT.

Verses 13—17.

At this time, Job seems to have felt that his vehement wishes and protestations were altogether vain, because he was aware that the purposes of God were irreversible, and his power irresistible; so that neither persuasion nor opposition could induce Him to deviate from his settled plan. It was God's decree and fixed purpose thus to afflict him, though he knew not on what account; but there were many such deep mysteries in Providence. ID.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXIV. V. 1. If God uniformly punished the wicked in this life, according to the opinion of Eliphaz and his friends; Job supposed, wise and godly men, who are acquainted with Him and his ways, would be able to give some account of the times of vengeance; to conclude how long the prosperity of the wicked would last; and to predict how it would terminate, and what degree of misery proportioned to their crimes would be inflicted: as persons acquainted with the mind of the prince, and the laws of the land, can foresee and expect the sentence, which will shortly be pronounced and executed on notorious malefactors. There are days appointed for their trial, and penalties annexed to their crimes, and we know what to expect, as to the murderer or traitor. Doubtless, the Governor of the world also has his appointed times of vengeance; but why are they not discovered to his people? Why are they not marked or evident? They certainly would be, if exact justice were awarded in this world; and as they are not, it is evident that the time of trial, and of executing vengeance, is not appointed in this life. Verses 2—12.

How absolutely necessary are the poor and the rich to each other! How detestable, how wicked that mischievous spirit, which would lently take away flocks, and * feed thereof.

3 They [f] drive away the ass of the fatherless, they take the widow's ox for a pledge.

4 They [g] turn the needy out of the way: the poor of the earth [h] hide themselves together.

5 Behold, as [i] wild asses in the desert go they forth to their work; [k] rising betimes for a prey: [l] the wilderness yieldeth food for them and for their children.

6 They [m] reap every one his † corn in the field: and ‡ they gather the vintage of the wicked.

7 They cause [n] the naked to lodge without clothing, that they have [o] no covering in the cold.

8 They are [p] wet with the showers of the mountains, and [q] embrace the rock for want of a shelter.

9 They [r] pluck the fatherless from the breast, and take a pledge of the poor.

10 They cause him to go naked without clothing, and [s] they take away the sheaf from the hungry;

11 Which [t] make oil within their walls, and tread their wine-presses, and suffer thirst.

12 Men [u] groan from out of the city, and the soul of the [x] wounded crieth out: [y] yet God layeth not folly to them.

13 They are of those that [z] rebel against the light; [a] they know not the ways thereof, [b] nor abide in the paths thereof.

14 The [c] murderer rising with the light killeth the poor and needy, and [d] in the night is as a thief.

15 The [e] eye also of the adulterer waiteth for the twilight, saying, [f] No eye shall see me: and § disguiseth his face.

16 In [g] the dark they dig through houses, which they had marked for themselves in the day-time; [h] they know not the light.

17 For the morning is to them even as the lar events. 2. He yet asserts, that they who know Him, that is, wise and good people who are acquainted with Him, and with whom his secret is, do not see his days, not the day of his judging for them; this was the thing he complained of in his own case, (ch. 23: 8.) That he could not see God appearing on his behalf to plead his cause; nor the day of his judging against open and notorious sinners; that is called his day, Ps. 37: 13. We believe that day will come, but we do not see it, because it is future, and its presages secret. 3. Though this is a mystery of Providence, yet there is a reason for it, and we shall shortly know why the judgment is deferred; even the wisest, and those who know God best, do not yet see it. God will exercise their faith and patience, and excite their prayers for the coming of his kingdom, for which they are to cry day and night to Him, Luke 18: 7.

For the proof of this, that wicked people prosper, he specifies two sorts of unrighteous ones, whom all the world saw thriving in their iniquity.

I. Tyrants, and those that do wrong under pretence of law and authority, Eccl. 3: 16. 1. They disseize their neighbors of their real estates, which came to them by descent from their ancestors, v. 2. Forging or destroying deeds is now a crime equivalent to this. 2. They dispossess them of their personal estates, under color of justice, pretending they are forfeited, v. 2, 3. as 2 Sam. 12: 4. 3. They take all occasions to offer personal abuses to them, v. 4. they love to banter people, and to make fools of them, and turn them out of the way of getting relief.

Some understand those barbarous actions, (v. 9, 10.) to be done by those oppressors that pretend law for what they do; as Pharoah and Herod; and we read of children brought forth to the murderers, Hos. 9: 13. They take a pledge of the poor; nay, they take the poor themselves for a pledge, as some read it, and, probably, it was under this pretence they plucked the fatherless from the breast, distraining them for slaves, as Neh. 5: 5. Cruelty to the poor is great wickedness, and cries aloud for vengeance.

Another instance of their barbarous treatment, is, their depriving the poor of even their necessary food and raiment, v. 10. while they themselves are fed to the full. They are also very oppressive to the laborers they employ; not only give them no wages, though the laborer is worthy of his hire; (and this is a crying sin, Jam. 5: 4.) but will not so much as give them meat and drink: those that carry their sheaves are hungry; so some read it, (v. 10.) and it agrees with v. 11. that those who make oil within their walls, and toil at the wine-presses, yet suffer thirst, which was worse than muzzling the mouth of the ox that treads out the corn. Those masters forget that they have a Master in heaven, who allow not the necessary supports of life to their servants and laborers, not caring whether they can live by their labor or no. Further, Not only among the poor country people, but in cities, we see the tears of the oppressed, (v. 12.) where rich merchants and traders are as cruel with their poor debtors, [or laborers,] as landlords in the country are with their poor tenants. In cities, such cruel actions are more observed, and the wronged have easier access to justice to right themselves; yet oppressors there fear neither the restraints of the law, nor the just censures of their neighbors, but the oppressed groan and cry out like wounded men, and can no more ease and help themselves, for the oppressors are inexorable, and deaf to their groans.

II. Robbers, that do wrong by downright force, as the lawless Bedouins of the desert, v. 5. [note, 5: 5.] Eliphaz had concluded, that Providence would not thus have stripped Job, if he had not first stripped the naked of their clothing, ch. 22: 6. Job here tells him, there were those really guilty of the crimes he was unjustly charged with, and yet prospered in their villanies; the curse they laid themselves under working invisibly: and Job thinks it more just to argue, as he did, from an open, notorious course of wickedness, to a secret and future punishment, than, as Eliphaz, from nothing but present trouble, to a course of past, secret iniquity.

The impunity of these oppressors and spoilers is expressed in one word; (v. 12.) Yet God layeth not folly to them, i. e. does not immediately prosecute them with his judgments for these crimes, nor make them examples, and so evince their folly to all the world. He that gets riches, and not by right, at his end shall be a fool, Jer. 17: 11. But while he prospers, he passes for a wise man, and God lays not folly to him until He saith, Thou fool, this night thy soul shall be required of thee, Luke 12: 20.

V. 13—17. These vs. describe another sort of sinners, who therefore go unpunished, because they go undiscovered, v. 13. Some understand it figuratively: they sin against the light of nature, the light of God's law, and that of their own consciences; they profess to know God, but rebel marshall them, or insist that they must be marshalled, one against the other! While there is such a diversity in God's endowments to men, there must ever be the very rich and the very poor. Let us bless God that the institutions of our own country do not necessarily perpetuate either condition to a family; for accumulated wealth and excessive poverty are both of a tendency destructive of the best affections. 'Moderate poverty is a talent to salvation:' but the consolations of religion are not divided according to this world's wealth. Job here draws a revolting picture of oppression in the matter of wages; and the enormous injustice practised herein in all nations, shows the picture is not exaggerated. Let us bless God that the condition of one who labors with his hands for his daily bread is so different, so incomparably better, in a great part of our country, than in most others—that one can here enjoy the benefits of his labor, intellectual or bodily, while there it is devoured by the craving selfishness of another. Let us watch with jealousy, that free institutions be not perverted, on the one hand, by the tyranny of an oppressor by law; or, on the other, by the tyranny of a lawless mob. Let us view with uncompromising detestation, and use every lawful mean to bring to justice, both him who, in the power of wealth, grinds the faces of the helpless poor, obliged in their distress to hire themselves to him; and him who, plotting in the darkness, calls envy, and every blind, bad passion of the unfortunate to his aid, in waging indiscriminate war against the rich, simply because they are rich: for such machinations, if unchecked, must shortly prove fatal alike to the rights, the happiness of all.

against the knowledge they have of Him, and will not be guided and governed, commanded and controlled, by it. Others understand it literally: they have the day-light, and choose the night as the most advantageous season for their wickedness. Sinful works are therefore called works of darkness, (John 3: 20.) So that he here describes the worst of sinners, 1. That sin wilfully, and against the convictions of their own consciences, whereby they add rebellion to their sin. 2. That sin deliberately, and with a great deal of plot and contrivance, using a thousand arts to conceal their villanies, fondly imagining, that, if they can but hide them from the eye of men, they are safe; but forgetting that there is no darkness, or shadow of death, in which the workers of iniquity can hide themselves from God's eye, ch. 34: 22.

He specifies three sorts of sinners, that shun the light, murderers, (v. 14.) adulterers, (v. 15.) house-breakers, v. 16. See what care and pains wicked men take to compass their wicked designs, and let it shame us out of our negligence and slothfulness in doing good. See what pains those take that make provision for the flesh, to fulfil the lust of it; pains to compass, and then to conceal, that provision, which, after all, will be death and hell at last! Less pains would serve to mortify and crucify the flesh, and would be life and heaven at last. Let the sinner change his heart, and then he needs not disguise his face, but may lift it up without spot.

And, lastly, Job observes, (and perhaps observes it as part of the present, though secret, punishment of such sinners,) that they are in a continual terror for fear of discovery, v. 17. Shame came in with sin, and everlasting shame is at the end of it. See the misery of sinners, they are exposed to continual frights; and yet see their folly, they are afraid of coming under the eye of men, but have no dread of God's eye, which is always on them: they are not afraid of doing that which yet they are so terribly afraid of being known to do.

V. 18—25. Job here, in the conclusion of his discourse,

I. Gives some further instances of the wickedness of these cruel, bloody men. 1. Some are pirates and robbers at sea. To this many learned interpreters apply those difficult expressions, v. 18. He is swift upon the waters. Privateers choose those ships that are the best sailers; with these they pick up prizes; and this brings them in so much wealth, that their portion is cursed in the earth, and they behold not the way of the vineyards, i. e. so Patrick—They despise the employment of those who till the ground, and plant vineyards, as poor and unprofitable. But others make this a further description of the conduct of those sinners that are afraid of the light: if they be discovered, they get away as fast as they can, and choose to look, not in the vineyards, for fear of being discovered, but in some cursed portion, a lonely, desolate place, which nobody looks after. 2. Some are abusive to those in trouble, and add affliction to the afflicted. Barrenness was looked upon as a great reproach, and those that fall under that affliction they upbraid with it, as Peninnah did Hannah, on purpose to vex them and make them to fret, which is a barbarous thing; this is evil entreating the barren that beareth not, (v. 21.) or those that are childless, and so want the arrows others have in their quiver, which enable them to deal with their enemy in the gate, Ps. 127: 5. He takes that advantage against, and is oppressive to, them: as the fatherless, so the childless, are in some degree helpless. For the same reason, it is a cruel thing to hurt the widow, to whom we ought to do good; and not doing good, when it is in our power, is doing hurt. There are those who, inuring themselves to cruelty, come, at last, to be so exceeding boisterous, that they are the terror of the mighty in the land of the living, v. 22. He draws the mighty into a snare with his power; even the greatest are not able to stand before him when he is in his mad fits: he rises up in his passion, and lays about him with so much fury, that no man is sure of his life; nor can he at the same time be sure of his own, for his hand is against every man, and every man's hand against him. One would wonder, how any man can take pleasure in making all about him afraid of him, yet there are those that do.

II. He shows, that these daring sinners prosper, and are at ease for a while, nay, and often end their days in peace, as Ishmael, who, though he was a man of such a character as is here given, yet both lived and died in the presence of all his brethren, as we are told, Gen. 16: 12.—25: 18. Of these sinners here it is said, 1. That it is given them to be in safety, v. 23. They seem to be under the special protection of the Divine Providence, and one would wonder how they escape with life through so many dangers as they run themselves into. 2. That they rest on this, that is, they rely on this, as sufficient to warrant all their violences: because sentence against their evil works is not executed speedily, they think there is no great evil in them, and that God is not displeased with them, nor will ever call them to an account. Their prosperity is their security. 3. That they are exalted for awhile; they seem to be the favorites of Heaven, and value themselves as making the best figure on earth. They are set up in honor, set up (as they think) out of the reach of danger, and lifted up in the pride of their own spirits. 4. That, at length, they are carried out of the world very silently and gently, and without any remarkable disgrace or terror. 'They go down to the grave as easily, as snow-water sinks into the dry ground, when it is melted by the sun.' So Patrick explains v. 19. To the same purport he paraphrases v. 20. The womb shall forget him, &c. 'God sets no such mark of his displeasure on him, but that his mother may soon forget him: the hand of justice does not hang him on a gibbet, for the birds to feed on; but he is carried to his grave like other men; there he lies quietly, and neither he nor of unburnt bricks; so that there is little difficulty in making a hole sufficiently large to admit the human body. No wonder, then, that this is the general way of robbing houses. Thus in the morning, when the inmates awake, they see daylight through a hole in the wall, and immediately know what has been done.' Roberts. The houses of Egypt at the present day are often but hovels of mud: either crude brick or mud houses might be dug through without noise. 'The houses of the ancient Egyptians were stuccoed within and without, and of crude brick, made in a mould, without pressure, and being a revenue to the government [a monopoly?] were stamped afterwards, previous to their drying, with the names of the king or high priest. The Hebrews were compelled to make these bricks for the kings during their whole reigns. Crude brick pyramids, with arches, are found at Thebes, built not later than the 3d Remeses (1230, B. C.) I have found bricks, as firm as when first made, bearing the name (a) of Thothmes III, [and his wife (b), see cut,] (the contemporary of Moses,) in this tomb, (No. 85, at Thebes,) also erected during his reign.' Wilkinson. Ed.

Verses 18—20.

These atrocious offenders, and many others, proceeded swiftly and silently, like the gliding stream, into every iniquity: they acquired a portion on earth by such accursed practices, without bestowing pains to cultivate the land; spending their time in deserts, and being seldom seen in the ways towards the vineyards, which were frequented by those who labored in them.—Yet, as dry weather and heat evaporate the waters, arising from the melted snows, or they sink into the earth imperceptibly and unnoticed: so numbers of these criminals went down unobserved into the grave. And, as no remarkable misery or disgrace attended their lives or deaths, even their mothers and nearest relations were soon comforted for them, and they were forgotten, as if no more criminal than other men: so that their wickedness came to an end, as a tree that grows undisturbed, and is not cut down, but decays and is broken through length of time. Scott.

CHAP. XXV.

Bildad asserts the dominion and power of God, before whom man cannot be justified, 1—6.

THEN answered Bildad the Shuhite, and said,

2 [a] Dominion and fear are with him, [b] he maketh peace in his high places.

3 Is [c] there any number of his armies? and [d] upon whom doth not his light arise?

4 [e] How then can man be justified with God? or [f] how can he be clean that is born of a woman?

5 Behold [g] even to the moon, and it shineth not; yea, the stars are not pure in his sight.

6 How [h] much less man, that is a worm? and the son of man, which is a worm?

CHAP. XXVI.

Job derides Bildad's speech, as little to the purpose, 1—4. He shows the works and perfections of God to be unsearchable, 5—14.

BUT Job answered and said,

2 [a] How hast thou [b] helped him that is without power? how savest thou the arm that hath no strength?

3 How hast thou [c] counselled him that his wickedness is any more remembered than a tree which is broken to shivers.' And, v. 24. They are taken out of the way as all other, i. e. 'They are shut up in their graves like all other men; nay, they die as easily (without those tedious pains which some endure) as an ear of corn is cropped with your hand.' Compare this with Solomon's observation, I saw the wicked buried, who had come and gone from the place of the holy, and they were forgotten.

III. He foresees their fall, however, and that their death, though they die in ease and honor, will be their ruin, v. 23. Though He keep silence, and seem to connive at them, yet God notices, and keeps account of, all their wickedness; and will make it to appear shortly, that their most secret sins, which they thought no eye should see, (v. 15.) were under his eye, and will be called over again. Here is no mention of the punishment of such a sinner in the other world, but it is intimated in the particular notice taken of the consequences of his death. They that durst not give him his due character while he lived, shall not spare him when he is dead; so that the womb that bare him, his own mother, shall forget him, i. e. shall avoid making mention of him, and shall think that the greatest kindness she can do him, since no good can be said of him. Honor got by sin will soon turn into shame. The wickedness they thought to establish in their families, shall be broken as a tree; all their wicked projects shall be blasted, and all their wicked hopes dashed and buried with them. Job owns that wicked people will be miserable at last, miserable on the other side death, but utterly denies what his friends asserted, that they are, usually, miserable in this life.

Lastly, He concludes with a bold challenge to all present, to disprove what he had said, if they could, v. 25. That, indeed, which is false, is nothing worth; where there is not truth, how can there be goodness? They that speak the words of truth and soberness, need not fear a fair examination.

CHAP. XXV. V. 1—6. Bildad here makes a very short reply to Job's last discourse, as one that began to be tired of the cause. He drops the main question concerning the prosperity of wicked men, as being unable to answer the proofs Job had produced in the foregoing chapter: but, because he thought Job had made too bold with the Divine Majesty in his appeals to the divine tribunal, (ch. 23:) he, in a few words, shows the infinite distance there is between God and man, teaching us to think highly and honorably of God, and humbly of ourselves; which, however misapplied to Job, are two good lessons for us all to learn.

1. Perhaps, indeed, he and the rest perceived Job and they did not differ so much as they thought: they owned wicked people might prosper awhile, and Job owned they would be destroyed at last; how little then the difference! If disputants would understand one another better, perhaps they would find themselves nearer one another than they imagined. If we would all get our hearts filled with awful thoughts of God, and humble thoughts of ourselves, we should not be so apt as we are to fall out about matters of doubtful disputation, which are trifling or intricate.

2. Man, by reason of his actual transgressions, is obnoxious to God's justice, and cannot in himself be justified before Him: he can neither plead Not guilty, nor plead any merit of his own to balance or extenuate his guilt. The Scripture has concluded all under sin. Man, by reason of his original corruption, as he is born of a woman, is odious to God's holiness, and cannot be clean in his sight. God sees his impurity, and it is certain that by it he is rendered utterly unfit for communion and fellowship with God in grace here, and for the vision and fruition of Him in glory hereafter. We have need, therefore, to be born again of water and of the Holy Ghost, and to be bathed again and again in the blood of Christ, that fountain opened.

3. Let us wonder at God's condescension, in taking such worms as we are into covenant and communion with Himself, especially at the condescension of the Son of God, in emptying Himself so far as to say, I am a worm, and no man, Ps. 22: 6.

CHAP. XXVI. This is Job's short reply to Bildad's short discourse. So far from contradicting him, he confirms what he had said, and outdoes him in magnifying God, and setting forth his power, to show what reason he had still to say as he did, (ch. 13: 2.) What ye know, the same do I know also.

V. 1—4. One would not have thought Job, now that he was in so much pain and misery, could have bantered his friend as he does here, and made himself merry with the impertinency of his discourse. Bildad thought he had made a fine speech, that the matter was so weighty, and the language so fine, that he had gained the reputation both of an oracle and of an orator; but Job, peevishly enough, shows that his performance was not so valuable.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

CH. XXIV. In prospect of the judgment, we should neither be stumbled and distressed at witnessing the prosperity of the wicked, nor discouraged if we share the troubles of the righteous.—The history of all ages and nations proclaims the desperate wickedness of the human heart. . . . But who can express the crimes that have been committed, or the miseries which have been occasioned, by this inordinate self-love! Yet the cries of the oppressed are not overlooked. They enter into 'the ears of the LORD of hosts,' who is their Patron; and who will at length show before the whole world, that it is most dangerous to injure those, who are least able to defend themselves. But, 'because sentence is not executed speedily,' they proceed, and encourage one another; and the earth continues full of violence and misery in multiplied and varied forms. SCOTT.

CH. XXV. It is better to avoid controversy, or to put an end to it, when we do not speedily come to an agreement; and to converse on such subjects, as all allow to be true and important.—The pious should be careful not to quarrel with each other, not to envy the wicked, and not to faint in tribulation.—If duly influenced by reverential fear of God, we should submit to his sovereignty, do his will, seek his glory, and rejoice in his favor, in peace and harmony, and without murmuring and disputing; even as the angels in heaven.—It is very important, that we should be convinced, that we are mean, guilty, and polluted: and the most important question which can possibly be asked, though often least attended to, is this, 'How can man be justified with God? or he be pure, who is born of a woman?' (9: 1—3. 15: 14—16.) But the most atrocious sinners, when humbled before God, and disposed to accept of his salvation, may be 'justified by faith,' made holy by divine grace, and exalted to glory in heaven.—Our vileness will thus commend his condescension and love; and the riches of his mercy, and the power of his grace, will be magnified in every redeemed inner, to all eternity. SCOTT.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXV. V. 1—6. Job's appeal to undeniable facts, seems to have reduced his opponents to great difficulties. They were not convinced of their error; but they could not answer his arguments. Bildad, therefore, spoke but few words in reply; Zophar did not answer the third time; and Eliphaz declined leading on another attack. Bildad, however, thought Job had spoken without a proper reverence of God, or a due sense of his own meanness and sinfulness. Perhaps Bildad intimated that his very birth, amidst the sorrows and pains of his mother, proved him born in sin, and a fallen creature. SCOTT.

unable as he thought it, and ridicules him for it: showing,

1. That there was no great matter to be found in it, v. 3. This is spoken ironically. Bildad thought he had spoken very clearly, and declared the thing as it is. He was very fond (as we are all apt to be) of his own notions, and thought all other notions of the thing were false, mistaken, and confused; whereas, when we speak of the glory of God, we cannot declare the thing as it is; for we see it through a glass darkly, or but by reflection, and shall not see Him as He is, till we come to heaven. Here, as in ch. 37: 19. Job shows him, we cannot order our speech concerning Him. He thought he had spoken very fully, though in few words; but, alas! it was but poorly and scantily that he declared it, in comparison with the vast compass and copiousness of the subject.

2. That there was no great use to be made of it, v. 2. How hast thou, with all this mighty flourish, helped him that is without power? How hast thou, with thy grave dictates, v. 3. counselled him that has no wisdom? Job would convince him, (1.) That he had done God no service by it, nor made Him in the least beholden to him. It is indeed our duty, and will be our honor, to speak on God's behalf; but we must not think He needs our service, or is indebted to us for it; nor will He accept it, if it come from a spirit of contention and contradiction, and not from a sincere [love to God and] regard to his glory. (2.) That he had done his cause no service by it. He thought his friends mightily beholden to him, for helping them, at a dead lift, to make their part good against Job; even weak disputants, when warm, are apt to think truth more beholden to them than really it is. (3.) That he had done him no service by it. He pretended to convince, instruct, and comfort Job; but, alas! what he had said was so little to the purpose, that it would not avail to rectify any mistakes, nor to assist him either in bearing his afflictions, or in getting good by them, v. 4. 'Was it to me thou didst direct thy discourse? And dost thou take me for such a child as to need these instructions? Or dost thou think them proper for one in my condition?' Every thing that is true and good is not suitable and seasonable. To one humbled, broken, grieved in spirit, as Job was, he ought to have preached of the grace and mercy of God, rather than of his greatness and majesty; to have laid before him the consolations, rather than the terrors, of the Almighty. Christ knows how to speak what is proper for the weary; (Isa. 50: 4.) and his ministers should learn rightly to divide the Word of truth, and not make those sad, whom God would not have made sad; as Bildad did: therefore Job asks him, Whose spirit came from thee? i. e. 'What troubled soul would ever be revived, relieved, and brought to itself, by such discourses?' Thus are we often disappointed in our friends who should comfort us, but the Comforter, which is the Holy Ghost, never mistakes in his operations, nor misses of his end.

V. 5—14. The truth received great light from the dispute between Job and his friends, concerning those points about which they differed; but now how does truth triumph, and how bright it shines, when there appears no other strife between the contenders, than which shall speak most highly and honorably of God, and be most large in showing forth his praise! It were well if all disputes about matters of religion might end thus, in glorifying God as Lord of all, and our Lord, with one mind and one mouth; (Rom. 15: 6.) for to that we have all attained, in that we are all agreed. We shall see striking instances of omnipotence if,

1. We look about us, to the earth and waters here below. (1.) He hangs the earth upon nothing, v. 7. The art of man could not hang a feather on nothing, yet the Divine Wisdom hangs the whole earth so. It is poised by its own weight, so says the poet; it is upheld by the word of God's power, so says the apostle. (2.) He sets bounds to the waters of the sea, and compasses them in, (v. 10.) that they may not return to cover the earth; and these bounds shall continue unmoved, unshaken, unworn, till time shall be no more. The poor, sinful inhabitants of the earth, though obnoxious to his justice, and at his mercy, are thus preserved from being overwhelmed, as once, by a flood, and will continue to be so, because reserved unto fire. (3.) He forms dead things under the waters. Rephaim, giants, are formed under the waters, i. e. vast creatures, of prodigious bulk, as whales, giant-like creatures, among the innumerable inhabitants of the water. So Patrick. (4.) By mighty storms and tempests He shakes the mountains, here called the pillars of heaven, (v. 11.) and even divides the sea, and smites through its proud waves, v. 12. Those who think Job lived at, or after, the time of Moses, apply this to the dividing of the Red Sea before the children of Israel, and the drowning of the Egyptians in it. By his understanding he smiteth through Rahab, so the word is, and Rahab is often put for Egypt; as Ps. 87. 4 Isa. 51: 9.

2. If we consider hell beneath. By hell and destruction, (v. 6.) understand the grave, and those buried in it; they are under the eye of God, though out of our sight, which may strengthen our belief of the resurrection of the dead. God knows where to find, and whence to fetch, all the scattered atoms of the consumed body. We may also consider the to refute Job's doctrine; and therefore Job ironically admired the assistance, which Bildad had given to his friends in their extremity, and the instruction which he had afforded him in his perplexity. Surely, Bildad did not suppose his words to be the dictates of the Spirit of prophecy, or even the language of faith and grace; when it was evident, that he spake in his own spirit! SCOTT.

The word rephaim, tr. 'dead things,' may be rendered giants, or monsters. As there is no other reference to those events, [the dividing of the Red Sea, and the destruction of Egypt,] as this is ambiguous, and as probably Job lived before that time; it probably refers to the general operations of the power of God.—Yea, the devil, who is subtle and poisonous, and of whom the serpent is the constant emblem, was originally the creature of God, and is still absolutely under his power. (4.) We can hardly venture to assert, that Job had seen or heard of fossil remains in the bottoms of drained seas, or the bowels of harrowing rocks: but are strongly reminded of the discoveries of modern geology; nor will the cut be much out of place beneath this text.

It is from Cuvier, and represents the plesiosaurus, (9½ to 20 ft. in length,) found in calcareous rock. Other giant fossils, indicating animals of species extinct, it is thought, before man existed, measure, as is estimated from the parts found, the ichthyosaurus 25 ft. the megalosaurus from 25 to, probably, even 60 ft. in length! See Cuvier, 'Ossemens Fossiles.' 'Xenophanes (B. C. 400) was led to believe the eternity of the universe, by discovering the remains of marine animals imbedded in rocks, and under the surface of the earth.' Encyc. Am. An opinion anciently prevailed that the Titans (enormous giants) rebelled against the gods, and were buried by mountains cast upon them. 'This v. is thus rendered by the ancient versions. "Behold the giants, and those who dwell with them, groan from under the waters."' Vulg. "Can the trembling giants be regenerated, when they and their hosts are under the water?" Sept. "Behold the giants are slain, and are drawn out of the water." Syr. and Arab.' Dr. A. Clarke. Moses states, there were nephalim before the flood; this word has been translated giants; and Job, says Dr. A. Clarke, 'probably alludes to the deluge,' whose waters would, of course, carry off the dead and bury them, which may account for but few human fossils being found even in diluvial formations. Qu? Have not the fossil remains discovered of old, been (from ignorance of comparative anatomy) attributed to giants (as in modern times), and have they not given rise to the fabulous giants of the poets? 'I must refer the passage either to the antediluvians or to vast sea monsters, such as porpoises, sharks, whales, &c.' Dr. A. Clarke. 'The shades of the heroes of former times, the gigantic spectres, the mighty or enormous dead are meant.' Good. ROSENM. tr. 'Manes ipsi tremunt inferius, aquæ sub terra pariter tremunt, et incolæ earum. "The inhabitants themselves of the shades tremble, below, the waters under the earth likewise tremble, and their inhabitants." Job here uses a poetical form of speech, and says, that the depths of Ocean and Tartarus (which the vulgar opinion places in the very marrow of the earth below Oceanus), the abode of the manes, and souls, are observed throughout by the eye of the Deity, and tremble at his presence. grave as the place of the damned, where the separate souls of the wicked are in misery and torment. That is hell and destruction, which are said to be before the Lord, (Prov. 15: 11.) and here to be naked before Him; to which it is probable there is an allusion, (Rev. 14: 10.) where sinners are said to be tormented in the presence of the holy angels, (who attended the Shechinah,) and in the presence of the Lamb. And this may give light to v. 5. which some ancient versions read thus; (and I think more agreeable to the signification of the word Rephaim;) Behold, the giants groan under the waters, and those that dwell with them; and then follows, Hell is naked before Him, typified by the drowning of the giants of the old world; so the learned J. Mede understands it, and with it illustrates Prov. 21: 16. where hell is called the congregation of the dead; the same word here used, and which he would there render the congregation of the giants, in allusion to the drowning of the sinners of the old world. And is there any thing in which the majesty of God appears more dreadful, than in the eternal ruin of the ungodly, and the groans of the inhabitants of the land of darkness? Those that will not with angels fear and worship, shall for ever with devils fear and tremble, and God therein will be glorified.

3. If we look up to heaven above. (1.) God stretches out the north over the empty place, v. 7. So at first, He stretched out the heavens like a curtain, (Ps. 104: 2.) and still continues to keep them stretched out, and will till the general conflagration, when they shall be rolled together as a scroll, Rev. 6: 14. He mentions the north, because his country (as ours) lay in the northern hemisphere; and the air is the empty place over which it is stretched out. See Ps. 89: 12. What an empty place is this world, in comparison with the other! (2.) He keeps the waters that are said to be above the firmament from pouring down on the earth, as once they did; (v. 8.) He binds up the waters in his thick clouds, as if they were tied close in a bag, till there is occasion to use them; and, notwithstanding the vast weight of water so raised and laid up, yet the cloud is not rent under them, for then they would burst, and pour out as a spout; but they do, as it were, distil through the cloud, and so come drop by drop, in mercy to the earth, in small rain, or great rain, as He pleases. (3.) He conceals the glory of the upper world, the dazzling lustre of which we poor mortals could not bear; (v. 9.) He holds back the face of his throne, that light in which He dwells, and spreads a cloud upon it, through which He judges, ch. 22: 13. God will have us to live by faith, not by sense; for this is agreeable to a state of probation. (4.) The bright ornaments of heaven are the work of his hands; (v. 13.) By his Spirit, the eternal Spirit that moved on the face of the waters, the breath of his mouth, (Ps. 33: 6.) He has garnished the heavens, not only made them, but beautified them, has curiously bespangled them with stars by night, and painted them with the light of the sun by day God, having made man to look upward, has therefore garnished the heavens, to invite him to look upward, that, by pleasing his eye with the dazzling light of the sun, and the sparkling light of the stars, their number, order, and various magnitudes, which, as so many golden studs, beautify the canopy drawn over our heads, he may be led to admire the great Creator, the Father and Fountain of lights, and to say, 'If the pavement be so richly inlaid, what must the palace be! If the visible heavens be so glorious, what are those that are out of sight!' What is meant here by the crooked serpent is not certain. The milky-way, say some; some particular constellation, so called, say others. It is the same word used for leviathan, (Isa. 27: 1.) and, probably, may be meant of the whale or crocodile, in which appears much of the power of the Creator; and why may not Job conclude with that inference, when God Himself does so? ch. 41.

He concludes, at last, with an awful et cætera; v. 14. Even the thunder of his power, i. e. his powerful thunder, one of the lowest of his ways here in our own region, we cannot understand: much less the utmost force and extent of his power. It is but a little portion that we hear and know of God in our present state. He is infinite and incomprehensible; our understandings and capacities are weak and shallow, and the full discoveries of the divine glory are reserved for the future state.

CHAP. XXVII. V. 1—6. Job's friends, either convinced he was right, or despairing of convincing him he was wrong, now gave up the cause. What Job had said (ch. 26.) was a sufficient answer to Bildad's discourse: and now he paused awhile to see whether Zophar would take his turn again; but he declining it, Job himself went on, and, without interruption or vexation, said all he desired. His discourse here is called a parable, (mashal,) the title of Solomon's proverbs, because grave, weighty, and very instructive; and he spake as one having authority. Its root signifies to rule, or have dominion; and some think it intimates, that Job now triumphed over his opponents We say of an excellent preacher, that he knows how to command his hearers. Job did so here, and, to end the strife, backs all he had said, in maintenance of his own integrity, with a solemn oath.

1. In his oath, v. 2. he first speaks highly of God, yet hardly, also, and unbecomingly, in saying He refused him justice in this controversy, and to appear in his defence; and that, by continuing his

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The most important truths may be introduced unseasonably; and be so misstated and misapplied, as to deceive instead of convincing, and to distress instead of encouraging.—But disputants are in great danger of aiming at victory more than improvement: this produces mutual contempt and reciprocal boastings and revilings; and what seems to one party pregnant with instruction, decisive, and 'fully declaring the thing as it is,' is often treated with ridicule by the other. It is well, however, when all parties agree to celebrate the praises of the LORD, and to extol his works: yet the effusions of passion, or ostentation, may be mistaken for the dictates of those holy affections, which come from the Spirit of God.—But wherever we turn our eyes, we may perceive the power, the wisdom, and the goodness of God.—But in redemption all the other wonderful works of God are eclipsed: hither we may draw near, and hear of his glory without dismay; we may come and taste of his grace, and learn to love Him and walk with delight in his ways: here we may contemplate the divine character to advantage; and adore the depths which we cannot comprehend, with the joyful expectation of at length 'seeing Him as He is,' and [becoming] for ever like Him in purity and felicity. It is not strange that its restless waves, seemingly instinct with life, were and are still worshipped and propitiated as a god. The allusion to the heavens before, leaves us in no doubt that it is the constellation Draco, between the two bears, which has plainly a tortuous figure like a serpent. It has 8 circular folds, and its tail like a beam separates the great and the little bear. The Arabs call this constellation chayyal, the serpent, and tanim, the dragon. Virgil speaks of it as 'the sinuous snake,' the 'resplendent snake.' Rosenm. The crooked serpent-worship extended over the whole world. Comp. the sculptures of Egypt, India, and Mexico, with the serpent-shaped temples (dracontia) at Abury, Carnac, &c. in W. Europe, in which sun-worship and serpent-worship were blended. Some suppose Job referred to the Sabian idolatry, as Moses did. Notes, (a) (b) Introd. p. 10, vol. I. Others suppose (but it seems forced) an allusion to the ecliptic. It is a natural supposition, that Job here speaks of the smallest as well as grandest objects in nature, as showing the power of Him, 'Who gives its lustre to the insect's wing, And wheels his throne upon the rolling worlds!' The Heb. is nachash barih; may this then possibly mean the fugitive worm, who timidly hides himself from our sight, shrinking into the soil? ED.

troubles, on which his friends grounded their censures, He had taken away the opportunity he hoped ere now to have of clearing himself. Elihu reproved him for this word; (ch. 34: 5.) for God is righteous in all his ways, and takes away no man's judgment. But see how apt we are to despair of favor, if not showed us immediately; so poor spirited are we, and so soon weary of waiting God's time. He also charges it on God, that He had vexed his soul; not only not appeared for him, but had appeared against him, and, by such grievous afflictions, had quite imbittered his life. We, by impatience, vex our own souls, and then complain of God that He has vexed them. Yet see Job's confidence in the goodness both of his cause and God; that, though God seemed angry, and to act against him, for the present, he could cheerfully commit his cause to Him.

2. The matter of his oath, v. 3, 4. He resolved not to speak wickedness, nor utter deceit; and would adhere to this resolution as long as he lived, v. 3. Our resolutions against sin should be thus constant, resolutions for life: in things doubtful and indifferent, it is not safe to be thus peremptory; we know not what reason we may see to change our mind; but in so plain a thing as this, we cannot be too positive, that we will never speak wickedness. Something of a reason for his resolution is here implied—that our breath will not be always in us. Our breath is called the spirit of God, because He breathed it into us; and that is another reason, God gives us life and breath; therefore, while we have breath, we must praise Him.

3. The explication of his oath, v. 5, 6. Job here thinks of dying, and the best preparative for death, is, perseverance to death in our integrity. 'Until I die,' i. e. 'though I die by this affliction.' It has often been the lot of upright men to be censured and condemned as hypocrites; but it well becomes them to bear up boldly against such censures, Heb. 13: 18. To resolve that our hearts shall not reproach us, when we give them cause to do so, is to affront God, whose deputy conscience is, and to wrong ourselves; for it is a good thing, when a man has sinned, to have a heart within him to smite him for it, 2 Sam. 24: 10. But to resolve that our hearts shall not reproach us, while we still hold fast our integrity, is to baffle the designs of the evil spirit, (who tempts good Christians to question their adoption, If thou be the Son of God,) and to concur with the operations of the good Spirit, who witnesses to their adoption.

V. 7—10. 1. Job, having solemnly protested the satisfaction he had in his integrity, for the further clearing of himself, here expresses the dread he had of being found a hypocrite, v. 7. Let mine enemy be as the wicked; a proverbial expression, like that, (Dan. 4: 19.) The dream be to them that hate thee. Job was so far from indulging himself in any wicked way, and flattering himself in it, that, if he might wish the greatest evil he could think of to the worst enemy he had in the world, he would wish him the portion of a wicked man, knowing that worse he could not wish him. Not that we may lawfully wish any man to be wicked, or that any man who is not wicked should be treated as wicked; but we should all choose to be in the condition of a beggar, an outlaw, a galley-slave, any thing, rather than in the condition of the wicked, though in ever so much pomp and outward prosperity.

2. He gives his reasons, v. 8, 9. Job here concurs with Bildad, (ch. 8: 13, 14.) and Zophar, (ch. 11: 20.) and reads the death of the hypocrite's hope with as much assurance. (1.) The hypocrite has gained, and he has hope; this is his bright side; it is allowed he has gained by his hypocrisy, gained praise, applause, and wealth. Jehu gained a kingdom by his hypocrisy, and the Pharisees many a widow's house. But the wealth of this world, he hoped in, he must leave behind him, Ps. 49: 17. The happiness of the other world, he hoped for, he will certainly miss of. So that, on the whole, it is certain, a formal hypocrite, with all his gains, and all his hopes, will be miserable in a dying hour. (2.) Troubles will come, and he will cry to God; and pray earnestly. But, God has told us He will not hear the prayers of those who regard iniquity in their hearts, (Ps. 66: 18.) and set up their idols there, (Ezek. 14: 4.) nor of those who turn away their ear from hearing the law, Prov. 28: 9. Get you to the gods whom ye have served, Judg. 10: 14. In the judgment to come, it is certain, God will not hear the cry of those who lived and died in their hypocrisy. Their doleful lamentations will all be unpitied; I will laugh at your calamity. Their importunate petitions will all be thrown out, and their pleas rejected. Inflexible justice cannot be biassed, nor the irreversible sentence revoked. See Matt. 7: 22, 23. Luke 13: 26. and the case of the foolish virgins, Matt. 25: 11. (3.) The hypocrite's religion is neither comfortable nor constant, v. 10. In prosperity he will not call upon God, but slight Him; in adversity, he will not call upon God, but curse Him; he is weary of his religion, when he gets nothing by it, or is in danger of losing. Note, Those are hypocrites, who, though they profess religion, neither take pleasure, nor persevere in it; who reckon their religion a task, a drudgery, a weariness; who make use of it only to serve a turn, and lay it aside when the turn is served; who will call upon God while it is in fashion, or while the pang of devotion lasts, but leave it off when they fall into other company, or when the fit is over. The more comfort we find in our religion, the more closely we shall cleave to it. Those who have no delight in God, are easily inveigled by the pleasures of sense, and so drawn away from their religion; easily run down by crosses, and so driven away, and will not always call upon God.

V. 11—23. Job's friends had seen a great deal of the misery and destruction that attend wicked people, especially oppressors; and Job, while the heat of disputation lasted, had said as much, and with as much assurance, of their prosperity; but now, that heat was nearly over, he was willing to own how far he agreed with them, and where the difference between his opinion and theirs lay. 1. He agreed, that wicked people are miserable; and one time or other, one way or other, God will surely reckon with them. This truth is abundantly confirmed by the entire concurrence even of these angry disputants. But, 2. In this they differed. They held that these deserved judgments are presently and visibly brought on wicked oppressors; so Eliphaz, (ch. 15: 20, 21, 29, 32.) so Bildad, (ch. 18: 7, 11.) so Zophar, ch. 20: 15, 22. Now Job held that, in many cases, judgments do not fall on them quickly, but are deferred for some time. That vengeance strikes slowly, he had already showed; (chs. 21 and 24.) now he comes to show that it strikes surely and severely, and that reprieves are no pardons.

I. Job here undertakes to set this matter in a true light, v. 11, 12. He would teach 'That which is with the Almighty,' i. e. 'the counsels and purposes of God, and the usual methods of his providence concerning them:' This he would teach; By the hand of God, i. e. by his strength and assistance. Those who undertake to teach others, must look to the hand of God to direct them, to

By the powerful teaching of God, Job purposed to explain this subject to his friends; nor would he conceal any thing, which he looked upon as a part of the truth. He thought even they must acknowledge, that the wicked sometimes prosper, even to the end of life, of which they had all seen many instances. Why then did they answer so vainly? Did they take a pleasure in misinterpreting, contradicting, and condemning his discourse? SCOTT.

CHAP. XXVIII.

Job shows that man is industrious and ingenious, in searching out the treasures hid in the earth, 1—11. But the more valuable treasure, of the knowledge of God, lies beyond his reach, 12—22. God alone comprehends it; and man's wisdom is to fear God, and depart from evil, 23—28.

open their ear, (Isa. 50: 4.) and to open their lips. Those whom God teaches with a strong hand, are best able to teach others, Isa. 8: 11. They had reason to learn those things he was about to teach, v. 12. Truth, rightly understood and applied, would cure us of that vanity of mind which arises from our mistakes.

That particularly which he offers now to lay before them, is, the portion of a wicked man with God, particularly of oppressors, v. 13. Compare ch. 20: 29. In the world it may be wealth and preferment, but with God ruin and misery.

II. He does it, by showing that wicked people may, in some instances, prosper, but that ruin follows them in those very instances; and that is their portion, their heritage, that which they must abide by.

1. They may prosper in their children, but the more [ill-nurtured] children they leave, and the greater prosperity they leave them in, the more and the fairer marks do they leave for the arrows of God's judgments to be levelled at: his three sore judgments, sword, famine, and pestilence, 2 Sam. 24: 13. They brought them up to live by their sword, as Esau; and those that do so, commonly die by the sword, first or last: or they die by the sword of justice for their crimes, or of the murderer for their estates. Others of them shall be so needy, as not to have a competency of necessary food, v. 14. and so greedy, or discontented, that what they have they shall not be satisfied with, because not so much, or not so dainty, as they have been used to. Hag. 1: 6. Those that remain shall be buried in death, i. e. shall die of the plague, called death, (Rev. 6: 8.) and be buried privately and in haste, without solemnity; and even their widows shall not weep; shall not have wherewithal to put them in mourning. Or, these wicked men, as they live undesired, so they die unlamented, and even their widows will think themselves happily rid of them.

2. They may prosper in their estates, but ruin attends them too, v. 16—18. (1.) Suppose them to be rich in money, plate, clothing, and furniture; they have heaps of clothes, as plentiful as heaps of clay; or such abundance of clothes, that they are even a burden to them; they lade themselves with thick clay, Hab. 2: 6. See what is the care and business of worldly people—To heap up worldly wealth. Much would have more. But what comes of it? He shall never be the better for it himself. Nay, God will so order it, that the just shall wear his raiment, and the innocent divide his silver: some way or other, good men shall come honestly by that wealth the wicked man came dishonestly by. The wealth of the sinner is laid up for the just. God disposes of men's estates as He pleases, and often makes their wills, against their will. The Egyptians' jewels were the Israelites' pay. Solomon observes, (Eccl. 2: 26.) God makes the sinners drudges to the righteous. When God enriches good men, they must remember they are but stewards, and must give an account. What bad men bring a curse on their families with the ill-getting of, good men bring a blessing on their families with the well-using of. He that by unjust gain increaseth his substance, shall gather it for him that will pity the poor. (2.) Suppose them to have built them strong and stately houses; but they are like the house which the moth makes for herself in an old garment, out of which she will soon be shaken, v. 18. He is very secure in it, as a moth, and has no apprehension of danger: but it will prove of as short continuance as a booth, quickly taken down and gone.

3. Destruction attends their persons, though they lived long in health, and at ease, v. 19. He does not sleep so contentedly as people think he does. He lies down, but his abundance will not suffer him to sleep, at least not so sweetly as the laboring man. He lies down, but his cares increase his fears, and both together make him uneasy.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

We may safely make our appeal to God, when we are conscious of integrity before Him, and are fairly called to it: but we are so apt to mix corrupt passions with our best services, to mistake delays for denials, and corrections for vexations, and to speak irreverently or impatiently when afflicted; that, without continual applications of the blood of sprinkling, we cannot possibly have any well grounded confidence before God.—As we ought not, without scriptural evidence, to conclude that we are in the way of salvation, so we should not be induced to condemn ourselves as hypocrites, if conscious that we trust in his mercy, and aim to do his will; nor should we justify those who censoriously condemn their brethren. A good conscience on evangelical principles, and a watchful opposition to sin, will prevent our own hearts from reproaching us, and inspire confidence in God, in the midst of afflictions and calumnies, and in the hour of death: and this we should hold fast as long as we live.—No greater misery can be imprecated, than the doom of the most prosperous sinner; no more dreadful case imagined, than that of the successful, specious hypocrite. SCOTT.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXVIII. V. 1—11. Job had maintained, that the dispensations of Providence were not regulated on such principles as his friends contended for; but by a higher and incomprehensible wisdom: and to illustrate and confirm this, he here showed, that the sagacity of men was chiefly competent for natural things, and employed in them; it could not therefore be supposed they were acquainted with the deep counsels of God. This book is beyond all reasonable doubt, one of the most ancient in the world; yet the art of mining, and refining metals, and the use of precious stones, are spoken of as things well known in the east, where Job and his friends dwelt. [Note, end of 2 Chr.] But very many ages after, populous nations have been found, which were little acquainted with these things: the iron especially, (which is in fact the most useful of all metals,) seems to have been little known, or employed among the Greeks, in the very early ages of that nation; [though the ancient Egyptians, see Wilkinson, used it;] and it was totally unknown in America, when that continent was first discovered. So that the most ancient times appear to have been far more civilized, and acquainted with things useful, than subsequent ages: and barbarous ignorance seems to have prevailed gradually; as the knowledge possessed by the antediluvians, and doubtless communicated by Noah and his sons, was forgotten among their posterity. The Bible by no means favors the general notion, that the first ages of the world were the most rude and savage; nay, indeed, the accounts there given are totally inconsistent with it. SCOTT.

construction, and establish his own conclusions.—The chief difference between this passage, and the discourses of Job's friends on the same subject, is this:—they spoke of the misery of wicked men before and at their death, as uniformly proportioned to their crimes: Job intimated that it might be so; but if not, the consequence of their death would assuredly be dreadful. SCOTT.

(13.) Kennicott supposes, that some such phrase as 'then answered Zophar, the Naamathite, and said,' is omitted here: and that the last 11 vs. of this ch. are not the words of Job, but the 3d speech of Zophar in regular course. See Noyes. ED.

CHAP. XXVIII. The strain of this ch. is very unlike the rest of this book. Job forgets his sores, and all his sorrows, and talks like a philosopher, or a virtuoso. Here is a great deal both of natural philosophy and moral in this discourse; but how does it come here? Doubtless, it was not merely for an amusement, or diversion from the controversy; though, if it had been only so, perhaps it had not been much amiss. When disputes grow hot, better lose the question than lose our temper. But this is pertinent, and to the business in hand. Job and his friends had been discoursing about the dispensations of Providence toward the wicked and the righteous. Job had showed that some wicked men live and die in prosperity, while others are presently and openly arrested by the judgments of God. But, if any ask the reason why some are punished in this world, and not others, they must be told it is a question that cannot be resolved. The knowledge of the reasons of state, in God's government of the world, is kept from us, and we must neither pretend to it, nor reach after it. Zophar had wished God would show Job the secrets of wisdom, ch. 11: 6. No, says Job, secret things belong not to us, but things revealed, Deut. 29: 29. Our inquiries into the former must be checked, into the latter must be quickened, for that is our concern.

V. 1—11. Here Job shows how far the wit of man may go, into the depths of nature, seizing the riches of it; what great knowledge and wealth men may, by ingenious and industrious searches, make themselves masters of. But does it therefore follow that men may, by their wit, comprehend the reasons why some wicked people prosper, and others are punished, why some good people prosper, and others are afflicted? By no means. The caverns of the earth may be discovered, but not the counsels of heaven.

1. The wealth of this world is hid in the earth. Iron and brass, the less costly, but more serviceable metals, are taken out of the earth, (v. 2.) and are there found in great abundance, which abates their price indeed, but is a great kindness to man, who could much better be without gold than without iron. Nay, out of the earth comes bread, i. e. bread-corn, the necessary support of life, v. 5. Under it is turned up as it were fire; precious stones, that sparkle as fire; brimstone, that is apt to take fire; coal, that is proper to feed fire. As we have our food, so we have our fuel, cut out of the earth There the sapphires and other gems are, and thence gold-dust is digged up, v. 6.

2. This wealth is hard to be found; there is but here and there a vein for the silver, v. 1. The precious stones, [in their rough state,] because buried in obscurity and out of sight, are called stones of darkness, and the shadow of death. Men may search long before they light on them; must, with their lamps, set an end to darkness, and if one expedient fail, try another, till they have searched out all perfection, and turned every stone to effect it, v. 3. They must grapple with subterraneous waters, (v. 4, 10, 11.) and force their way through rocks which are, as it were, the roots of the mountains, v. 9. God has made the getting of gold, silver, and precious stones, so difficult, (1.) To excite and engage industry. If valuable things were too easily come by, men would never learn to take pains. (2.) To check pomp and luxury. What is for necessity is had with a little labor from the surface of the earth; but what is for pride must be dug with a great deal of pains out of the bowels of it. To be fed is cheap, but to be fine is chargeable.

3. Though so hard to come by, yet men will have it: and so search out all perfection, v. 3. arts

(1—12.) Commentators, in general, refer all these vs. to the works of man alone. ED.

(2.) Many tr. 'and the stone pours out brass,' and some seem to refer it to the making of brass, by adding the lapis calaminaris to copper: but Rosenm. tr. eben nechushah, copper stone, as qeseth-nechusah is tr. brass or copper bow, 2 Sam. 22:5. Thus the phrase would mean melts the copper ore to obtain the metal. So Jerome tr. 'and the stone melted by heat is turned to copper (æs);' and the Syr. 'and from stones æs is poured or melted.' Pliny says æs is made ex lapide æroso, called cadmia; and stones are melted by fire into æs. Native copper is found in the veins of primitive rocks, and of the older secondary. The sulphurets of copper are the ores from which copper is usually extracted. The ore is roasted by a low heat, in a furnace with flues, in which the sulphur that is volatilized is collected. The remaining ore is then smelted in contact with the fuel. The very ancient metal bronze, is an alloy of copper, with about 8 or 10 per cent. of tin. Bell-metal has 20 per cent. of tin. Brass (the best) has 4 parts of copper to 1 of zinc. Brass was well known to the Romans under the name orichalcum. See Enc. Am. ID.

(3.) Out all perfection.] Most render 'to the utmost limit.' ID.

(4.) Most commentators refer all the vs. 1—11. to mining operations, but find difficulty in agreeing on the sense of much of it. The following remarks of Roberts induce the belief, that the immense hydraulic monuments of ancient art are also referred to here, in describing the enterprise and power of man. Fortunately, the learned translators of our version, having no theory to support, have kept near to the Heb. which diminishes many difficulties; occasioned perhaps by Job's describing several kinds of the triumphs of art, as mining, canalling, irrigation, &c. together; and some add navigation. 'Moeris (k. of Egypt) made the lake Moeris, 450 miles in circumf. and in some places 300 ft. deep, with 2 pyramids in the middle 200 cubits above and as many beneath the water. It communicates by a secret channel (v. 7.) with the Nile: for 6 months the lake empties itself into the Nile, and the remaining 6 the Nile supplies the lake. Herod. Strabo, Diod: Sic. Pliny, M. Savary. Moeris cut a canal 40 leagues long and 300 ft. wide, in many places through the rock, (v. 10.) to introduce the waters of the Nile into a vast basin, (formed by a chain of mountains stretching from the Nile at Fayoom, towards Lybia, and returning E. again to the Nile,) once but a sandy desert; 2 other canals with sluices rendered the lake useful to agriculture; and it relieved Egypt of superfluous waters; which when needed were let out to produce a second fertilizing inundation directed at will. Fearful this artificial sea might break its bounds, a canal was cut through the mountain, discharging the superfluous waters among the Lybian sands. History knows not a work so glorious, nor is it wonderful that antiquity esteems it above the pyramids and labyrinth; for with the grandeur of the enterprise, it included the happiness of the people.

'Abd-Shems (i. e. servant of the sun, comp. 31:27.), 3d in descent from Joktan son of Eber, (Gen. 10:25.) and surnamed Saba, having built the city Saba, afterwards called Marab, in Arabia Felix, made a vast dam, to serve as a basin or reservoir for the water which came down from the mountains, not only for irrigation, but distributed by aqueducts for drink, &c. This building stood like a mountain above the city (v. 11.), the water rising to 120 ft.; and so strong was the work, the inhabitants confidently built their houses upon it. At length God, highly displeased at their great pride, to humble them, sent a flood, (v. 4.) which broke down the mound (30:14.) by night, while the inhabitants slept, [34: 20.] and carried away the whole city, (Ps. 15:4.) with the neighboring towns and people (27:20, &c.): so that "they are gone and scattered like Saba," became a proverb. See Sale: Prel. Disc. to Koran. Prideaux, Lowth.

'Heber speaks of a tank in India, made by damming the gore of a large valley, as 4 miles (and during the rains, 6) in circumf. sufficient in industrious hands to give fertility (v. 5.) to a neighborhood. The artificial lakes of India are superintended by English engineers. The largest is 30 miles in circumf.; the largest dam is of stone, 54 ft. high, 130 broad at the base, and 30 at the top: another is 12 miles in length, 30 ft. in height, 120 ft. at base, and 24 at top. In every village is a man whose duty it is to distribute the water. The largest agricultural canal is 54 miles in length. A great many tanks are formed by uniting two hills, thus stopping the stream between. The artificial lakes of Ceylon are also of astonishing magnitude, and made of stones (v. 6.) of great size: (v. 9.) Tunnels (v. 7.) are made at the base of the mounds, with sluice gates. Comp. Deut. 8:7. 2 Sam. 5:20. 2 K. 18:17. 20:20, &c.' ROBERTS. ED.

Inhabitant.] From their fountains, or localities, so some. Forgotten of the foot.] Some refer this and the rest of the v. to the manner of mining; being let down into the shaft, miners dangle in the air, far from the usual walks of life, or crawling upon the knees, &c. so that there is little use for the foot. Others, as Good, understand, the metal is taken from ores which before were of so little value as to be trodden carelessly under foot. Roberts refers the phrase to waters broken out and lost in the desert, or sands, as in the case of those superabundant waters let from the great Moeris lake into the Lybian desert: 'the feet of men in walking where they were, think of them no more.' The phrase seems still to need explanation. Hewlett suggests the rendering, 'flood forgetting its course.' Noyes tr. 'from the foot of the mountain they open a passage, unsupported of the feet they descend, they move away from men.' ID.

(5.) Under it is turned up as it were fire.] 'As it were by fire,' pierced and excavated, as volcanic regions are by the action of fire. Castalio, and Rosenm. Good tr. 'but below windeth a fiery region.' The Chal. has 'and under which is Gehenna.' The Vulg. has 'The land from which bread has been produced has been destroyed by fire!'

and engines, to dry up and carry off the waters, when they break in upon their mines, v. 4. pumps, pipes, and canals, to clear their way; and, obstacles being removed, they tread the path no fowl knoweth, (v. 7, 8.) unseen by the vulture's eye, piercing and quick-sighted, untrodden by the lion's whelps, which traverse all the paths of the wilderness, to obtain it. They work their painful way through the rocks, and undermine the mountains, v. 10. have their lives in their hands, (v. 11.) and are continually in danger of being suffocated by damps, or crushed or buried alive by the fall of the earth. But, what carries men through all this toil and peril? v. 10. Silver and gold are precious things with them; these they have in their eye; they fancy them glittering before their faces, and, in prospect of laying hold on them, make nothing of all these difficulties; that which is hid bringeth he forth to light, v. 11. What was hid under ground, is laid on the bank; the metal hid in the ore, is refined from its dross, and brought forth pure out of the furnace; and then he thinks his pains well bestowed. Go to the miners, then, thou sluggard in religion, consider their ways, and be wise. Let their courage, diligence, and constancy in seeking the wealth that perisheth, shame us out of slothfulness and faint-heartedness in laboring for the true riches. How much better to get wisdom than gold! How much easier and safer! Yet gold is sought for, but grace neglected. Will the hopes of precious things out of the earth, (so they call them, though really paltry and perishing,) be such a spur to industry, and shall not the certain prospect of truly precious things in heaven be much more so?

V. 12—19. Job, having spoken of the wealth of the world, which men put such a value on, and take so much pains for, here comes to speak of another more valuable jewel, and that is, wisdom and understanding, the knowing and enjoying of God and ourselves. They that found out all those ways and means to enrich themselves, thought themselves very wise; but Job will not own that to be wisdom, and still asks, Where is wisdom? We must seek it elsewhere, and it will be found nowhere but in the principles and practices of religion. There is more true knowledge, satisfaction, and happiness, in sound divinity, which shows us the way to the joys of heaven, than in [that] natural philosophy, or [those] mathematics, which help us [only] to find a way into the bowels of the earth.

Gold is another's, wisdom our own; gold is for the body and time, wisdom for the soul and eternity. Let what is most precious in God's account, be so in ours. See Prov. 3: 14, &c. Let us ask after that only true wisdom which best improves our faculties, and best secures our spiritual and eternal welfare. Prov. 2: 3, 4.

Job asks it, as one that utterly despaired of finding wisdom any where but in God, and any way but by divine revelation, v. 13. We cannot attain to a right understanding of God and his will, of ourselves, and our duty, and interest, but by reading God's book and the men of God. Such is the degeneracy of human nature, that there is no true wisdom to be found with any but those who are born again, and who, through grace, partake of the divine nature. Men more easily break through difficulties in getting worldly wealth, than in getting heavenly wisdom; and will take more pains to learn how to live in this world, than for ever in a better. So blind and foolish is man become, that it is in vain to ask him, Where is the place of wisdom, and which the road to it?

V. 20—28. The question (v. 12.) he asks again here, as too worthy, too weighty, to be let fall; at length he comes to this issue; that there is a twofold wisdom; one hid in God, which is secret, and belongs not to us; the other made known by Him, and revealed to man, which belongs to us and to our children.

1. Let us then be content not to know the future events of Providence, until time discover them, (Acts 1: 7.) and not to know the secret reasons of Providence, until eternity discover them. Destruction and death say, We have heard the fame of it; cannot give an account of it ourselves; yet, have a little patience, 'and we will fetch thee shortly to a place where even this wisdom will be found.' When the mystery of God shall be finished, it will be laid open, and we shall know as we are known; when the veil of flesh is rent, and the interposing clouds are scattered, John 13: 7.

2. Nothing sensible is to us more unaccountable than the wind; but God gives it out by weight, wisely ordering both from what point it shall blow, and with what strength. The waters of the sea, and the rain waters, He both weighs and measures; allotting the proportion of every tide and every shower: vapors go up, rains come down, air is condensed into water, water rarified into air: but the great God keeps [their component elements in the exact proportion requisite for man, animals and plants,] and sees that none of it be lost. Now if, in these things, Providence be so exact, how much more in dispensing frowns and favors, rewards and punishments, to the children of men, according to the rules of equity!

3. All events were, from eternity, designed and determined by an infallible prescience, and immutable decree, v. 26, 27. When He settled the course of nature, He foreordained all the operations of his government. Some make Job to speak, in v. 27. of wisdom as a person, and translate it, Then He saw her, and showed her, &c. so it is parallel with that of Solomon, concerning the essential Wisdom of the Father, the eternal Word, Prov. 8: 22, &c. Before the earth was, then was I by Him, John 1: 1, 2.

4. The knowledge of God's revealed will, is within our reach; level to our capacity, v. 28. Let it not be said, that, when God concealed his counsels from man, and forbade him that tree of knowledge, it was because He grudged him any thing that would contribute to his real bliss; no, He let him know as much as he was concerned to know, in order to his duty and happiness: but he must not think to be a privy-counsellor. He said to Adam, so some, plainly, it was not for him to amuse himself with over-curious searches into the mysteries of creation, he would find it neither possible nor profitable to do so. No less wisdom (says Abp. Tillotson) than that which made

Verses 12—19.

Job here maintained, that 'wisdom,' (or the knowledge of God, and his works and ways, which led to a prudent and holy practice, and might enable men to unravel the mysteries of Providence,) was far more difficult to be found, than the subterraneous treasures before spoken of. Several different words are used in the original for gold; which are supposed to denote, either the place from which it came, the manner in which it had been purified, or the form in which it was offered for sale, whether wrought or unwrought. The words also, rendered 'crystal,' 'onyx,' 'sapphire,' &c. are differently interpreted. SCOTT.

Verses 20—22.

As no wealth could purchase wisdom, so no creature could discover it. It was hid from the eyes of all living. Men of the greatest talents, who soared above the rest of mankind, as the fowls of the air above other creatures, could not, by all their speculations and discoveries, acquire wisdom. 'Destruction and death,' indeed, brought reports of it: and if men deeply thought on these solemn subjects, they might understand something of the reasons, for which the wicked were permitted to prosper; and the event would at length clear up difficulties, and effectually show what was man's wisdom. But previous and more particular instruction was necessary to make men truly wise.—'The grave is the only place where we may learn something of it.' Patrick.—Surely nothing can be learned in the grave; and hell rather than the grave must be meant by the word translated 'destruction.' (Note, Rev. 9:11.) SCOTT.

the world, can thoroughly understand the philosophy of it. But let man look upon this as his wisdom, To fear the Lord and to depart from evil; let him learn that, and he is learned enough, let this knowledge serve his turn. When God forbade man the tree of knowledge, He allowed him the tree of life, and this is that tree, Prov. 3: 18. We cannot attain true wisdom but by divine revelation: The Lord giveth wisdom, Prov. 2: 6. the matter of which is not the secrets of nature or providence, but the rules of our own practice: unto man He said not, 'Go up to heaven, to fetch happiness thence;' or, 'Go down to the deep, to draw it up thence.' No, the Word is nigh thee; (Deut. 30: 14.) He hath shewed thee, O man, not what is great, but what is good, not what the Lord thy God designs to do with thee, but what He requires of thee, Mic. 6: 8. Unto you, O men, I call, Prov. 8: 4. Lord, what is man that he should be thus minded, thus visited!

The fear of the Lord, that is the wisdom. Here is, 1. The description of true religion, pure religion, and undefiled; it is to fear the Lord, and depart from evil, which agrees with God's character of Job, ch. 1: 1. The fear of the Lord is the spring and summary of all religion. There is a slavish fear of God, springing from hard thoughts of Him, which is contrary to religion, Matt. 25: 24. There is a selfish fear of God, springing from dreadful thoughts of Him, which may be a good step toward religion, Acts 9: 5. But there is a filial fear of God, springing from great and high thoughts of Him, which is the life and soul of all religion. And wherever this reigns in the heart, it will appear by a constant care to depart from evil, Prov. 16: 6. This is essential to religion; we must first cease to do evil, or we shall never learn to do well. 2. To be truly religious, is to be truly wise: as the wisdom of God appears in the institution of it, so the wisdom of man appears in the practice and observance of it; it is understanding, for it is the best knowledge of truth; it is wisdom, for it is the best conduct of our affairs. nothing more surely guides our way, and gains our end, than being religious.

CHAP. XXIX. V. 1—6. After that excellent discourse concerning wisdom in the foregoing ch. Job sat down and paused awhile, not because he had talked himself out of breath, but because he would not, without leave of the company, engross the talk to himself, but would give room for his friends, if they pleased, to make their remarks on what he had said; but they had nothing to say, therefore, after he had recollected himself a little, he went on with his discourse concerning his own affairs, in this and the two following chs. Job begins with a wish, v. 2. So he brings in this account of his prosperity. His wish was, 1. That he was in as good a state as formerly; not for his own ease, but reputation, and the glory of his God, which, he thought, was eclipsed by his present sufferings. If this be our end in desiring life, health, and prosperity, that God may be glorified, and the credit of our holy profession rescued, preserved, and advanced, the desire is not only natural, but spiritual. Or, 2. That he were in as good a frame of spirit, as then! What Job complained most of now, was a load on his spirits, through God's withdrawing from him; therefore he wishes he had now his spirit as much enlarged and encouraged in the service of God, as then, and had as much freedom and fellowship with Him, as he then thought himself happy in.

Four things were then very pleasant to holy Job;

1. Confidence in the divine protection, v. 2. Those only whom God protects are safe, and [those only who do his will] may be secure; therefore those who have ever so much of this world, must not think themselves safe, unless God preserve them.

2. Complacency in the divine favor, v. 3. God lifted up the light of his countenance on him, gave him the assurances and sweet relishes of his love. Those that have the brightest sun-shine of outward prosperity, must yet expect some moments of darkness: but those that are interested in the favor of God, and know how to value it, can, by the light of that, walk cheerfully, and comfortably through all the darkness of this vale of tears. THAT PUTS GLADNESS INTO THE HEART, ENOUGH TO BALANCE ALL THE GRIEVANCES OF THIS PRESENT TIME.

3. Communion with the divine Word, v. 4. The secret of God was upon my tabernacle, i. e. When God conversed freely with him, as one bosom friend with another. See Ps. 25: 14. God communicates his favor and grace to his people, and receives the returns of their devotion in a way secret to the world. Some read it, When the society of God was in my tabernacle; which Rabbi Solomon understands of an assembly of God's people, that used to meet at Job's house for religious worship, in which he presided; this he took great pleasure in, and the scattering of it was a trouble to him. Or, it may be understood of the angels of God pitching their tents about his habitation.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Riches are good for the uses to which they were appointed: and the bountiful kindness of the Creator appears, in covering the surface, and storing the bowels, of the earth with so many useful productions: nor should the ingenuity or industry which men employ about them be condemned, except as disproportionate. (Gen. 1: 20—25.) Neither silver nor gold, but the love of them, 'is the root of all evil:' and the avarice, pride, and luxury of the human heart, not the creatures which God hath made for our use, ought to bear the whole blame of the mischiefs, to which they merely give occasion. It is also observable, that whilst God gives us all these things, He gives them in the way of industry; the productions of nature cannot be prepared for use, without enduring hardship for them, and often venturing into perilous situations: and, in like manner, whilst wisdom and grace are freely bestowed, we must labor and deny ourselves, and face dangers and enemies, if we would appropriate them. But did we understand the infinite value of these gifts, and our urgent want of them, we should think every hardship and sacrifice comparatively small.—True wisdom and grace confer peace, and joy, and lively hope; they deprive death of his sting, and ensure an eternal inheritance. Who then can estimate their value? All the treasures of the world, and the whole world itself, are worthless in the comparison: yet alas! every gilded bauble is preferred to them! (P. O. Prov. 2: 1—9.) Where is true wisdom to be found? The treasures of it are 'hid in Christ,' revealed by the Word of truth, and received by faith, through the operation of the Holy Spirit. There the Lord has prepared and declared it: there we may search for it and discover it. But it does not consist, in explaining all mysteries, settling all controversies, or solving all difficulties in the phenomena of nature, or in the divine government. Our business here is, to believe, adore, love, and obey; not to comprehend and dispute. We receive the benefit of the rain, and avail ourselves of the winds and tides, and seek shelter from the storm, whether we understand the theory of them or not. Thus let us flee from the wrath to come, take refuge in the hope of the Gospel, receive the comforts of life thankfully, and bear its burdens cheerfully. SCOTT.

Verses 23—28.

All the preceding observations and inquiries were evidently intended as introductory to these closing instructions; in which Job showed, that God alone was the Source and Giver of wisdom.—Thus Job intimated to the disputants, that they might show their wisdom much more, by a conscientious performance of their own duty, than by presumptuously intruding into the secret reasons of the divine dispensations; or rashly condemning their afflicted friend as a hypocrite. SCOTT.

(25.) We can now carry this idea further, as modern science teaches and demonstrates mathematically, that the elementary gases of the air and of water are combined in definite proportions, by number, weight and measure; and that wherever found they contain the same proportions. We can also, by combining larger proportions of the same elementary gases, produce gases most fatal to life, demonstrating to us that if an All-wise and All-good Creator did not cause the gases which produce air and water to be evolved on our earth exactly in the proportion we now find them; i. e. if God did not accurately weigh and measure them out to our atmosphere, we could not exist with our present constitution: and if He did not continue so to do, the whole earth would be one mass of death. See also Chemical Works: and remarks on the balance and weight of the atmosphere in Clarke. ED.

4. Assurance of the divine presence, v. 5. The Almighty was yet with me. Now, he thought God was departed; in those days, He was with him, and that was all in all to him. God's presence with a man in his house, though it be but a cottage, makes it both a castle and a palace.

Lastly, He had comfort in his family, every thing was agreeable there: 1. A numerous offspring to enjoy his estate. It is a comfort to tender parents to see their children about them; Job speaks very feelingly of this comfort, now he was deprived of it. He thought it an instance of God's being with him, that his children were about him; and yet we reckon wrong, if, when we have lost our children, we cannot comfort ourselves with this, that we have not lost our God. 2. He had a plentiful estate for the support of this numerous family, v. 6. His dairy abounded to that degree, that he might, if he pleased, wash his steps with butter; and his olive-yards were so fruitful, beyond expectation, that it seemed as if the rock poured him out rivers of oil. He reckons his wealth, not by his silver and gold, which were for hoarding, but by his butter and oil, which were for use; for what is an estate good for, unless we take the good of it ourselves, and do good with it to others?

V. 7—17. Job, though he had comfort enough in his own house, yet did not confine himself to that; we are not born for ourselves, but for the public. The gate was the place of judgment, Job went out to it through the city, (v. 7.) not in an affectation of pomp, but in an affection to justice. Observe, Judgment was administered in the gate, in the street, in the places of concourse, to which every man might have a free access; that every one who would might be a witness to all that was said and done; and that, when judgment was given against the guilty, others might hear and fear.

Job being a prince, a judge, a magistrate, a man in authority, we are here told,

I. What respect was paid him by all sorts of people, not only for the dignity of his place, but for his personal merit, his eminent prudence, integrity, and good management. Young and old, even princes and nobles, honored and respected him, v. 8, 9, 10. The gravity and majesty of his looks and mien, and his known strictness in animadverting on every thing evil and indecent, commanded all about him into due decorum; they who expected honor from others, gave honor to him. Virtue and piety challenge respect from all, and usually have it; but they that not only are good, but do good, are worthy of double honor. Modesty becomes those that are young and in subjection, as much as majesty becomes those that are aged and in power. Honor and fear are due to magistrates, and must be rendered to them, Rom. 13: 7. But if a great and good man was thus reverenced, how is the great and good God to be feared! Some think these princes and nobles were inferior magistrates under him, and that the respect they paid him was due to his place, as their sovereign and supreme; it should rather seem that they were his equals in place, and joined in commission with him, and that the peculiar honor they gave him was gained by his extraordinary abilities and services. It was agreed, he excelled in quickness of apprehension, soundness of judgment, closeness of application, clearness and copiousness of expression; and therefore he was an oracle of law, and counsel, and justice, and what he said all attended to, and acquiesced in. When he came into court, especially when he stood up to speak, the princes refrained talking, the nobles held their peace, that they might the more diligently hearken to what he said, and might be sure to take his meaning. When the princes and nobles wrangled among themselves, all agreed to refer the matters in dispute to Job, and to abide by his judgment. Happy the men blessed with such eminent gifts as these; they have great opportunities of honoring God, and doing good, but have great need to watch against pride: happy the people blessed with such eminent men; it is a token for good to them.

II. What good he did in his place. Here we shall see Job valued himself, in the day of his prosperity, not by the honor of his family, his great estate, his large income, his full table, his many servants, the ensigns of his dignity, his equipage and retinue, the splendid entertainments he gave, and the court made to him, but by his [disinterested] usefulness. Goodness is God's glory, and it will be ours; if we be merciful as God is, we are perfect as He is, v. 11—17.

1. He valued himself by the interest he had in the esteem, affections, and prayers of sober people; not by the studied panegyrics of the wits and poets, but the natural praises of all about him. He did not think it an honor to make every body fear him, but, like Mordecai, to be accepted of the multitude of his brethren. He did not so much value the applauses of those at a distance, as the attestations of those that constantly attended him, saw him, and heard him, and could speak of their own knowledge; especially theirs who could speak by their own experience; such was the blessing of him who was ready to perish, (v. 13.) and who by Job's means was rescued from perishing. Let great men, and men of estates, thus do good, and they shall have praise of the same; and let those who have good done them, look upon it as a just debt they owe to their protectors and benefactors, to bless them and give witness to them; to use their interest on earth for their honor, and in heaven for their comfort, to praise them, and pray for them. Those are ungrateful indeed, who grudge these small returns.

2. He valued himself by the care he took of persons least able to help themselves. He delivered the poor that cried, (v. 12.) and would not suffer them to be trampled on and run down. Nay, (v. 16.) he was a father to them, not only a judge to protect, but a father to provide for them, to counsel and direct them, and to appear and act for them on all occasions. It is no disparagement to the son of a prince to be a father to the poor. The fatherless found him ready to help them, and, if they were in straits, to deliver them. Those that were ready to perish he saved from perishing, relieving the hungry, taking care of the sick, and vindicating the falsely accused; also, widows he relieved that were sighing for grief, and trembling for fear; and those that were on any account at a loss, he gave suitable and seasonable relief to; v. 15. was eyes to the blind, counselling and advising those for the best, that knew not what to do; and feet to the lame, assisting those with money and friends, that knew what they should do, but knew not how to compass it. Those we best help, whom we help out [promptly] in that very thing wherein they are defective, and most need help.

3. He valued himself by the conscience he made of justice and equity in all his proceedings: his friends had unjustly censured him as an oppressor; 'So far from that,' (says he,) 'I always made it my business to maintain and support right.' (1.) He devoted himself to the administration of justice, v. 14. i. e. he had an habitual disposition to execute, and put on a fixed resolution to do it. It was the girdle of his loins. It kept him tight and steady in all his motions; he always appeared in it, as in his clothing, and never without it. Righteousness will clothe them that put it on; it will keep them warm, and safe; it will adorn them, and recommend them to the favor both of God and man. (2.) He took pleasure in it, and looked upon it as his greatest glory, to do justice to all, and injury to none. Perhaps he did not himself wear a robe and a diadem, he was very indifferent to those ensigns of honor; but the settled principles of justice, by which he was governed and did govern, were to him instead of all those ornaments. If a magistrate do not make conscience of his duty, such badges are but a reproach. (3.) He took pains in the business of his place, v. 16. He diligently inquired into the matter of fact, patiently and impartially heard both sides, set every thing in its true light, and cleared it from false colors; he laid all circumstances together, that he might find out the truth, and the merits of every cause, and then, and not till then, gave judgment upon it; he never answered a matter before he heard it, nor did he judge a man to be righteous, however he seemed, for his being first in his own cause.

4. He valued himself by the check he gave to the violence of proud and evil men, v. 17. He did not take away their lives, but brake their jaws, i. e. took away their power of doing mischief, humbled them, mortified them, and curbed their insolence, and so plucked the spoil out of their teeth; fearlessly delivered persons and estates from being made a prey. Good magistrates must thus be a terror and restraint to evil doers, and a protection to the innocent, and, in order to this, they have need to arm themselves with zeal, resolution, and an undaunted courage: a judge on the bench has as much need to be bold and brave, as a commander in the field, [though courage to fight is but an instinct shared with the brutes; and firmness to do right is of a higher order of character, not so common.]

V. 18—25. What crowned Job's prosperity, was, the pleasing prospect he had of the continuance of it; he knew, in general, that he was liable to trouble, and therefore was not secure; (ch. 3:26.) yet he had no particular occasion for fear, but as much reason as ever any man had to count on the lengthening out of his tranquillity.

I. In the midst of his prosperity, he thought of dying, and the thought was not uneasy to him. He knew that though his nest was high, it did not set him out of the reach of the darts of death. Yet he flattered himself with vain hopes, both that he should live long, and die in the same prosperous state, v. 18. in which he had lived: so apt are even good people to put death at a distance. If such an expectation arise from a lively faith in the providence and promise of God, it is well; but if from a conceit of our own wisdom, and the stability of these earthly things, it is ill-grounded, and turns into sin. We hope Job's confidence was like David's, Whom shall I fear? not like the rich fool's, Soul, take thine ease.

II. See the ground of these thoughts.

1. If he looked at home, his stock was all his own, his neighbors had no demand on him, and he found no bodily distemper growing on him. He was getting forward in his affairs, lost no reputation, but gained rather; and he knew no rival that threatened either to eclipse his honor, or abridge his power: see how beautifully he describes this, v. 19, 20. Providence favored him, and made all his enjoyments comfortable, and all his enterprises successful. His bow also was renewed in his hand, that is, his power to protect himself, and annoy those that assailed him, still increased, so that he thought he had as little reason as any man to fear the insults of Sabeans or Chaldeans.

2. If he looked abroad, he found he had a good interest and well confirmed. He was (1.) The oracle of his country; consulted as an oracle, and his dictates acquiesced in as oracles, v. 21. All men gave ear to him; as nothing could be said against it, so nothing needed to be added to what he said, v. 22. Why should men meddle with a subject already exhausted?—(2.) The darling of his country. All about him were well-pleased with every thing he said and did, as David's people with him, 2 Sam. 3: 36. He had the hearts and affections of all his neighbors, all his servants, tenants, subjects; never was man so much admired, nor so well beloved. [1.] They were thought happy to whom he spake, and they thought themselves so, v. 22, 23. Those are wise, or likely to be so, that know how to value wise discourse; and those who have such an interest as Job had in the esteem of others, as they have a great opportunity of doing good, so they must take great care lest they do hurt, for a bad word out of their mouths is very infectious. [2.] Much more happy were they thought on whom he smiled, and they thought themselves so, v. 24. Many seek the ruler's favor: Job was a ruler whose favor was courted, and valued at a high rate. Familiarity often breeds contempt, but if Job at any time saw fit, for his own diversion, to make himself free with those about him, yet it did not in the least diminish their veneration for him: the light of his countenance they cast not down. So wisely did he dispense his favors, as not to make them cheap, and so wisely did they receive them, as not to make themselves unworthy of them another time.—(3.) The sovereign, v. 25. all referring themselves to his

CONCLUDING NOTE. This ch. presents a striking picture of society; and Gibbon thus describes the social condition of the Arabs, as it has been and is: (comp. also the pref. to Job.) 'The slaves of domestic tyranny may vainly exult in their national independence; but the Arab is personally free. In every tribe, superstition, or gratitude, or fortune, has exalted a particular family above their equals. The dignities of sheich and emir invariably descend in this chosen race; but the order of succession is loose and precarious; and the most worthy or aged of the noble kinsmen are preferred to the simple, though important office of composing disputes by their advice, and guiding valor by their example. The momentary junction of several tribes produces an army; their more lasting union constitutes a nation; and the supreme chief, the emir of emirs, whose banner is displayed at their head, may deserve, in the eyes of strangers, the honors of the kingly name. If the Arabian princes abuse their power, they are quickly punished by the desertion of their subjects, accustomed to a mild and parental jurisdiction. Their spirit is free, their steps are unconfined, the desert is open, and the tribes and families are held together by a mutual and voluntary compact. The softer natives of Yemen supported the pomp and majesty of a monarch; but if he could not leave his palace without endangering his life, (Agatharchides, Diod: Sic. and Strabo,) the active powers of government must have been devolved on his nobles and magistrates. Mecca and Medina present the form, or rather the substance, of a commonwealth. The grandfather of Mahomet, and his lineal ancestors, appear in foreign and domestic transactions as the princes of their country; but they reigned, like Pericles at Athens, or the Medici at Florence, by the opinion of their wisdom and integrity; their influence was divided with their patrimony. On solemn occasions they convened the assembly of the people; and since mankind must be either compelled or persuaded to obey, the use and reputation of oratory among the ancient Arabs, is the clearest evidence of public freedom. But their simple freedom was of a very different cast from the nice and artificial machinery of the Greek and Roman republics, in which each member possessed an undivided share of the civil and political rights of the community. In the more simple state of the Arabs, the nation is free, because each of her sons disdains a base submission to the will of a master. His breast is fortified with the conduct, and submitting themselves to his command. To this perhaps, in many countries, monarchy owed its rise: such a man as Job, that so far excelled all his neighbors in wisdom and integrity, could not but sit chief, and the fool will, of course, be servant to the wise in heart: and if the wisdom did but for awhile run in the blood, the honor and power would certainly attend it, and so by degrees become hereditary. Two things recommended Job to the sovereignty. [1.] The authority of a commander, or general; every one that has the spirit of wisdom, has not the spirit of government, but Job had both, and, when there was occasion, could assume state, as the king in the army does, and say, Do this, Matt. 8:9. [2.] The tenderness of a comforter. He was as ready to succor those in distress, as if it had been his office to comfort the mourners. Eliphaz himself owned he had been very good in that respect, ch. 4:3. And this he now reflected on with pleasure, when himself a mourner; but we find it easier to comfort others with comforts we have been formerly comforted with, than ourselves with those wherewith we have formerly comforted others.

Job complains that he is sunk into extreme contempt, 1—14; that he suffers great anguish of soul and body, 15—19; that God deals rigorously with him, 20—24; that he, who had comforted others, now suffers without a comforter, 25—31.

I know not but we may look upon Job as a type and figure of Christ, in his power and prosperity: our Lord Jesus is such a King as Job was; the poor man's King, who loves righteousness and hates iniquity, and on whom the blessing of a world ready to perish comes; see Ps. 72: 2, &c. To Him therefore let us give ear, and let Him sit chief in our hearts.

CHAP. XXX. It is a melancholy But now, which begins this ch. Adversity is here described as much to the life as prosperity was there, and the height of that did but increase the depth of this. God sets the one over-against the other, and so did Job, that his afflictions might appear the more grievous, and, consequently, his case the more pitiable.

V. 1—14. Job makes a very large and sad complaint of the great disgrace he was fallen into, from the height of honor and reputation, which was exceedingly grievous and cutting to such an ingenuous spirit as Job's. Two things he insists on as very aggravating.

I. The meanness of the persons that affronted him. None can be represented as more base than those here, who insulted Job, on all accounts. They were,

1. Young, younger than he, v. 1. They were youth, v. 12. even the children, in their play, played on him. Children soon learn to be scornful, when they see their parents so.

2. Of fathers very despicable, such as Job would have disdained to take into the lowest service about house, v. 1. Job here speaks of what he might have done: he was not of such a spirit as to set any of the children of men with the dogs of his flock; he knew the dignity of human nature better.

3. The unprofitable burdens of the earth, good for nothing; Job himself, with all his prudence and patience, could make nothing of them, v. 2. the young were so lazy, and awkward, the old twice children.

4. Extremely poor, (v. 3.) and this, on account of their own slothfulness and wastefulness, so nobody was forward to relieve them; hence they were forced to flee into the deserts both for shelter and sustenance, and were put to sorry shifts indeed, v. 4. See what hunger will bring men to: those that have abundance ought to think sometimes of those whose fare is very coarse, and short too; but we must own the righteousness of God, and not think it strange, if slothfulness clothe men with rags, and the idle soul be made to suffer hunger. This beggarly world is full of the devil's poor.

5. Very scandalous and wicked, not only the burdens, but the plagues, of the places where they lived, the scum of the country, v. 5. They were such lying, thieving, lurking, mischievous people, that the best service the magistrates could do, was, to rid the country of them, while the very mob

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The Lord protects and prospers us as He pleases; and He confers on those who love Him whatever can be beneficial to them. But when the mind is enlightened by the Holy Spirit; when a man walks in the light of God's comforting presence, and enjoys the secret pleasure of communion with Him; every outward comfort is doubled, every trouble is diminished, and he may pass cheerfully, by this light, through life and death to heaven. The sensible comfort, however, of this happy state is often withdrawn from those who have enjoyed it. (Ps. 42: 4, 5.) In general, this change arises from negligence, and 'grieving the Holy Spirit;' but sometimes it may be a trial of faith and grace. Yet it is always right in such cases to examine ourselves, to inquire into the cause by fervent prayer, and to redouble diligence and watchfulness.—Many, however, who profess that they have walked in this heavenly light, complain that now it is not with them 'as in months past,' and rest satisfied with unavailing lamentations! Depending on past experience, and concluding their state safe, they put up at present with worldly comforts, and are as negligent as they are joyless. And others, who have really walked with God, finding their comforts decline, are tempted to think all their past experience a delusion, and to conclude that the Almighty has finally forsaken them. But for those comforts, which are indeed from God, the true believer can find no substitute in the whole creation: and though they may be withdrawn, they shall never be extinguished, but shall be restored, and endure till lost in the blaze of heavenly glory. SCOTT.

austere virtues of courage, patience, and sobriety; the love of independence prompts him to exercise the habits of self-command; and the fear of dishonor guards him from the meaner apprehension of pain, of danger, or death. The gravity and firmness of the mind is conspicuous in his outward demeanor: his speech is slow, weighty, and concise, he is seldom provoked to laughter, his only gesture is that of stroking his beard, the venerable symbol of manhood; and the sense of his own importance teaches him to accost his equals without levity, and his superiors without awe.—Of the time of ignorance, which preceded Mahomet, 1700 battles are recorded by tradition. In private life, every man, at least every family, was the judge and avenger of its own cause. The nice sensibility of honor, [?] which weighs the insult rather than the injury, sheds its venom on their quarrels. The slightest insult calls for blood, and their inveterate malice waits long for revenge; and transfers the penalty to the noblest of the race by whom they have been injured. The distant tribes (before Mahomet's time) resorted to an annual fair, at which 30 days were employed in the exchange not only of corn and wine but of eloquence and poetry. The prize was disputed by the generous emulation of the bards; the victorious performance was deposited in the archives of princes and emirs; and we may read in our own language [tr. by Sir W. Jones] the 7 original poems which were inscribed in letters of gold, and suspended in the temple of Mecca. The Arabian poets were the historians and moralists of the age; and if they sympathized with the prejudices, they inspired and crowned the virtues of their countrymen. The indissoluble union of generosity and valor was the darling theme of their song; and when they pointed their keenest satire against a despicable race, they affirmed, in the bitterness of reproach, that the men knew not how to give, nor the women to deny.' cried after them, as after a thief, Away with such fellows. They were lazy, and were exclaimed against as thieves; and justly, for they that do not earn their own bread by honest labor, do, in effect, steal the bread out of other people's mouths; an idle fellow is a public nuisance; but it is better to drive such into a work-house, than, as here, into a wilderness, which will punish them indeed, but never reform them. They were forced to dwell in caves of the earth, and they brayed like asses among the bushes, v. 6, 7. See what is the lot of those that have the cry of the country, the cry of their own conscience, against them; they cannot but be in a continual terror and confusion; they groan among the trees, (so Broughton,) and smart among the nettles; they are stung and scratched there, where they hoped to be sheltered and protected. See what miseries wicked people bring themselves to in this world; yet this is nothing to what is in reserve for them in the other world.

6. They were all that is base, v. 8. banished from the earth, as viler than the earth. One would not think it possible that human nature should sink so low, and degenerate so far, as in these people. But such were abusive to Job, (1.) In revenge; because, when in prosperity and power, like a good magistrate, he put the laws in execution against vagabonds, rogues, and sturdy beggars. (2.) In triumph, because they thought he was now become like one of them, Isa. 14: 10, 11. The abjects, men of mean spirits, insult over the miserable, Ps. 35: 15.

II. The greatness of their affronts beyond imagination.

1. They made ballads on him, with which they made themselves and their companions merry, v. 9. Those have a very base spirit, that turn the calamities of their honest neighbors into a jest.

2. They shunned him as loathsome, fled far from him, (v. 10.) as a monster, or infected; themselves driven out from among men, they would have driven him out. For,

3. They spit in his face, or were ready to do so; tripped up his heels, pushed away his feet, (v. 12.) kicked him, either in wrath, from hate, or in sport, to make themselves merry, as they did with their companions at foot-ball. The best of saints have sometimes received the worst of injuries and indignities, from a spiteful, scornful, wicked world, and must not think it strange; our Master Himself was thus abused.

4. They not only made a jest of him, but a prey; not only affronted, but did him all the real mischief they could devise; raised up the ways of their destruction; or, as some read it, They cast upon me the cause of their woe; i. e. 'Lay the blame of their being driven out, upon me;' and it is common for criminals to hate the judges and laws which punish them. But, under this pretence, (1.) They accused him falsely, misrepresenting his former conversation, here called marring his path. They reflected on him as a tyrant and an oppressor, because he had done justice on them; and perhaps Job's friends grounded their uncharitable censures of him (ch. 22: 6, &c.) on the unjust and unreasonable clamors of these sorry people; but who can be innocent, if the accusations of such persons may criminate? (2.) They did all they could to add to his miseries. It is a great sin to forward the calamity of any, especially of good people: in this they have nobody to set them on, or countenance them; but do it of their own accord; they are fools in other things, but wise enough to do mischief, and need no help in inventing that. Some read it thus, They hold my heaviness a profit, though they be never the better. Wicked people, though they get nothing by the calamities of others, yet rejoice in them.

5. In all this they were numerous, unanimous, and violent, v. 14. They came upon me as a wide breaking in of waters, when the dam is broken, [note, 7: 12.] or, 'as soldiers into a broad breach they have made in the wall of a besieged city;' and in this they took pride and pleasure; rolled themselves in the desolation, as a man in a soft and easy bed; and rolled themselves upon him with all the weight of their malice.

Lastly, All this contempt was caused by his troubles, v. 11. 'Because He has loosed my cord; taken away the honor and power with which I was girded, (ch. 12: 18.) scattered what I had got together, and untwisted all my affairs; because He has afflicted me, therefore they have let loose the bridle before me,' i. e. 'have given themselves a liberty to say and do what they please against me.' They that by Providence are stripped of honor, may expect to be loaded with contempt by inconsiderate, ill-natured people. 'Because He hath loosed his cord,' (the original has that reading also,) i. e. 'because he has taken his bridle of restraint off their malice, they cast away the bridle from me,' i. e. 'make no account of my authority, nor stand in any awe of me.' It is owing to the hold God has of the consciences even of bad men, and the restraints He lays on them, that we are not continually thus insulted and abused; and if at any time thus ill-treated, we must acknowledge the hand of God in taking off those restraints; as David did, when Shimei cursed him; So let him curse, for the Lord hath bidden him.

Now, in all this, we may see the uncertainty of worldly honor, and particularly of popular applause; how suddenly a man may fall from the height of dignity into the depth of disgrace. What little cause therefore have men to be ambitious or proud of what may be so easily lost, and what little confidence is to be put in it! They that, to-day, cry, Hosannah, may, to-morrow, cry, Crucify. But there is an honor which comes from God, which, if we secure, we shall find it not thus changeable and loseable. Nothing is more grievous in poverty [to generous minds] than that it renders men contemptible: The Roman populace, faithful to the turns of fortune, still persecutes the fallen. We may see in Job a type of Christ, who was thus made a reproach of men, and despised of the people, (Ps. 22: 6. Isa. 53: 3.) and who hid not his face from shame, and spitting, but bore it better than Job.

V. 15—31. In this second part of Job's complaint, which is very bitter, and has a great many sorrowful accents, we may observe a great deal that he complains of, and some little that he comforts himself with.

1. In general, affliction seized and surprised him: as the bailiff arrests the debtor, and by violence secures him. It surprised him, v. 27. 'The days of affliction prevented me,' i. e. 'came upon me without any previous warning.' His bowels boiled with grief, and rested not, v. 27. The sense of his calamities was continually preying on his spirits: he went mourning from day to day, sighing and weeping; and such a cloud was constantly on his mind, that he went, in effect, without the sun, v. 28. walked out of the sun, (so some,) in dark, shady places, as melancholy people used to do. If he went to worship in the congregation; instead of standing up calmly to desire their prayers, he stood up and cried aloud, through pain of body, or anguish of mind, like one half distracted. If he appeared in public, to receive visits, when the fit came on him, he could not contain himself, nor preserve due decorum, but stood up, and shrieked aloud. Thus he was a brother to dragons and owls, (v. 29.) both in choosing solitude and retirement, as they do, (Isa. 34: 13.) and in making a fearful, hideous noise, as they do; his inconsiderate complaints were fitly compared to their inarticulate ones.

2. The terror and trouble that seized his soul, were the sorest part of his calamity, v. 15, 16 (1.) My soul.—Heb. My principal one. My princess; for the soul is the principal part of the man; our glory; every way more excellent than the body, therefore what pursues the soul, and threatens that, should be most dreaded. His spirit is not only wounded, but poured out upon him, v. 16. He was not only weak as water, but, in his own apprehension, lost as water spilt on the ground. Compare Ps. 22: 14. My heart is melted like wax.

3. His bodily diseases were very grievous, v. 17. His bones were burnt with heat, v. 30. He was in a constant fever, which even consumed the marrow in his bones. See how our frail bodies carry in themselves the seeds of disease and death His skin was black upon him, v. 30. The blood settled, and the sores suppurated, which made his skin look black. Even his garment had its color changed with the continual running of his boils, and the soft clothing he used to wear was now grown so stiff, that all his garments were like his collar, v. 18. It would be noisome to describe Job's condition, for want of clean linen and good

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

All earthly honor, prosperity, and comfort are precarious: and 'they build too low, who build beneath the skies.' But if a contrast, so affecting as this narrative exhibits, may be drawn, between the summit of earthly felicity, and the depth of earthly misery; how inconceivable must be the distance between eternal life and eternal punishment! And if the thoughts of former enjoyments greatly enhance the anguish of present sufferings; in what a wretched case will the wealthy, honored, and self-indulgent sinner be, when it shall be said to him, 'Remember that thou in thy life-time receivedst thy good things!' (Luke 16: 22—26.) —A Christian must not disdain nor despair of any fellow creature, nor reproach men for their poverty, nor indulge resentment; and they who, through incapacity, or the imbecility of old age, cannot work, have a right to be maintained by others: yet men may persevere in so base a conduct, that no wise man can employ, trust, or favor them; and whilst they continue in their vile practices, they are less entitled to respect, than the meanest of the inoffensive and useful brute creatures. There are numbers, who cannot, by any human wisdom or power, be preserved from present and future ruin: we may lament to see them dying with disease and in misery; but we cannot make them willing to be done good to: and in some scenes, it is equally surprising and afflicting to notice the multitudes which answer to this description. As, however, some of every sort may be rescued from ruin, it is our part to do what we can in the use of proper means; and to look to Him, with whom all things are possible, for an effectual blessing.—But they, who are themselves base and foolish, train up families of children of the same character, inured to vice, and fitted to be the nuisance of society. So that, except some method be devised to prevent the rising generations, one after another, from being corrupted, no extensive reformation can take place; and alas! the sword of the magistrate will still find abundance of employment.—When inward temptations unite with outward calamities, the soul often loses its firmness, is hurried on as in a tempest, and is filled with confusion. It then becomes difficult to speak, or complain, without seeming 'to charge God foolishly,' as if He dealt too rigorously with us, and were become our Enemy. But wo be to those, who have Him for an Enemy! They will not only be brought with others to the grave, but to the bottomless pit of destruction. Compared with this 'perdition of ungodly men,' what are all outward, or even inward, temporal afflictions? But, as the grave is the house appointed for all living, let us look more to the things which are unseen and eternal.

old idea, which modern science has yet brought to light. It is the draco volans, or flying dragon of zoologists; of habits like the chameleon and lizard tribe. Possibly, the sight of some such beast might have given rise to the idea of the fabulous dragon, through the exaggerations of wonder-loving travellers in distant regions, during the early ages of ignorance and wonder. Owls.] Heb. daughters of vociferation, i. e. ostriches: note, Lev. 11:16. CHAP. XXXI.

Job solemnly, before God, protests, that he was not guilty of unchastity or dishonesty, 1—12; of unkindness to his servants, or to the poor, 13—22; of trusting in riches; of idolatry, revenge, neglect of hospitality, hypocrisy, or fear of man, 23—34. He appeals to God, and challenges his accusers to prove their allegations, 35—40.

attendance, and what filthy rags all his clothes were. Some think, that, among other diseases, Job was ill of a swelling in his throat, and that that was it which bound him about, like a stiff collar.

Thus was he cast into the mire, v. 19. compared to mire, so some: his body looked more like a heap of dirt than any thing else. Let none be proud of their clothing, nor their cleanness, Isa. 3: 24. We are but dust and ashes at the best, and our bodies vile bodies; but we are apt to forget, till God, by some sore disease, makes us sensibly to feel and own, what we are.

4. What afflicted him most of all, was, that God seemed to be his Enemy, v. 19. He was very importunate in his applications, but in vain, v. 20. If our most fervent prayers bring not in speedy and sensible returns, we must not think it strange. Though the seed of Jacob did never seek in vain, yet they have often thought that they did, and that God has not only been deaf, but angry, at the prayers of his people, Ps. 80: 4. We have here v. 21. one of the worst words Job ever spake; far be it from the God of mercy and grace, to be cruel to any; his compassions fail not, especially to his own children: Job was unjust and ungrateful, when he said so of Him; but harboring hard thoughts of God was now the sin which most easily beset him. Thou liftest me up to the wind, (v. 22.) as a feather, or the chaff the wind plays with; so unequal a match did Job think himself for Omnipotence, and so unable was he to help himself, when he was made to ride, not in triumph, but in terror, on the wings of the wind; and the judgments of God did even dissolve his substance, as a cloud is dissolved and dispersed by the wind.

5. He expected no other now, than that God, by these troubles, would shortly make an end of him, v. 23. The living know that they shall die; let us, each, know it with application.

Here is something, in the midst of all, with which he comforts himself, though but a little. 1. That death will end his calamities, v. 24. The hand of God's wrath would bring him to death, but not follow him beyond; his soul would be safe and happy in the world of spirits, his body safe and easy in the dust. Men cry in their destruction, when dying; yet in the grave they feel nothing, fear nothing, but all is quiet. 'Though in hell, (called destruction,) they cry, yet not in the grave; and I being delivered from the second death, the first to me will be an effectual relief.' Therefore he wished he might be hid in the grave, ch. 14: 13. 2. He reflects with comfort on the concern he always had for the calamities of others, when himself at ease, v. 25. Some think he herein complains of God, thinking it very hard, that he, who had showed mercy to others, should not himself find mercy. I would rather take it as a quieting consideration to himself; his conscience witnessed for him, that he had always sympathized with persons in misery, and done what he could to help them, and therefore had reason to expect that, at length, both God and his friends would pity him. They who mourn with them that mourn, will bear their own sorrows the better, when it comes to their turn. Did not my soul burn for the poor? So some read it, comparing 2 Cor. 11: 29. Who is offended, and I burn not? As they who have been unmerciful and hard-hearted may expect to hear of it from their own consciences, when in trouble, so they who have considered and succored the poor, shall have the remembrance of that to make their bed easy in their sickness, Ps. 41: 1, 3.

CHAP. XXXI. Job had often protested his integrity in general, here he does it in particular; not in commendation, (for he does not here proclaim his good deeds,) but in his own just and necessary vindication; a debt every man owes to his own reputation. Job's friends had been particular in their articles of impeachment, therefore he is so in his protestation, which seems to refer especially to what Eliphaz had accused him of, ch. 22: 6, &c. They had produced no witnesses nor proofs, therefore he may well be admitted to purge himself on oath, which he does very solemnly, and with many awful imprecations of God's wrath, if he were guilty of those crimes; this protestation confirms God's character of him, that there was none like him in the earth. Nor does he only maintain the cleanness of his practices, but shows also that the reason of his eschewing evil, was, he feared God, and piety was at the bottom of his justice and charity; and this crowns the proof of his sincerity. Now, in all this, we may see, (1.) The sense of the patriarchal age concerning good and evil, and what was so long ago condemned as sinful, that is, both hateful and hurtful. (2.) A noble pattern of piety and virtue proposed to us for our imitation, which, if our consciences can witness for us that we conform to it, will be our rejoicing, as it was Job's, in the day of evil.

V. 1—8. The lusts of the flesh, and the love of the world, are the two fatal rocks on which multitudes split; against these Job protests he was always careful to stand on his guard.

I. The lusts of the flesh. He not only kept himself clear from adultery, (v. 9.) but from all lewdness whatsoever, even of the imagination, v. 1. From the beginning it was so, that a man should have but one wife, and cleave to her only; and Job kept close to that institution, and abhorred the thought of transgressing it. Those that would keep their hearts pure, must guard their eyes, which are both the outlets and inlets of uncleanness. Hence we read of wanton eyes, and eyes full of adultery. The first sin began in the eye, Gen. 3: 6. What we must not meddle with, we must not lust after; and what we must not lust after, we must not look at; not the forbidden wealth, (Prov. 23: 5.) not the forbidden wine, (Prov. 23: 31.) not the forbidden woman, Matt. 5: 28. Those are not chaste, that are not so in spirit as well as body, 1 Cor. 7: 34. See how Christ's exposition of the seventh commandment agrees with the ancient sense of it, and how much better Job understood it than the Pharisees, though they sat in Moses' chair.

His reasons: not fear of reproach among men, though that is to be considered, (Prov. 6 : 33.) but fear of the wrath and curse of God. He knew very well, that there is no portion, no inheritance, no true happiness, for a soul, but what is in God, in the Almighty, and what comes from above, from on high. Those that wallow in uncleanness, render themselves utterly unfit for communion with God, either in grace here, or in glory hereafter, and become allied to unclean spirits, which are for ever separated from Him; and then

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXI. V. 1—4. It appears, from this protestation, that Job understood the spiritual nature of the divine commandments, as reaching to the thoughts and intents of the heart, far better, than almost any of those did, to whom the written law was delivered, and among whom it was preserved. (Rom. 7:9—14. Ex. 20:14. Matt. 5:27, 28.) —In this chapter, and in ch. 29. much more is contained of genuine purity and equity; of condescending, liberal, self-denying kindness to the poor and needy; of superiority to the love of the world and the fear of men, and all corrupt motives, as well as of sterling piety, than in all the writings of pagan antiquity combined. The standard of duty is fixed as high as in the moral law, and explained as spiritually as in our Savior's sermon on the mount. And the entire coincidence of this ancient book with the N. T. in this essential matter, as well as in the grand doctrines of revealed religion, and the effect of them on the practice of true believers, forms a striking proof, that it was 'written by inspiration from God;' that all the sacred writers 'spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost;' and that true religion has been the same for substance in every age from the beginning.—Job's conduct as a magistrate, in his public capacity, was before exhibited: this chapter contains an avowal of his habitual conduct in private life. what portion, what inheritance, can they have with God? No unclean thing shall enter into the New Jerusalem, that holy city. Fools make a mock at this sin, make a jest of it, it is with them a peccadillo, a trick of youth; but they deceive themselves with vain words, for, because of these things, the wrath of God, the insupportable wrath of the eternal God, comes on the children of disobedience, Eph. 5: 6. There are some sinners whom God sometimes goes out of the common road of providence to meet with; such are these. The destruction of Sodom is a strange punishment. Is there not alienation (so some read it) to the workers of iniquity? This is the sinfulness of the sin, that it alienates the mind from God; (Eph. 4: 18, 19.) and this is the punishment of the sinners, that they shall be eternally set at a distance from Him, Rev. 22: 15. A wanton thought cannot be so close, nor a wanton look so quick, as to escape God's cognizance, much less any act of uncleanness so secretly done, as to be out of his sight. If at any time tempted, Job restrained himself from it, and all approaches to it, with this pertinent thought, v. 4. as Joseph did, Gen. 39: 9. God takes a more exact notice of us, than we do of ourselves.

II. The love of the world, and all sinful, indirect means of getting wealth. He dreaded all forbidden profit as much as all forbidden pleasure. Let us see,

1. His protestation: in general, he had been honest and just in all his dealings, and never, to his knowledge, did any body any wrong. (1.) He never walked with vanity, i. e. told a lie, or equivocated, to get a good bargain. Some men's constant walk is a constant cheat. They either make what they have more than it is, that they may be trusted; or less than it is, that nothing may be expected from them. But Job was a different man. His wealth was not gotten by vanity, though now diminished, Prov. 13: 11. (2.) He never hasted to deceit. Those that deceive, must be quick and sharp, but Job's quickness and sharpness were never turned that way. He never made haste to be rich by deceit, but always acted cautiously, lest, through inconsideration, he should do an unjust thing. Note, What we have in the world, may be either used with comfort, or lost with comfort, if honestly got. (3.) His steps never turned out of the way, the way of justice and fair dealing, v. 7. In every particular action and affair, we must closely tie ourselves up to the rules of righteousness. (4.) His heart did not walk after his eyes, i. e. he did not covet what he saw, that was another's. Covetousness is called the lust of the eye, 1 John 2: 16. Achan saw, and (5.) That no blot had cleaved to his hands, i. e. he then took, the accursed thing. was not chargeable with getting any thing dishonestly, or keeping that which was another's, whenever it appeared to be so. Injustice is a blot, a blot to the estate, a blot to the owner; therefore, let it not cleave to our hands. See Isa. 33:15.

2. How he ratifies his protestation. So confident is he of his own honesty, that, (1.) He is willing to have his goods searched, v. 6. An honest man is so far from dreading a trial, that he desires it rather, being well assured God knows his integrity, and will approve it, and that the trial of it will be to his praise and honor. (2.) He is willing to forfeit the whole, if any thing were found but what he came honestly by, v. 8. 'Let me sow, and let another eat,' was already agreed to be the doom of oppressors; (ch. 5: 5.) 'and let my offspring be rooted out.' This intimates, he believed the sin deserved this punishment, that, usually, it is thus punished; but that, though now his estate was ruined, yet he knew himself innocent, and would venture all the poor remains of his estate on the issue of the trial.

V. 9—15. Here are two more instances of Job's integrity.

I. His very great abhorrence of adultery. See here,

1. How clear he was from this sin, v. 9. (1.) He did not so much as covet his neighbor's wife, for even his heart was not deceived by a woman. The beauty of another man's wife did not kindle in him any unchaste desires, nor was he ever moved by the allurements of an adulterous woman, such as is described, Prov. 5: 6, &c. See the original of all the defilements of this life; they come from a deceived heart. Every sin is deceitful, and none more so than the sin of uncleanness. (2.) He never compassed or imagined any unchaste design. See ch. 24: 15.

2. What a dread he had of this sin, and what frightful apprehensions of its malignity, v. 11. as one of the greatest, vilest sins a man can be guilty of, highly provoking to God, and destructive to the prosperity of the soul. With respect to the mischievousness of it, and the punishment it deserved, he owns that, if he were guilty of that heinous crime, (1.) His family might justly be made infamous in the highest degree, v. 10. Let my wife grind to another. Let her be a slave, so some; a harlot, so others. God often punishes the adultery of the husband with the adultery of the wife, as in David's case, which does not in the least excuse the treachery of the adulterous wife; but, how unrighteous soever she is, God is righteous. See Hos. 4: 13. Note, Those who are not just and faithful to their relations, must not think it strange, if their relations be unjust and unfaithful to them. (2.) He himself might justly be made a public example; For it is an iniquity to be punished by the judges; yea, though the guilty are themselves judges, as Job. Note, Adultery is a crime the civil magistrate ought to take cognizance of, and punish: so it was adjudged even in the patriarchal age, before the law of Moses made it capital. It is an evil work, to which the sword of justice ought to be a terror. (3.) It might justly become the ruin of his estate; nay, he knew it would be so, v. 12. Lust is a fire in the soul: they that indulge it, are said to burn. It consumes all that is good there, (the convictions, the comforts,) and lays the conscience waste. It kindles the fire of God's wrath, which, if not extinguished by the blood of Christ, will burn to the lowest hell. It will consume even to that eternal destruction. It consumes the body, (Prov. 5: 11.) it consumes the substance, it roots out all the increase. Burning lusts bring burning judgments. Perhaps it alludes to the burning of Sodom, which was intended for an example to those who should afterward, in like manner, live ungodly.

II. He had a very great tenderness for his servants, and managed it well. By this he evidenced his sincerity, that he had grace to govern his passion as well as his appetite; and he that in these two things has the rule of his own spirit, is better than the mighty, Prov. 16: 32. Here observe,

1. Job's condescensions to his servants, v. 13. If they contradicted him in any thing, he was willing to hear their reasons. If they had offended him, or were accused to him, he would patiently hear what they had to say for themselves in their own vindication or excuse. Nay, if they complained of any hardship he put on them, he did not brow-beat them, and bid them hold their tongues, but gave them leave to tell their story, and redressed their grievances, as far as it appeared they had right on their side. He was tender of them, not only when they served him and pleased him, but even when they contended with him. Herein, he was a great example to masters, to give unto servants what is just and equal; nay, to do the same things to them, that they expect from them, (Col. 4: 1. Eph. 6: 9.) and not to rule them with rigor, and carry it with a high hand. Many of Job's servants were slain in his service, (ch. 1: 15—17.) the rest were unkind and undutiful, and despised his cause, though he never despised theirs; (ch. 19: 15, 16.) but he had this comfort, that in prosperity he had behaved well to them. Note, When relations are either removed from, or imbittered to us, the testimony of our consciences, that we have done our duty to them, will be a great support and comfort.

2. The considerations that moved him to treat his servants thus kindly; he had, herein, an eye to God, both as his Judge, and their Maker.

we are concerned to consider what we shall do in the day of his visitation, (Isa. 10: 3.) and, considering that we are undone, if God should then be strait and severe with us, we ought to be very mild and gentle towards all with whom we have to do. And let not us be rigorous with our inferiors. Consider what will become of us, if we be cruel and unmerciful to our brethren. The cries of the injured will be heard, the sins of the injurious will be punished, they that showed no mercy, shall find none; and what shall we do then?

(2.) As his and his servants' Creator, v. 15. 'I am a creature as well as he; he partakes of the same nature, and is the work of the same hand; have we not all one Father?' Note, Whatever difference there is among men in their outward condition, capacity of mind, strength of body, or place in the world, He that made the one, made the other also; which is a good reason why we should not mock at men's natural infirmities, nor trample on persons any way our inferiors, but, in every thing, do as we would be done by. It is a rule of justice, Let equals be equally estimated and treated; therefore, since there is so great a parity among men, they being all made of the same mould, by the same power, for the same end, notwithstanding the disparity of our outward condition, we are bound so far to set ourselves on the level with those we deal with, as to do to them, in all respects, as we would they should do to us.

V. 16—23. Eliphaz had particularly charged Job with unmercifulness to the poor, ch. 22: 6, &c. yet it appears by Job's protestation, his charge was utterly false and groundless. See here,

I. The testimony of Job's conscience, concerning his constant behavior toward the poor. He is most large on this head, because in this matter he was most particularly accused. He solemnly protests,

1. That he had never been wanting to do good to them, as there was occasion, to the utmost of his ability. He was always compassionate to the poor, especially destitute widows and fatherless. (1.) He was always ready to grant their desires, and answer their expectations, v. 16. (2.) He respected and honored them, v. 17. As it is one of the greatest grievances of poverty, that it exposes to contempt, SO IT IS NONE OF THE LEAST SUPPORTS TO THE POOR, TO BE RESPECTED. (3.) He was very tender of them, and had a fatherly concern for them, v. 18. He was a father to the fatherless, brought them up, and gave them, not only maintenance, but education. He was a guide to the widow, advised her in her affairs, took cognizance of them, and undertook their management. Those that need not our alms, may yet have occasion for our counsel, and it is a real kindness. This, Job says, he did from his birth, i. e. he had something of tenderness and compassion woven in his nature; and his parents taught him betimes to pity and relieve the poor, and brought up orphans with him. (4.) He took particular care to clothe them that were without covering, which would be more expensive to him than feeding them, v. 19, 20. Poor people may perish for want of clothing, as well as for want of food. Job's sheep were burned with fire from heaven; but this was his comfort, that, when he had them, he came honestly by them, and used them charitably, fed the poor with their flesh, and clothed them with their wool.

2. That he had never been accessary to the wronging of any that were poor. It might be said, perhaps, that he was kind here and there to a poor orphan that was a favorite, but to others he was oppressive. No, he was tender of all, and injurious to none, v. 21. Those that have it in their power to do a wrong thing, and go through with it, and a prospect of getting by it, and yet do justly, and love mercy, and are firm to both, may afterward reflect on it with much comfort, as Job does here.

II. The imprecation wherewith he confirms this protestation, v. 22. that is, 'Let the flesh rot off from the bone, and one bone be disjointed and broken off from another.' Had he not been perfectly clear in this matter, he durst not thus have challenged the divine vengeance. And he intimates, that it is a righteous thing with God to break the arm that is lifted up against the fatherless, as he withered Jeroboam's arm that was stretched out against a prophet.

III. The principles by which Job was restrained from all uncharitableness and unmercifulness; God being the Patron of oppressed poverty, who will not let oppressors go unpunished, v. 23. Good men, even the best, have need to restrain themselves from sin with the fear of destruction from God, and all little enough. This should especially restrain us from all acts of injustice and oppression—that God Himself is the Avenger thereof. Even Adam, in innocency, was awed with a threatening.

V. 24—32. Four articles more of Job's protestation we have in these vs. which, as all the rest, not only assure us what he was and did, but teach us what we should be and do.

I. He protests, he never set his heart on the wealth of this world, nor took the things of it for his portion and happiness. Our wealth is either advantageous or pernicious to us, according as we stand affected to it. If we make it our rest and our ruler, it will be our ruin; if we make it our servant and an instrument of righteousness, it will be a blessing to us. Job here tells how he stood affected to his worldly wealth, 1. He put no great confidence in it, v. 24. They are very unwise that do, and enemies to themselves. Some make it their hope and confidence for another world, as if it were a certain token of God's favor: and those who have so much sense as not to think so, yet promise themselves that it will be a portion for them in this life, whereas the things themselves are uncertain, and our satisfaction in them much more so. It is hard to have riches, and not to trust in riches; and that is it which makes it so difficult for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God. 2. He took no great complacency in it, v. 25. as if it added any thing to his real excellency, or in comparison with the spiritual things which were the delight of his soul. His joy did not terminate in the gift, but passed through it to the Giver. He never said, Soul, take thine ease in these things, nor blessed himself in his riches. He did not inordinately rejoice in his wealth; and that helped him to bear the loss of it so patiently. The way to weep as though we wept not, is, to rejoice as though we rejoiced not.

II. He protests he was never guilty of idolatry, v. 26—28. We do not find his friends charged him with this. But there were those, it seems, at that time, who were so sottish as to worship the sun and moon, else he would not have mentioned it. The most ancient idolatry was, the worshipping of the sun and moon, to which the temptation was most strong, as appears, (Deut. 4: 19) where Moses speaks of the danger the people were in of being driven to worship them. But, as yet, it was practised secretly, and durst not appear in open view, as, afterward, the most abominable idolatries did. Observe,

1. How far Job kept from this sin. Some think Baal was designed to represent the sun; but Job never worshipped the sun, or the moon. He kept his heart with all diligence, that that should not be secretly enticed to think, that there is a divine glory in their brightness, or a divine power in

(M. R. t. Note, Deut. 4:19.) The words, rendered 'an iniquity to be punished by the judge,' have led some to think that this book was written, after the giving of the Mosaic law: but the circumstance of no idolatry, except that of the sun and moon being mentioned, is a much more probable argument in favor of a higher antiquity. The judicial law for punishing idolatry by the magistrate, seems to have been intended for Israel alone, as under the Sinai-covenant. The plural of the same word is used and rendered judges, when the punishment of adulterers is spoken of. (11) Adultery is a crime, which their influence, and that therefore divine honors are to be paid to them. Here is the source of idolatry; it begins in the heart; every man is tempted to that, as to other sins, when he is drawn away by his own lust and enticed. Job did not so much as put a compliment on these pretended deities, did not perform the least and lowest act of adoration. His mouth did not kiss his hand, which, it is likely, was a ceremony then commonly used, even by some that yet would not be thought idolaters. It is a long-established piece of civil respect among ourselves, in making a bow, to kiss the hand; a form, it seems, anciently used in giving divine honors to the sun and moon; they could not reach to kiss them, as the men that sacrificed kissed the calves; (Hos. 13:2. 1 K. 10:18.) but, to show their good will, they kissed their hand, reverencing those as their masters, which God has made servants to this lower world, to hold the candle for us: Job never did it.

2. How ill Job thought of this sin, v. 28. (1.) He looked upon it as a public nuisance. Idolatry debauches men's minds, corrupts their manners, takes off the true sense of religion, which is the great bond of societies, and provokes God to give men up to a reprobate sense, and to send judgments on a nation; therefore the conservators of the public peace are concerned to restrain it by punishing it. (2.) He looked upon it as a much greater affront to the God of heaven, and no less than high treason against his crown and dignity. Idolatry is, in effect, atheism; hence the Gentiles are said to be without God (atheists) in the world. Note, We should be afraid of every thing that does but implicitly deny the God above, his providence, or any of his perfections.*

III. He protests, he was so far from doing or designing mischief to any, that he neither desired nor delighted in the hurt of the worst enemy he had. The forgiving of those that do us evil, it seems, was Old Testament duty. The Pharisees made the law concerning it of no effect, by teaching, Thou shalt love thy neighbor, and hate thine enemy.

Those about him, were so enraged at his enemy who hated him, that they could have eaten him, if Job would but have set them on, or given them leave. See how much beloved Job was by his family; see what a strict hand also Job kept on his passions, that he would not avenge himself, though he had those about him that blew the coals of his resentment. Note, (1.) A good man commonly does not himself lay to heart the affronts done him, so much as his friends do for him. (2.) Great men have commonly those about them that stir them up to revenge. David had, 1 Sam. 24: 4.—26: 8. 2 Sam. 16: 9. But if they keep their temper, notwithstanding the spiteful insinuations of those about them, afterward it shall be no grief to them, but shall turn very much to their praise, and comfort.

IV. He protests, that he had never been unkind or inhospitable to strangers, v. 32. He that is at home, must consider those that are from home, and put his soul into their soul's stead, and then do as he would be done by. Hospitality is a Christian duty, 1 Pet. 4: 9. Job, in his prosperity, was noted for good house-keeping: He opened his door to the road; so it may be read; he kept the street door open, that he might see who passed by, and he invited them in, as Abraham, Gen. 18: 1.

V. 33—40. We have here Job's protestation against three more sins, together with his general appeal to God's bar, and his petition for a hearing there, which, it is likely, was intended to conclude his discourse, (and therefore we will consider it last,) but that another particular sin occurred, from which he thought it requisite to acquit himself. He clears himself from the charge,

I. Of dissimulation and hypocrisy, the general crime his friends accused him of. Zophar insinuated, (ch. 20:12.) that he hid his iniquity under his tongue. It is natural to us to cover our sins; we have it from our first parents; we are loath to confess our faults, willing to extenuate them, and make the best of ourselves, to devolve the blame on others, not without a tacit reflection on God Himself. But he that thus covers his sins shall not prosper.

II. Of cowardice and base fear. His courage in doing good, he produces as evidence of sincerity in it, v. 34. All that knew Job, knew him to be a man of undaunted resolution in a good cause, that never was threatened or brow-beaten out of his duty, but set his face as a flint. Observe, 1. What great conscience Job had made of his duty as a magistrate, or a man of reputation, in the place where he lived. The case may be such, that it may be our sin to be silent and retired; as when we are called to reprove sin, and bear our testimony against it, to vindicate the truths and ways of God, to right the injured or oppressed, or any way to serve the public, or do honor to our religion. 2. What little account Job made of discouragements in duty. He valued not the clamors of the mob; was not deterred by the number or quality, the scorns or insults, of the injurious, from doing justice to the injured; no, he scorned to be swayed and biassed by any such considerations, nor ever suffered a righteous cause to be run down by a high hand. He feared the great God, not the great multitude, and his curse, not the contempt of families.

III. From the charge of oppression, violence, and wrong to his poor neighbors.

1. His estate he both got and used honestly, so his land could not cry out against him, nor the furrows thereof complain, (v. 38.) as they do against those who get the possession of them by fraud and extortion, Hab. 2: 9—11. (2.) That he never ate the fruits of his estate without money, v. 39. What he purchased, he paid for, as Abraham, (Gen. 23: 16.) and David, 2 Sam. 23: 24. The laborers he employed had their wages duly, and if he used the fruits of any lands he let out, he paid his tenants for them, or allowed it in their rent. (2.) He never caused the owners thereof to lose their life, as Ahab got Naboth's vineyard, killing the heir and seizing the inheritance; never starved

* The use of the term nature, tends in some degree to prevent that direct and simple reference of every event to God, universally prevalent in the Bible. tends to destroy the peace of society, and, as such, falls directly under the cognizance of magistrates; but idolatry is committed immediately against God: and if our translation be just, He, as the Judge of the world, seems meant, and not the civil magistrate. May not the Heb. signify my Judge, meaning God Himself? Especially as Job was speaking of a supposed crime, concealed from man. (Note, Deut. 27: 15.) SCOTT.

(27.) 'Adoration, or the religious act of kissing the hand, comes to us from the Latin, ad, to, and os, oris, the mouth. The hand lifted up to the mouth, and there saluted by the lips.' Dr. A. Clarke. Three different customs in the E. seem connected with putting the hand to the mouth. In Persia, formerly, a person covered the mouth before a royal personage, as it was considered impolite to breathe upon him: this is seen in the cut, Esth. 5:2. and on the monument whence that picture was taken, an ambassador stands before the king with his hand on his mouth. Kissing the hand was also considered an act of worship by the early Christians, note, Ezra 1:3. Kissing the hand is also still a salute, among the Turks, Arabs, &c. to a passing traveller. Henry, see above, has well and sufficiently illustrated the v. The sun was worshipped at his rising, the moon at her change. ED.

Stranger, &c.] 'Hospitality was, and still is, the national character of the Arabs. They value themselves upon it as their highest glory. One of their poets expresses himself very warmly on this subject: "How often, when echo gave me notice of a stranger's approach, have I stirred my fire that it might give a clear blaze! I flew to him as to a prey, through fear that my neighbors should get possession of him before me." The echo here refers to the practice of a stranger who travels in Arabia by night. He imitates the barking of a dog, and thus sets all the curs in the neighborhood a barking; whereupon the people rush out from all parts, striving who shall get the stranger first. Scott, in HEWLETT.

those that held lands of him, nor killed them with hard bargains and hard usage. No tenant, no workman, no servant, he had, could complain of him.

2. He confirms this protestation, as often before, with a suitable imprecation, v. 40. When men get estates unjustly, they are justly deprived of the comfort of them, and disappointed in their expectations from them. What men do not come honestly by, will never do them any good.

Job, toward the close of his protestation, appeals to the judgment-seat of God concerning the truth of it, v. 35—37. Oh that He would hear me, even that the Almighty would answer me! This was what he often desired, and often complained that he could not obtain; and now, that he had drawn up his own defence so particularly, he leaves it on record, in expectation of a hearing, files it, as it were, till his cause be called.

3. A trial is moved for, and the motion earnestly pressed, v. 35. An upright heart does not dread a scrutiny: he that means honestly, wishes he had a window in his breast, that all men might see the intents of his heart. But an upright heart does particularly desire to be determined in every thing by the judgment of God, which, we are sure, is according to truth. It was holy David's prayer, Search me, O God, and know my heart; and it was blessed Paul's comfort, He that judgeth me, is the Lord. (1.) The prosecutor is called, and ordered to bring in his information, to say what he has to say against the prisoner, for he stands on his deliverance. 'Oh that mine adversary had written a book.' Job would be very glad to have a copy of his indictment; he would not hide it under his arm, but take it on his shoulder, to be seen and read of all men, nay, he would bind it as a crown to him, would be pleased with it, and look upon it as his ornament; for, [1.] If it discovered to him any sin he had been guilty of, which he did not yet see, he should be glad to know it, that he might repent of it, and get it pardoned. A good man is willing to know the worst of himself, and will be thankful to those that will faithfully tell him of his faults. [2.] If it charged him falsely, he doubted not to clear up his innocency, and come off with so much the more honor. But, [3.] He did believe, that, when his adversaries came to consider the matter so closely, as to put the charge in writing, the accusations would be trivial, and every one that saw them would say, 'If this was all they had to say against him, it was a shame they had given him so much trouble.' (2.) PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

'The grace of God, which bringeth salvation,' has, in all ages, 'taught men to deny ungodliness and worldly lusts, and to live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world.' Repentance and faith produce hatred of sin, and love to God and man; and our interest in redeeming love is evidenced by a course of conscientious obedience. In general, however, it is best to let our actions speak for us: and though, in some cases, we owe to ourselves and to the cause of God, a solemn protestation of innocency, as to those crimes of which we are falsely accused; yet this is seldom made without some real or apparent ostentation.—While we pray to the LORD 'to turn away our eyes from beholding vanity,' we should be careful to have all our senses and faculties occupied about lawful things: and, lest secrecy or the hope of impunity entice us, we should habitually recollect, that 'the LORD sees our ways and counts all our steps.'—Without strict honesty and fidelity in all our dealings, we can have no good evidence of true godliness. Yet how many, who profess to believe the Gospel of Christ, are unable to bear this touchstone!—Alas! that [impurity, too great indulgence of the sexual propensity, and even] adultery also should be so common among professed Christians!—How contrary to it, must it be to Christianity, for men to enslave, oppress, and plunder the poor, because they 'see their help in the gate,'—have the law of the land and the countenance of the ruler on their side! (Jam. 2:13.) These crimes spring from [selfish pride and] covetousness, which make gold a man's confidence Divine grace destroys this idolatry; yet it is to be feared, tha but few prosperous Christians can properly appeal to a heart-searching God, that they have not rejoiced because their gains were great. (1 Tim. 6:6—10.)—It is indeed a great favor to be preserved from all the false and fashionable kinds of religion, which from age to age supplant 'the truth as it is in Jesus,' and its sanctifying effects; and which eventually prove 'a denial of God above.' The Holy Spirit has always taught the children of God to do good against evil; to bless, and not to curse, their enemies; [to do justice, disinterestedly and without respect of persons;] to repress revenge; to forgive as they hope to be forgiven; to avoid all rejoicing in calamities; and to restrain others from revenge and cruelty.—In respect of all these things, in using hospitality, without grudging, being ready for every good work, and in every particular, we should examine, with prayer, how far we are followers of this ancient believer. If our conscience testify for us, we should give God the praise, and may hope to stand with humble boldness, as justified believers, before his judgment-seat. But let us all judge ourselves, and not cover our sins: and where we are guilty, let us seek forgiveness; entreating 'the Lord to have mercy upon us, and 'to write all his laws in our hearts,' by the new creating power of his Holy Spirit. CHAP. XXXII.

Job's three friends being silenced, Elihu speaks, and is angry both with Job and them, 1—5. He excuses his interference, though young; because great and aged men are not always wise, 6—10. He complains, that the reasonings of the disputants were not suited to produce conviction, 11—14. He shows that he is earnestly desirous of speaking; and declares that he will be impartial, 15—22.

SO these three men ceased * to answer Job, because he was [a] righteous in his own eyes.

2 Then was [b] kindled the wrath of Elihu the son of Barachel the [c] Buzite, of the kindred of Ram: against Job was his wrath kindled, [d] because he justified † himself rather than God.

3 Also against his three friends was his wrath kindled, [e] because they had found no answer, [f] and yet had condemned Job.

cuser to hear his charge, and to his Judge to hear his doom. Thus the testimony of his conscience was his rejoicing. Those that have kept their hands without spot from the world, as Job did, may lift up their faces without spot unto God; and may comfort themselves with the prospect of his judgment, when they lie under the unjust censures of men. If our hearts condemn us not, then have we confidence toward God.

Thus the words of Job in this controversy are ended. He now keeps the field, and doubts not but to win it. Who shall lay any thing to the charge of God's elect? It is God that justifies.

CHAP. XXXII. V. 1—5. Usually young men are the disputants, and old men the moderators: but here, when old men were the disputants, as a rebuke for their unbecoming heat, a young man is raised up as moderator. Divers of Job's friends were present, to visit him, and receive instruction. Now here we have,

I. The reason his three friends were silent; they alleged, it was to no purpose to argue with so opinionative a man, v. 1. The self-conceited are indeed hard to be wrought upon; but they did not judge fairly of Job: he was really righteous before God, and not righteous only in his own eyes; so that it was only to save their own credit, that they made this the reason of their silence, as peevish disputants commonly do, when they find themselves run a-ground, and are not willing to own themselves unable to make their part good.

II. The reasons why Elihu, the fourth, now spake. His name Elihu signifies My God is he. He is said to be a Buzite, from Buz, Nahor's second son, (Gen. 22: 21.) and of the kindred of Ram, i. e. Aram; so some; (Gen. 22: 21.) whence the Syrians or Aramites descended and were denominated. Of the kindred of Abram; so the Chaldee paraphrase; supposing him to be the first called Ram, High, then Abram, a high father, and lastly, Abraham, The high father of a multitude. Elihu was not so well known as the rest, therefore is more particularly described thus.

1. Elihu spake because he was angry, and thought he had good cause to be so. Job, he thought, did not speak so reverently of God as he ought to have done; which was too true, v. 2. He took more care and pains to clear himself than to clear God, as if he were more concerned for his own honor than for God's; whereas he should, in the first place, have justified God, and cleared his glory, and then he might well enough have left his own reputation to shift for itself. Note, A gracious heart is jealous for the honor of God, and cannot but be angry, when that is neglected or postponed, or any injury done it. Nor is it any breach of the law of meekness, to be angry at our friends when they are offensive to God; Get thee behind me, Satan, says Christ to Simon. Elihu owned Job to be a good man, yet would not say as he said, when he thought he said amiss: it is too great a compliment to our friends, not to tell them of their faults.

2. He was angry at his friends, because he thought they had not been so candid to Job as they ought to have been, v. 3. They had adjudged him to be a hypocrite, a wicked man, and would not recede from that sentence; yet could not prove him so, nor disprove his evidences of integrity. Seldom is a quarrel begun, and more seldom carried on to the length this was, where there is not a fault on both sides. Elihu, as became a moderator, took part with neither, but was equally displeased with the mistakes and mismanagement of both. Those that in good earnest seek for truth, must thus be impartial, and learn to separate between the precious and the vile.

3. Elihu spake because he thought it was time, and now, at length, his turn, v. 4, 5. He had patiently heard Job out, and modestly waited on his friends' silence; because they were elder. Some certain rules of precedency must be observed, for the sake of order: and though this can afford no certain criterion of merit, yet seniors may the better require this respect, because they paid it when juniors, and juniors may better pay it, because they shall have it when seniors.

V. 6—14. Elihu here appears to be,

I. A young man of great modesty, humility, and abilities. Let his diffidence, (v. 6.) and deference to his seniors, (v. 7.) be observed by all, especially by young people, as worthy their imitation. Observant of all that passed, he had formed in himself a judgment of it; but, how clear soever the matter was to himself, he was afraid to deliver himself upon it, because he differed in his sentiments from those who were older. Note, It becomes us to be suspicious of our own judgment in matters of doubtful disputation, to be swift to hear the sentiments of others, and slow to speak our own, especially when we go contrary to the judgment of those whom, on the score of their learning and piety, we justly venerate. Age and experience give a man great advantage in judging of things, both as they furnish a man with so much the more matter for his thoughts to work upon, and as they ripen and improve the faculties he is to work with; which is a good reason why old people should take pains both to learn, themselves, and to teach others, (else the advantages of their age are a reproach to them,) and why young people should attend on their instructions: it is good lodging with an old disciple, Acts 21: 16. Tit. 2: 4.

Elihu's modesty appeared in the patient attention he gave to what his seniors said, v. 11, 12. They were slow, and sometimes trifled, and none of them answered Job's words, yet he attended to them, in hopes they would bring the matter to some head at last. We must often be willing to hear what we do not like, else we cannot prove all things. He pleads his patient attendance, 1. As entitling him to speak freely in his turn, and to claim their attention. 2. As enabling him to pass a judgment on what they had said: he had observed what they aimed at, and therefore knew what to say to it. Let us be thoroughly apprized of the sentiments of our brethren, before we censure them; for he that answers a matter before he hears it, or when he has heard it only by halves, it is folly and shame to him, and bespeaks him both impertinent and imperious.

II. He appears to have been a man of great sense and courage, that knew as well when and how to speak, as to keep silence. He respected his friends, so as not to interrupt them, yet so much regarded truth and justice, (his better friends,) as not to betray them by his silence. He boldly pleads,

1. That man is a rational creature, and therefore every man has for himself a judgment of discretion, and ought to be allowed to speak in his turn. He means (v. 8.) the same Job did, (ch. 12: 3.) I have understanding as well as you; only he expresses it a little more modestly, that one man has understanding as well as another, and no man can pretend to have the monopoly of reason, or to engross all the trade of it. Had he meant, I have revelation as well as you, (as some understand it,) he must have proved it; but if he meant

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXII. V. 1. 'Elihu offers this solution of the difficult question agitated: That indeed all who struggle even with most afflictive evils are not to be considered impious, nor as suffering the punishment of intentional wickedness: but yet that there lurks, even in the most pious, a secret infection of sin, of which themselves are not conscious; that this is to be curbed by such searching medicine, lest, the evil gradually increasing, the good man slide into wickedness; that these are salutary castigations, and not penal, nor for public example. So he speaks best of all: and Job, unable to answer him, is silent; and when God is introduced, the rest are reproved as having greatly sinned, but Elihu escapes reprehension, and his truth is confirmed by the divine oracle.' ROSENM.

Verses 2—5.

It is evident, that others besides the disputants were present during this controversy, and Elihu among the rest. Many singular opinions have been formed concerning him: unquestionably, he was a young man of singular modesty and wisdom: and not more than man, as some have imagined. He came indeed nearer the true state of the case, than any other of the contending parties; but he bore too hard on Job, and, in some instances, put harsh constructions on his words. (34:5—9.) He, however, charged him with no crime, except his misconduct in the management of the argument; and in this respect he was justly displeased both with him and his friends. SCOTT.

9 [m] Great men are not always wise: [n] neither do the aged understand judgment.

10 Therefore I said, [o] Hearken to me; I also will show mine opinion.

11 Behold [p] I waited for your words; I gave ear to your * reasons, [q] while ye searched out † what to say.

12 Yea, I attended unto you, and, [r] behold, there was none of you that convinced Job, or that answered his words:

13 [s] Lest ye should say, [t] We have found out wisdom: [u] God thrusteth him down, not man.

14 Now he hath not ‡ directed his words against me: neither will I answer him with your speeches.

15 They were [x] amazed, they answered no more: they § left off speaking.

16 When I had waited, ([y] for they spake not, but stood still, and answered no more;)

17 I said, [z] I will answer also my part, I also will shew mine opinion.

18 For I am full of ‖ matter, [a] the spirit ¶ within me constraineth me.

19 Behold my belly is as wine which  hath no vent; it is ready to burst like [b] new bottles.

20 [c] I will speak, that I may †† be refreshed: [d] I will open my lips and answer.

21 Let me not, I pray you, [e] accept any man's person, neither let me give [f] flattering titles unto man.

22 For [g] I know not to give flattering titles; in so doing my Maker would soon take me away.

only, I have reason as well as you, they cannot deny it, for it is every man's honor, and it is no presumption to claim it, nor could they gainsay his inference from it, v. 10. Learn here, 1. That the soul is a spirit, neither material itself, nor dependent on matter, but capable of conversing with things spiritual, which are not the objects of sense. 2. It is an understanding spirit. It is able to discover and receive truth, to discourse and reason upon it, and to direct and rule accordingly. 3. This understanding spirit is in every man; it is the light that lighteth every man, John 1: 9. 4. It is the inspiration of the Almighty, that gives us this understanding spirit; for He is the Father of spirits, and Fountain of understanding. See Gen. 2: 7. Eccl. 12: 7. Zech. 12: 1.

2. That those who are advanced above others in grandeur and gravity, do not always proportionably go beyond them in knowledge and wisdom, v. 9. Great men are not always wise: it is pity but they were, for then they would never do hurt with their greatness, and would do so much the more good with their wisdom. The aged do not always understand judgment, even they may make mistakes, and therefore must not expect to bring every thought into obedience to them; nay, therefore they must not take it as an affront to be contradicted, but rather take it as a kindness to be instructed, by their juniors: Therefore I said, Hearken to me, v. 10. We must be willing to hear reason from those that are every way inferior to us, and to yield to it. Better is a poor and wise child, than an old and foolish king.

3. That it was requisite something should be said, to set this controversy in a true light, which, by all that had hitherto been said, was but rendered more intricate and perplexed, v. 13. 'I must speak, to show you that yours is a false hypothesis about Job, and that he may be convinced without maintaining it.' Or, 'Lest you should think you have found out the wisest way, to reason no more with him, but leave it to God to thrust him down.' It is time to speak, when we hear errors advanced and disputed for, especially under pretence of supporting the cause of God with them. It is time to speak, when God's judgments are vouched to patronise men's pride and passion, and their unjust, uncharitable censures of their brethren; then we must speak on God's behalf.

4. That he had something new to offer, and would endeavor to manage the dispute in a better manner than it had hitherto been managed, v. 14. He thinks he may expect a favorable hearing; for, (1.) He will not reply to Job's protestations of his integrity, but allow the truth of them, and therefore does not interpose as his enemy: 'He hath not directed his words against me; I have nothing to say against the main of his discourse, nor do I differ from his principles. I have only a gentle reproof to give him for his passionate expressions.' (2.) He will not repeat their arguments, nor go upon their principles; 'Neither will

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The self-flattery of the human heart often prevents men from being convinced of their errors, or from acknowledging that they are; and it is not worth while to persist in arguing with the pertinacious and self-sufficient, or with such as are 'righteous in their own eyes:' yet sometimes those who are accepted with God, and have truth and justice on their side, are unjustly charged with obstinacy and self-confidence.—An unprejudiced by-stander frequently understands controverted points, better than the eager disputants, [and a disputant seldom or never acknowledges his error.]—If we perceive others in a fault, it is generally advisable, to mention it before them: and it is not sinful anger, if we are greatly displeased to hear God dishonored, his truths misrepresented, and men unjustly condemned, or fatally deceived. (Mark 3: 5.)—It belongs to the aged to take the lead in conversation, and to teach wisdom; and modesty, and deference towards seniors and superiors, always become the young. Yet reason is common to man, and God communicates both natural abilities and spiritual gifts, in measure, as He pleases. 'So that great men are not always wise, neither do the aged understand judgment:' and by an attention to the Word of God, and dependence on his Spirit, the young may become wiser than the aged, than their teachers, and their rulers. (Ps. 119:98—100.) But this wisdom will render them 'swift to hear, and slow to speak,' and disposed to give others a patient attention, though they seem to argue inconclusively, and to say little to the purpose. However full we may think ourselves of suitable matter, for the conviction of others, and the termination of a controversy; and whatever uneasiness we feel in keeping silence, when others are discoursing, as we think, in a manner contrary to truth; we should remember, that it is indecent, and savors of arrogance, to interrupt them. Nay, if we were sure, that the Spirit of God suggested to us what we were about to say, we ought to refrain, until it fairly come to our turn to speak: for 'the spirits of the prophets were subject to the prophets,' and God is the Source of order, and not of confusion. (1 Cor. 14:32,33.) The faithful minister of God will regard times and seasons, but he must speak, whether men will hear or forbear; and faithfully, without respect of persons, or knowing to give flattering titles: for 'he is not a man-pleaser, but a servant of Jesus Christ;' and is ambitious, whether present or absent, of being accepted of Him. (2 Cor. 5:9—12,16. 1 Thes. 2:1—8.)

These vs. favor the opinion, that Elihu was the writer of this book. SCOTT.

(16.) 'Lightfoot thinks Elihu wrote this book of Job, because when, in ch. 2. Job's friends who came to comfort him are mentioned by number and name, nothing is said of Elihu: whence it is evident, 1st, that Elihu did not come from a great distance, as the rest, but was a neighbor; 2d, that he is the author and writer of the history; for which reason, when he names the others, he is silent about himself. Further, because in these vs. 16 and 17 of this ch. Elihu speaks as the historian. So also Staeudlein.' ROSENM.

Verses 18—22.

Elihu's mind was agitated by his own meditations, in the manner that fermenting wine is ready to burst the bottle when it cannot have vent [note and cut, Matt. 9:16, 17.]; so that it would be a relief, or enlargement, to him to speak, though it should not profit them. (Jer. 6:10—12. 20:7—9. Ez. 3:12—15.) Give flattering titles. (22.) The original word signifies, to give an additional name, as a title of distinction. SCOTT.

(19.) Wine.] 'The new wine or must is to be understood, and the phrase, new skin-bottles, must be used for bottles filled with new wine, as old bottles would be more likely to burst than new ones. Matt. 9:17. Jerome tr. "behold my belly is like new wine without a vent."' ROSENM. Belly.] Note, 15:2. Yet it seems doubtful if the orientals made the distinction there noticed. ED.

CHAP. XXXIII.

Elihu requires Job's attention, while he pleads with him, in God's stead, and without terrifying him, 1—7. He blames him for being too earnest in vindicating himself, and for irreverently complaining of God, 8—13. He shows how God instructs men by dreams, afflictions, and messengers; that repenting they may find mercy, 14—30. He calls on Job to answer, or patiently to attend to his discourse, 31—33.

WHEREFORE, Job, I pray thee, [a] hear my speeches, and hearken to all my words.

2 Behold now [b] I have opened my mouth, my tongue hath spoken in my * mouth.

3 My words shall be of [c] the uprightness of my heart: and [d] my lips shall utter knowledge clearly.

4 [e] The Spirit of God hath made me, and the breath of the Almighty hath given me life.

5 [f] If thou canst answer me, [g] set thy words in order before me: [h] stand up.

6 Behold, [i] I am according to thy † wish [k] in God's stead: [l] I am also ‡ formed out of the clay.

7 Behold, [m] my terror shall not make thee afraid, neither shall [n] my hand be heavy upon thee.

I answer him with your speeches: not with the same matter; nor in the same manner; I will not be guilty of that peevishness toward him myself, which I dislike in you.' The controversy that has already been fully handled, a wise man will let alone, unless he can amend and improve it.

V. 15—22. Three things here apologize for Elihu's interposing in this controversy.

1. The way was now clear, and he did not break in upon any one on either side, v. 15, 16. so that (as we say) he had room and fair play given him. The disputants seemed not fully satisfied themselves with what they had said, else they would have adjourned the court, and not have stood still, expecting what might further be offered. And therefore I said, (v. 17.) 'I will answer also my part. Since you have each of you showed your opinion, I also will show mine, and let it take its fate with the rest.' When what is offered, even by the meanest, is offered thus modestly, it is pity but it should be fairly heard and considered.

I see no inconvenience in supposing, that Elihu here discovers himself to be the penman of this book; and that he here writes as an historian, relating the matter of fact, that, after he had bespoken their attention in the foregoing vs. they were amazed, left off whispering among themselves, did not gainsay the liberty of speech he desired, but stood still to hear what he would say, being much surprised at the admirable mixture of boldness and modesty that appeared in his preface.

2. He was uneasy, and even in pain, to be delivered of his thoughts on this matter, v. 18—20. He pleads, (1.) That he had a great deal to say. When aged men have spent their stock, in discoursing of the Divine Providence, God can raise up others, even young men, and fill them with matter, for the edifying of his church, for it is a subject that can never be exhausted, though they that speak to it may. (2.) That he was under a necessity of saying it, v. 19. See what a grief it is to a good minister to be silenced, and thrust into a corner; he is full of matter, full of Christ, full of heaven, and would speak of these things for the good of others, but he may not. (3.) That it would be an ease and satisfaction to himself, to deliver his mind, v. 20. It is a great refreshment to a good man, to have liberty to speak for the glory of God and the edification of others.

3. He was resolved to speak, with all possible freedom and sincerity, what he thought was true, not what he thought would please, v. 21, 22. He would not make Job's case better than he really took it to be, for fear of increasing his grief. The afflicted must not be flattered, but dealt faithfully with: when trouble is upon any, it is foolish pity to suffer sin upon them too, (Lev. 19: 17.) for that is the worst addition to their trouble. Thou shalt not countenance, any more than discountenance, a poor man in his cause, (Ex. 23: 3.) nor regard a sad look any more than a big look, so as, for the sake of it, to pervert justice, for that is accepting persons. No, though a young man, and on his preferment, he will not dissemble truth, to court their favor, though great men: his is a good resolution, 'I know not to give flattering titles;' and he gives a good reason for it; 'In so doing my Maker would soon take me away.' It is good to keep ourselves in awe with a holy fear of God's judgments: He that made us will take us away in his wrath, if we do not conduct ourselves as we should, Ps. 12: 3. The more closely we eye the majesty of God, as our Maker, and dread his justice, the less danger shall we be in of dissimulation, and a sinful fearing, or flattering, of men.

CHAP. XXXIII. V. 1—7. Pompous prefaces, like the teeming mountain, often introduce poor performances: but Elihu's discourse here does not disappoint the expectations his preface had raised: it is substantial, lively, and very much to the purpose. He had, in the foregoing ch. said what he had to say to Job's three friends; and now he directs his speech to Job himself. Several arguments Elihu here uses, to persuade Job to give him a patient hearing, to believe that he designed him a good office, and to take it kindly, and be willing to receive his instructions. Let Job consider, that,

1. Elihu does not join his three friends against him, v. 1. 'They all spake in the same strain; but I am trying a new way, therefore hearken to all my words, and not to some of them only;' we cannot judge of a discourse unless we take it entire, and hearken to it all.

2. He intends to make a solemn business of it; (not to give a short repartee, to show his wit;) he opened his mouth, (v. 2.) with deliberation and design; on mature consideration, he had already begun to speak, and was prepared to go on, if Job would encourage him by his attention.

3. That he was resolved to speak only as he thought, v. 3. There was reason to suspect Job's three friends did not, in their consciences, think Job so bad a man as their discourses, merely to support their hypothesis, represented him; and that was not fair. It is base to condemn those with our tongues, to serve a turn, whom, at the same time, we cannot but in our consciences think well of: Elihu is an honest man, and scorns to do so.

4. What he said should be easy to be understood, v. 3. Those that speak of the things of God, should carefully avoid all obscurity and perplexedness; by that it will appear they do themselves understand what they speak of, mean honestly, and design the edification of hearers.

5. He would, in his discourse, make the best use he could of the reason and understanding God had given him, that life, that rational soul which he received from the Spirit of God, and the breath of the Almighty, v. 4. With this consideration, also, we should quicken ourselves to do good in our places, according to our capacity; God has made us, and given us life, therefore we should study to use our life to some good purpose, in glorifying God, and serving our generation according to His will, answering the end of our creation, that it may not be said we were made in vain.

6. He would very willingly hear what Job could object, v. 5. 'If not quite spent with the distemper, set thy words in order, and they shall have due consideration.' Those that can speak reason, will hear reason.

7. That he had often wished for one that would appear for God, with whom he might freely expostulate, and to whom, as arbitrator, he might refer the matter, and such a one Elihu would be, v. 6. How pathetically had Job wished, (ch. 16: 21.) O that one might plead for a man with God! and (ch. 23: 3.) O that I knew where I might find Him! Only he would make it his bargain, that his dread should not make him afraid, ch. 13: 21. 'Now,' says Elihu, 'look on me, this once, as in God's stead; I will undertake to plead his cause with thee, and to show thee wherein thou has affronted Him, and what He has against thee; and what appeals or complaints thou hast to make to God, make them to me.'

8. That he was not an unequal match for him; 'I also am formed out of the clay. I also, as well as the first man, (Gen. 2: 7.) I also as well as thou:' formed out of the same clay, so some. It is good for us all to consider, that we are formed out of the clay; and well for us it is, that those who are to us in God's stead, are so; that He speaks to us by men like ourselves, according to Israel's wish, on a full trial, Deut. 5: 24. God has wisely deposited the treasure in earthen vessels like ourselves, 2 Cor. 4: 7.

Lastly, 'I will not reproach thee as thy friends have, nor draw up such a heavy charge. I stand on the same level with thee, and am of the same mould, therefore cannot impress that terror upon thee, which thou mayest justly dread from the appearance of the Divine Majesty.' If we would rightly convince men, it must be by reason, not by terror [that low motive]; by fair arguing, not by a heavy hand.

V. 8—13. In these verses,

I. Elihu particularly charges Job with unbecoming expressions, reflecting on the justice and goodness of God in his dealings with him. He does not ground the charge on report, v. 8. did not hear it from Job in private conversation, then he would not have been so ill-bred as to repeat it thus publicly. Them that sin before all, rebuke before all. What is said amiss in our hearing, we are concerned to reprove; for ye are my witnesses, saith the Lord, publicly, if need be, to confront the accuser.

1. Job had represented himself as innocent, v. 9. Thou hast said, I am clean without transgression; Job had not said this in so many words; nay, he had owned himself to have sinned, and to be impure before God; but he had indeed said, Thou knowest that I am not wicked: My righteousness I hold fast, and the like, on which Elihu might ground this charge. It was true, Job was a perfect and an upright man, and not such a one as his friends had represented him; but he ought not to have insisted so much on it, as if God had therefore done him wrong in afflicting him. Yet, it should seem, Elihu did not deal fairly, in charging Job with saying that he was clean and innocent from all transgression, when he only pleaded, that he was upright and innocent from the great transgression. But those that speak passionately and unwarily, must thank themselves if they be misunderstood; they should have taken more care.

2. He had represented God as severe in marking what he did amiss, and taking all advantages against him, as if He sought opportunity to pick quarrels with him, v. 10, 11. To this purport Job had spoken, ch. 14: 16, 17. So he had expressly said, (ch. 13: 24.—10: 11.) 'He putteth my feet in the stocks; that, as I cannot contend with Him, so I may not be able to flee from Him.' This he had said, ch. 13: 27. where also we meet with these words, Thou lookest narrowly unto all my paths.

II. He endeavors to convince him, that he had spoken amiss in speaking thus, and that he ought to humble himself before God for it, and by repentance to unsay it, v. 12. See the difference between the charge Elihu exhibited against Job, and that preferred against him by his other friends; they would not own he was just at all, but Elihu only says, 'In this, in saying this, thou art not just.' To be just, is to render to all their due; nor are we just to God, if we do not acknowledge his equity and kindness in all the dispensations of his providence towards us. Many that are just, yet, in some instances, do not speak and act like themselves; and as, on the one hand, we must not fail to tell even a good man wherein he mistakes and does amiss, nor flatter him in his errors and passions, for in that we are not kind; so, on the other hand, we must not draw men's characters, nor pass a judgment on them, from one instance, or some few misplaced words, for in that we are not just. In many things we all offend, and must be candid in our censures.

To convince Job, Elihu proposes,

1. That God is infinitely above us, I will answer thee, says Elihu, in one word, which carries its own evidence with it, God is greater than man. 'Now, do but consider what thou thyself hast admirably well said concerning the greatness of God, and apply it to thyself, and thou wilt see reason enough to repent of these ill-natured, ill-favored reflections on Him, and to blush at thy folly, and tremble to think of thine own presumption.' Note, There is enough in this one plain, unquestionable truth, That God is greater than man, if duly improved, for ever to put to silence, and to shame all our complaints of his providence, and our exceptions against his dealings with us.

2. That God is not accountable to us, v. 13. Those that complain of God, strive against Him, implead Him, impeach Him, bring an action against Him. Note, It is an unreasonable thing for us, weak, foolish, sinful creatures, to strive with a God of infinite wisdom, power, and goodness. He is under no obligation to show us a reason for what He does; neither to tell us what He designs to do, in what method, at what time, by what instruments; nor to tell us why He deals thus with us. It is therefore daring impiety to arraign God at our bar, or challenge Him to show cause for what He doeth, to say unto Him, What doest Thou? or, Why doest Thou so? He gives not account of all his matters; so some. He reveals as much as it is fit for us to know, as follows here, v. 14.

V. 14—18. Job had complained, that God kept him wholly in the dark concerning the meaning of his dealings with him; and therefore concluded He dealt with him as his enemy. 'No,' says Elihu, 'He speaks to you, but you do not perceive Him; so that the fault is yours, not his; He is designing your real good, even in those dispensations which you put this harsh construction upon.' Observe in general, v. 14.

1. What a Friend God is to our welfare: He speaketh to us once, yea twice. It is a token of his favor, that He is pleased to speak to us; yea, an evidence of his gracious design, that He is pleased to speak to us of our own concerns, to show us what is our duty, tell us of our faults, and warn us of our danger; to show us the way, and to lead us in it. This He does once, yea, twice, i. e. again and again; when one warning is neglected, He gives another, so sinners are left inexcusable.

2. What enemies we are to our own welfare; Man perceives it not, i. e. he does not heed it or regard it; he does not discern or understand it; is not aware that it is the voice of God, nor does he receive the things revealed, for they are foolishness to him; he stops his ear, stands in his own light, rejects the counsel of God against himself, and so is never the wiser, no not for the dictates of wisdom itself.

God speaks to us by conscience, by providences, and by ministers; of all which Elihu here discourses at large, to show Job that God was both telling him his mind, and doing him a kindness, even now that He seemed to keep him in the dark, and so treat him as a stranger, and to keep him in distress, and so treat him as an enemy. There was not then, that we know of, any divine revelation in writing; therefore that is not here mentioned among the ways by which God speaks to men, though now it is the principal way. In these vs. he shows how God teaches and admonishes the children of men by their own consciences Observe, as to these admonitions,

I. Their proper season and opportunity, v. 15. When men are retired from the world, its business and its conversation; it is a good time for them to retire into their own hearts, and commune with them, Ps. 4: 4. It is the time God takes for dealing personally with men. Thus He made his mind known to the prophets by visions and dreams; (Num. 12: 6.) thus he warned Abimelech, (Gen. 20: 3.) Laban, (Gen. 31: 24.) Joseph, Matt. 1: 20. Thus He made known to Pharaoh, and Nebuchadnezzar, things that should come to pass hereafter. When He stirred up conscience, that ordinary deputy of his, in the soul, to do its office, He took that opportunity, either when deep sleep fell on men, (for though dreams mostly come from fancy, some may come from conscience,) or, in slumberings, when men are between sleeping and waking, reflecting at night on the business of the foregoing day, or projecting in the morning the business of the ensuing day, then is a proper time for their hearts to reproach them for what they have done ill, and to admonish them what they should do. See Isa. 30: 21.

II. Their power and force, v. 16. When God designs men's good, by the convictions and dictates of their own consciences, 1. He gives them admission, and makes them to be heeded, Ps. 58: 5. He opens the heart, as He opened Lydia's, and so opens the ears. He works in the soul a submission to the regimen of conscience, and a compliance with its rules, for that follows on God's opening the ear, Isa. 50: 5. 2. He gives them a settlement, and makes them to abide; He sealeth their instruction, i. e. the instruction designed for, and suited to them; this He makes their souls to receive the deep and lasting impression of, as the wax of the seal. When the heart is delivered into divine instructions, as into a mould, then the work is done.

III. Their end and design.

1. To keep men from sin, and particularly the sin of pride, v. 17. That He may withdraw man from his purpose, i. e. evil purpose; may change the temper of his mind, and the course of his life, his disposition and inclination, or prevent some particular sin he is in danger of falling into: that He may withdraw man from man's work, and set him to work the work of God. Many a man has been thus stopped. Particularly, God does, by this mean, hide pride from man, i. e. hide those things from him which are the matter of his pride, and take his mind off from dwelling on them, by setting before him what reason he has to be humble. That He may take away pride from man, so some; pluck up that root of bitterness, the cause of so much sin. All, whom God has mercy in store for, He will humble, and hide pride from. Pride makes people eager and resolute in the prosecution of their purposes; they will have their way, therefore God withdraws them from their purposes, by mortifying their pride.

2. To keep men from ruin, v. 18. While sinners are pursuing their evil purposes,and indulging their pride, their souls are hastening apace to destruction, both in this world and that to come: but when God, by the admonitions of conscience, withdraws them from sin, He thereby keeps back their souls from the pit, and saves them from perishing, so iniquity shall not be their ruin. That which turns men from sin, saves them from hell, saves a soul from death. See what a mercy it is to be under the restraints of an awakened conscience; faithful are the wounds, and kind are the bonds, of that friend, for the soul is kept from perishing eternally.

V. 19—28. God has spoken once to sinners by their own consciences, to keep them from the paths of the destroyer, yet this they perceive not, as from God; but it is imputed to melancholy, or the preciseness of their education; therefore God speaks a second time, and tries another way to convince and reclaim sinners, i. e. by providences, afflictive and merciful, (in which He speaks twice,) and by the seasonable instructions of good ministers setting in with them. Job complained much of his diseases, and judged by them God was angry with him; his friends did so too: but Elihu shows they were all mistaken, for God often afflicts the body in love, and with gracious designs of good to the soul, as appears in the issue which here it is brought to. This part of Elihu's discourse will be of great use to us for the due improvement of sickness, in and by which God speaks to men. Here is,

I. The patient described in his extremity, v. 19, &c. See what work sin makes, what mischief it does. Pain is the fruit of sin; yet, by the grace of God, the pain of the body is often made a mean of good to the soul. The pangs of death, here called the destroyers, are just ready to seize him; they compass him about, Ps. 116: 3. Perhaps it intimates the very dreadful apprehensions those have of death as a destroying thing, when it stares them in the face, who, when it was at a distance, made light of it.

II. The provision made for his instruction, in order to a sanctified use of his affliction. God may not speak in vain, v. 23. He is happy, if there be a messenger to attend him in his sickness, to convince, counsel, and comfort him, an interpreter to expound the providence; for, when God speaks by afflictions, we are, frequently, so unversed in the language, that we have need of a wise interpreter. The advice and help of a good minister are as needful, and should be as acceptable, in sickness, as of a good physician, especially if well-skilled in the art of explaining and improving providences; he is then one of a thousand, and to be valued accordingly: his business, at such a time, is, to show unto man his uprightness, i. e. God's uprightness, that in faithfulness He afflicts him, and does him no wrong; which it is necessary to be convinced of, in order to a due improvement of the affliction: or rather, it may mean man's uprightness, or rectitude: 1. That is. If it appear, that the sick person is truly pious, the interpreter will not, as Job's friends, make it his business to prove him a hypocrite, because afflicted; but, will show him his uprightness, notwithstanding his afflictions, that he may take the comfort of it, and be easy, whatever the event. 2. The uprightness, the reformation, that should be, in order to life and peace: then the work is done.

III. God's gracious acceptance of him, on his repentance, v. 24. 1. He will give a gracious order for his discharge. When afflictions have done their work, they shall be removed. When we return to God in a way of duty, He will return to us in a way of mercy. 2. He will give a gracious reason for this order, I have found a ransom, or propitiation; Jesus Christ is that Ransom, so Elihu calls Him, as Job had called Him his Redeemer, for He is both the Purchaser and the Price, the Priest and the Sacrifice; so high was the value put on souls, that nothing less would redeem them, and so great the injury done by sin, that nothing less would atone for it, than the blood of the Son of God, who gave his life a ransom for many. This is a ransom of God's finding; we could never have found it ourselves, neither the angels themselves; it is the wisdom of God in a mystery, the hidden wisdom; and such an invention as is, and will be, the everlasting wonder of those principalities and powers that desire to look into it. Observe how God glories in the invention here, 'I have found, I have found, the Ransom, I, even I, am He that has done it.'

IV. The recovery, hereupon. Take away the cause, and the effect will cease. When the patient becomes a penitent,

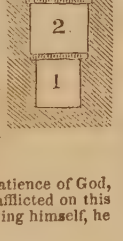
1. His body recovers its health, v. 25. This is not always the consequence of a sick man's repentance and return to God, but sometimes it is; and recovery is then a mercy indeed, when it arises from the remission of sin, Isa. 38: 17. That is the method of a blessed recovery; Son, be of good cheer, thy sins be forgiven thee; and then, Rise, take up thy bed, and walk, Matt. 9: 2, 6 So here, interest him in the Ransom, and when the distemper that oppressed nature is removed, how strangely does nature help itself; in which the power and goodness of the God of nature must be graves; spacious and magnificent caverns, supported by pillars, and having doors; artificial caverns, with places for coffins pierced in the side; mounds, or heaps, sometimes having a chamber in them: and here a kind of ditch, (the Heb. is said to be from a root signifying to sink,) sunk in the ground, somewhat like the method still practised with us. A cut is given of a section of ancient tombs noticed at Syracuse. They are dug at the surface (like our graves) in the calcareous sand-stone, to the depth of 6 or 8 ft. or more; the lowest cavity is of a size for a man's body, the next above is a little wider, thus leaving a shoulder on which rests a slab, forming the cover to the lowest, and the bottom to the next grave. The 3d grave is also wider than the 2d, having likewise a shoulder, on which the slab, forming its own bottom and the cover of the 2d grave, rests; and so on to the surface of the rock, where seems to have been a cover, (movable till all the series of graves were occupied by corpses,) afterwards closely plastered down, and probably covered with the inscriptions. Ed.



Verses 19—26.

When men disregard the warnings and despise the patience of God, He often sends severe afflictions. And if Job had been afflicted on this account, instead of murmuring against God, and justifying himself, he ought to have considered what sins he had committed, and what duties he had neglected.—Some interpret this Messenger, or Angel, of Christ Himself, the Interpreter of God's will to man, the Chief among the 10,000 of his saints and servants. But, as in general He comes to men by his messengers, or ministers; and as their instructions and encouragements are deduced from his mediation, and are made effectual by his gracious presence; it is not very material, whether we interpret the passage, of the messengers of God pointing to the Savior, or the Savior revealing Himself by their ministry. It is equally immaterial, whether the words, 'Deliver him from going down to the pit,' be considered as the language of Christ's intercession, pleading the ransom of his blood, in behalf of the sinner; or the words of the Father accepting of this plea, and giving command to save the sinner, as satisfied with that appointed ransom. It cannot reasonably be doubted, that Elihu had reference to the promised Redeemer, though he might also intend the sacrifices which prefigured the great atonement. thankfully acknowledged! By such merciful providences, God speaketh once, yea twice, to men, letting them know (if they would but perceive it) their dependence on Him, and his tender compassion.

2. His soul recovers its peace, v. 26. (1.) The patient, being a penitent, is a supplicant, and has learned to pray; when he finds himself recovering, he shall not then think prayer no longer necessary; we need grace as much to sanctify a mercy as an affliction. (2.) His prayers are accepted, God will be favorable to him; and then it follows, (3.) That he has the comfort of communion with God; he shall now see the face of God, which before was hid from him, and he shall see it with joy, for what sight can be more reviving? See Gen. 33: 10. All true penitents rejoice more in the returns of God's favor, than in any instance whatsoever of prosperity or pleasure, Ps. 4: 6, 7. (4.) He has a blessed tranquillity of mind, arising from the sense of his justification before God. He shall receive the atonement, i. e. the comfort of it, Rom. 5: 11. Righteousness shall be imputed to him, and peace spoken thereupon. God will now deal with him as a righteous man, with whom it shall be well. He shall receive the blessing from the Lord, even righteousness, Ps. 24: 5. God shall give him grace to go and sin no more. Perhaps this may bespeak the reformation of his life after his recovery.

V. The general rule God will go by in dealing with men, inferred from this instance, v. 27, 28. As sick people, on submission, are recovered, so all others that truly repent, shall find mercy with God. 1. Would we know the nature of sin, and its malignity? It is the perverting of that which is right; a most unjust, unreasonable thing, the rebellion of the creature against the Creator, the usurped dominion of the flesh over the spirit, and a contradiction to the eternal rules and reasons of good and evil. It is perverting the right ways of the Lord, Acts 13: 10. therefore the ways of sin are called crooked ways, Ps. 125: 5. Would we know what is to be got by sin? It profiteth us not. The works of darkness are unfruitful works. All true penitents are ready to own this; and it is a mortifying consideration, Rom. 6: 21. 2. See what repentance is, and what reason we have to repent. Would we approve ourselves true penitents? We must then, with a broken and contrite heart, confess our sins to God, 1 John 1: 9. the fact, the fault, and the folly of sin. Is there not good reason for this penitent confession? For, (1.) God looks upon men, when they have sinned, to see whether they will go on in it, or bethink themselves, and return. He hearkens and hears whether any say, What have I done? He looks upon sinners with an eye of compassion, for He has no pleasure in their ruin. He looks upon them, and, as soon as He perceives these workings of repentance, He encourages, and is ready to accept them, (Ps. 32: 5, 6.) as the father went forth to meet the returning prodigal. (2.) It will turn to our unspeakable advantage. Whoever they are, such shall not come into condemnation, but be saved from the wrath to come; He shall deliver his soul from the pit of hell; iniquity shall not be his ruin. They shall be happy in everlasting life and joy; his life shall see the light, i. e. all good, in the vision and fruition of God. To obtain this bliss, if the prophet had bid us do some great thing, would we not have done it? How much more, when he only says, Wash and be clean; Confess and be pardoned, Repent and be saved?

V. 29—33. Here concludes this first part, which,

1. Briefly sums up what Elihu had said, showing that God's great and gracious design, in all dispensations toward the children of men, is, to save them from being for ever miserable, and bring them to be for ever happy, v. 29, 30. All these things God is working with men; by conscience, by providences, by ministers, by mercies, by afflictions. He often works twice, thrice; so the original, referring to v. 14. Why all this pains with man? It is to bring back his soul from the pit, v. 30. If God did not take more care of us than we do of ourselves, we were miserable. The former method, by dream and vision, was, to keep back the soul from the pit, v. 18. i. e. to prevent sin, that we might not fall into it. This, by sickness and the Word, is, to bring back the soul, to recover those that have fallen into sin, that they may not lie still and perish in it. Whom God saves from sin and hell, He will bring to heaven, this He aims at, in all his institutions, all his dispensations. Lord, what is man, that Thou shouldest thus visit him! This renders those that perish for ever inexcusable.

2. He bespeaks Job's acceptance of what he had offered, and begs of him to mark it well, v. 31. If so, (1.) He is welcome to object if he can, v. 32. Elihu contends for truth, not, as the others, for victory. (2.) If he has nothing to say, Elihu tells him he has something more to say, which he desires him patiently to attend to, v. 33. Those that would both show and learn wisdom, must hearken and keep silence, be swift to hear, and slow to speak. The wise and good, as Job, may yet be wiser and better, and must therefore improve by the means of wisdom and grace.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

We ought always to discourse on religious subjects, with seriousness, recollection, candor, sincerity, and plainness; if we expect to be heard with attention, and to convince and instruct others.—Public offences should be publicly rebuked or retracted, to prevent scandal; but we may allow a man's general character to be good, and yet reprove him for particular offences.—The general tendency of all the Lord's dealings with men, is to lead them to repent and to turn to Him; but the proud, careless rebel does not regard, though God speak to him again and again. The works of creation proclaim his eternal power and Godhead, and leave all those without excuse, who neither worship Him nor are thankful.—Christ Himself is the only effectual Interpreter; by his Spirit He shows the sinner the way of acceptance and salvation; who, believing, receives the gift of righteousness, and partakes of sanctification.—To the end of our lives corrections are the needful and salutary means of keeping us near, or bringing us nearer, to God; and, as such, are not only to be submitted to, but to be valued as pledges of his love: for it is immensely better to be 'chastened of the Lord, than to be condemned with the world.'

Elihu further showed, that God always observed the ways of men. Therefore Job had no reason to think that God was become his enemy; but to hope that he should derive great advantage from his calamities.—The original is rather difficult as to the construction, and has been variously translated: but the grand outline of instruction is not at all affected by the different renderings. SCOTT.

Lo! all these things worketh God, time after time, on the behalf of man;' &c. Boothr. 'As the verb signifies to sing (29) as well as to look, the connexion requires the former sense, and I follow Schultens and others. To make out any sense, our tr. supplies, if any, and adopts the Keri [Rabbinic reading] in v. 28. which introduces a repetition of the sentiment of vs. 24, 25. besides the anachronism of God delivering a man, after he had offered thanksgiving for his deliverance.' It seems, that Job was so far convinced by Elihu's discourse, that he would not attempt an answer. ID.

CHAP. XXXIV.

Elihu calls on the wise to judge in the cause; and charges Job with arraigning the divine justice, 1—9. He affirms, that the all-powerful and all-perfect God cannot do iniquity; and vindicates his dealings with men, 10—30. He shows Job, that he ought to humble himself before God; and sharply reproves his words, 31—37.

FURTHERMORE Elihu answered and said,

2 Hear my words, [a] O ye wise men; and give ear unto me, ye that have knowledge.

3 For [b] the ear trieth words, as the * mouth tasteth meat.

4 Let us [c] choose to us judgment: let us [d] know among ourselves what is good.

CHAP. XXXIV. V. 1—9. Pausing awhile, it is likely, to see if Job had any thing to say against the discourse; who sitting silent, and, probably, intimating a desire he would go on, Elihu here proceeds. Job not only bore it patiently, but took it kindly, seeing that Elihu meant well; and, whereas the others accused him against his own conscience, Elihu charged only what probably his own heart, now on reflection, began to smite him for. Here,

I. Elihu humbly addresses himself to the auditors, and endeavors, like an orator, to gain their good will, and their favorable attention, v. 2. 1. He differed in opinion, yet calls them wise and knowing men; not like a peevish, [ignorant] disputant, thinking all fools that are not of his mind. 2. He appeals to their judgment, v. 3. and he that speaks must stand the test of the intelligent. 3. He pretends not to be sole dictator, as to what is just and good, but is willing to join them in searching it out, and desires a consultation, v. 4. We are then likely to discern what is right, when we agree to assist one another in searching it out.

II. He warmly accuses Job, for some passionate words that reflected on the divine government, appealing to the house, whether he ought not to be checked for them.

1. He recites these words, as near as he can remember. (1.) He had insisted on his own innocency, v. 5. and, when urged to confess his guilt, had stiffly maintained his plea of Not guilty, v. 6. Job had spoken to this purport, ch. 27: 6. My righteousness I hold fast. (2.) He had charged God with injustice in dealing with him; God has taken away my judgment; so Job had said, ch. 27: 2. (3.) He had despaired of relief, and concluded that God could not, or would not, help him; that his wound was likely to be mortal, yet not for any injustice in his hand, ch. 16: 16, 17. (4.) He had, in effect, said, that there is nothing to be got in the service of God, and that no man will be the better, at last, for his religion, v. 9. He hath said that which gives occasion to suspect that he thinks, It profiteth a man nothing, that he shall delight himself with God. It is granted there is a present pleasure in religion, yet the advantage of it is denied, as if it were vain to serve God, Mal. 3: 14. This Elihu gathers as Job's opinion, by an inu-endo from what he said, ch. 9: 22. He destroys the perfect and the wicked, which has a truth in it, (for all things come alike to all,) but it was ill-expressed, and gave too much occasion for this imputation; therefore Job sat down silent under it, and attempted not his own vindication; whence Caryl well observes, That good men sometimes speak worse than they mean; and that a good man will rather bear more blame than he deserves, than stand to excuse himself when he has deserved any blame.

2. 'Did you ever know such a man as Job, or ever hear a man talk at such an extravagant rate?' v. 7. He represents him, (1.) As sitting in the seat of the scornful; i. e. as taking great liberty and pleasure in reproaching both God and his friends. Or, 'He is very greedy in receiving and hearkening to the scorns and contempts others cast on their brethren, is well pleased with such, and extols them.' Or, as some explain it, 'By his foolish expressions, he makes himself the object of scorn, lays himself very open to reproach, and gives occasion to others to laugh at him; while his religion also suffers by it.' We need pray God never to leave us to ourselves, to say or do any thing which may make us a reproach to the foolish, Ps. 39: 8. (2.) As walking in the course of the ungodly, and standing in the way of sinners, v. 8. not that in his conversation he associated with them, but, in his opinion, he did favor and countenance them, and strengthen their hands. If (as it follows, v. 9. for the proof of this) it profits a man nothing to delight himself in God, why not lay the reins on the neck of his lust, and herd with the workers of iniquity? He that says, I have cleansed my hands in vain, does not only offend against the generation of God's children, (Ps. 73: 13, 14.) but gratifies his enemies, and says as they say.

V. 10—15. The scope of Elihu's discourse is to reconcile Job to his afflictions, and to pacify him under them. In order to this, he had showed, in the foregoing ch. that God meant him no hurt in afflicting him, but intended his spiritual benefit. In this ch. he shows He did him no wrong in afflicting him, nor punished him more than he deserved. If the former could not prevail to satisfy him, yet this ought to silence him. In these vs. he directs his discourse to all the company, v. 10. And he says, That the righteous God never did, nor ever will,

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXIV. V. 1. In connection with many passages of Elihu's discourse, let us consider the following remarks of G. Combe, Esq. 'A man who shall neglect [God's] physical law, will suffer the physical punishment, although he may be very attentive to the moral law; one who infringes the organic law, will suffer organic punishment, although he may obey the physical law; and a person who violates the moral law, will suffer the moral punishment, although he should observe the other two.

'After the intellect and moral sentiments have been brought to recognise the principles of the divine administration, so much wisdom, benevolence and justice are discernible in [these] natural laws, that our whole nature is ameliorated in undergoing the punishments annexed to them. So strikingly conspicuous, indeed, is the ameliorating influence of suffering, that many suppose this its primary object; a notion which, with great deference, appears to me unfounded in principle, and dangerous in practice. If evils and misfortunes are mere mercies of Providence, it follows that a headache consequent on a debauch, is not intended to prevent repetition of drunkenness, so much as to prepare the debauchee for "the invisible world;" and that shipwreck in a crazy vessel is not designed to render the merchant more cautious, but to lead him to heaven.—It is however undeniable, that, in innumerable instances, pain and sorrow are the direct consequences of our own misconduct; at the same time it is obviously benevolent in God to render them beneficial directly, as a warning against future transgression, and indirectly, as a mean of purifying the mind. Nevertheless, if we shall imagine that in some instances it is dispensed as a direct punishment for particular transgressions, and in others, only on account of sin in general, and with the view of ameliorating the spirit of the sufferer, we shall ascribe inconsistency to the Creator, and expose ourselves to the danger of attributing our own afflictions to his favor, and those of others to his wrath; thus fostering in our own minds self-conceit and uncharitableness. Individuals who entertain the belief that bad health, worldly ruin, and sinister accidents, befalling them, are not punishments for infringement of the laws of nature, but particular manifestations of the love of God towards themselves, make slight inquiry into the natural causes of their miseries, and bestow few efforts to remove them. In consequence, the chastisements endured by them, neither correct their own conduct, nor deter others from similar transgressions. Some religious sects, who espouse these notions, literally act upon them, and refuse to inoculate with the cow pox to escape contagion, or take other means of avoiding natural calamities. Regarding these as dispensations of Providence, sent to prepare them for a future world, they conceive that the more they have of them the better. Further, these ideas, besides being repugnant to the common sense of mankind, are at variance with the principle, that the world is arranged so as to favor virtue and discountenance vice; because favoring virtue means obviously, that the favored virtuous will positively enjoy more happiness, and, negatively, suffer fewer misfortunes, than the vicious. The view then now advocated, appears less exceptionable, viz. that punishment serves a double purpose—directly to warn us against transgression, and indirectly, when rightly apprehended, to subdue our lower propensities, and purify and vivify our moral and intellectual powers. See Bp. Butler.' Constitution of Man.

The above modest attempt to 'vindicate the ways of God to man,' does not entirely satisfy the mind; which looks to a future state as necessary to display all God's justice, as we term it in reference to our own feelings. Job's case, too, seems a special exception, chs. 1 and 2. The apostle also refers to it as an example of patience under persecution for righteousness' sake, James 5:10, 11. analogous to cases of suffering for acting according to the dictates of the better nature, which the pleasure of the indulgence of the good feelings does not fully make up at the time, or at least in the eyes of others. See on ch. 42. ED.

V. 5—9. Job by no means intended all Elihu charged on him. He had not spoken precisely all the words, Elihu attributed to him; those he had used, might admit of a more favorable construction; and other parts of his discourse plainly showed his deliberate judgment widely differed from the sentiments, apparently conveyed by some of his detached expressions. He had repeatedly owned he was a sinner; and he spake of the wicked as reserved to the day of wrath and destruction. (21:27—30.) But Elihu did not condemn Job as a hypocrite he therefore quietly submitted to his reproof. SCOTT.

(7.) Drinketh up scorning, &c.] 'Of a man who does not care for contempt or hatred, it is still said, [in India,] "He drinks up their hatred like water." So it is said of enemies, and talents: as, "He drinks up enemies," or "science, as water." Thus, Elihu wished to show that Job had hardened himself, and was insensible to scorn.' ROBERTS.

Verses 10—15.

Elihu next laid down the principle, by which he desired Job's conduct might be tried. (7:17—21. 9:4—13.) SCOTT.

36 My desire is that Job may be tried unto the end because of his answers for wicked men.

37 For he addeth rebellion unto his sin, he clappeth his hands among us, and multiplieth his words against God.

1. His independent, absolute sovereignty and dominion, v. 13. This is also a good reason why we should acquiesce in all God's dealings with us. [Finite beings may have lower motives, as fear, favor, temporal interests, &c. but the Infinite can have no motive but the best.] And if an absolute Sovereign, we are bound to submit to Him, for there is no higher power to which we may appeal, so that the virtue is a necessity

2. His irresistible power, v. 14. If he set his heart on man, to contend with him, much more if (as some read it) He set his heart against man, to ruin him, if He should deal with man either by mere sovereignty, or by strict justice, there were no standing before Him; man's spirit and breath would soon be gone, and all flesh would perish together, v. 15. Many men's honesty is owing purely to their impotency; but God is able, yet does not by arbitrary power crush any man, which therefore must be attributed to the infinite perfection of his nature, and that is immutable. See here what God can do with us, and may do with us, without doing us any wrong; He may recall the being He gave, of which we are but tenants at will, and which also we have forfeited; therefore, as long as that is continued of his mere favor, we have no reason to cry out of wrong, whatever other comforts are removed.

V. 16—30. Elihu here applies himself more directly to Job, v. 16.

I. Hear this, That God is not to be quarrelled with for any thing He does. It is daring presumption to arraign and condemn God's proceedings, as Job had done by his discontents. 1. As absurd, as to advance to power a professed enemy to justice, v. 17. When we consider the corruption of our nature, and the contrariety there is in us to the eternal rule of equity, we cannot but see it an impudent, impious thing for us to prescribe to God. 2. As absurd, as to call a most evidently righteous, innocent person to the bar, and give judgment against him. 3. It is more absurd and unbecoming, than to say to a sovereign prince, Thou art wicked, and to judges on the bench, Ye are ungodly, v. 18. This would be looked upon as an insufferable affront; no king, no prince, would bear it. Government, we presume, is right, unless the contrary be very evident; but, whatever we think, it is not [customary or] fit to tell a king to his face that he is wicked. Nathan reproved David by a parable. But, whatever a high priest or a prophet might do, it is not for an ordinary subject to make so bold with the powers that are. How absurd then to say so to God! To impute iniquity to Him, who, having no respect of persons, is in no temptation to do an unjust thing!

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—15. It is generally prudent to conciliate the affections of all, whose benefit we seek, or whose help we want, by acknowledging in them the good which they really possess; and when we address men, as endued with wisdom and piety, we cogently admonish them to act consistently with their character: nor should we withhold this tribute of respect from any, because we deem them in some respects mistaken. (Phil. 1:9—11. Heb. 5:11—14.)—It is discordant, in the ears of a spiritual man, to hear persons intent on justifying themselves; or reflecting on the dealings of God, as unjust or unkind; or supposing that they suffer without remedy, or transgression. This jealousy for the honor of God, and deep acquaintance with the depravity of man, will indeed sometimes render pious persons too suspicious; and too severe in censuring such as vindicate themselves from unjust aspersions, in an unguarded manner. But the believer, when convinced that his reprover means well, and when conscious of having deserved censure, will, on calm reflection, submit to those rebukes which are too rigorous, rather than engage in minute exculpation.—Pious men cannot deliberately allow, that while life and hope remain, a sinner can have cause to murmur, but are sure he must have great cause to be thankful. v. 19. Note, Rich and poor stand on the same level before God. Their persons are so; their conditions are so; the poor were made poor by the Divine Providence, as well as the rich made rich; therefore the poor shall fare never the worse for that which is their lot, not their fault.

II. Hear this, That God is to be acknowledged and submitted to in all He does. Divers considerations Elihu here suggests, to beget in Job great and high thoughts of God, and so to persuade him to submit, and quarrel no further with Him.

1. God is almighty, v. 20. What cannot He do, that has all the powers of death at his command? Observe the suddenness of the destruction He brings; In a moment shall they die; the season of it; at midnight, when secure, careless, and unable to help themselves; as the Egyptians, when their first-born were slain, [and the Sabeans? note, 28: 4.] Nor is it one single mighty man only that He can thus overpower, but even hosts of them, v. 24. Omnipotence shall break in pieces mighty men combined without number; Yet, when God destroys tyranny, He does not design anarchy; when He breaks mighty men, He sets others in their stead, that will rule better; or, if they do not, He overturns them also in the night, or in a night, so that they are destroyed, v. 25. Witness Belshazzar. Or, if He designs them space to repent, He does not presently destroy them, but He strikes them as wicked men, v. 26. Some humbling, mortifying judgments are brought upon them, in their bodies, estates, or families, and this, for warning to their neighbors; the stroke is given as an alarm to others, therefore in the open sight of others, that the less mighty also may see, and fear, and tremble, before the justice of God.

2. God is omniscient, v. 21, 22. As the strongest cannot oppose his arm, so the most subtle cannot escape his eye; therefore, if some are punished, either more or less than we think they should be, instead of quarrelling with God, it becomes us to ascribe it to some secret cause, known to God only. Observe here, The workers of iniquity would hide themselves, if they could, as Adam among the trees of the garden; the day is coming when mighty men, and chief captains, will call to the rocks and mountains to hide them. They would gladly be hid even in the grave, in annihilation, than appear before the judgment-seat of Christ: but in vain.

3. God is righteous. Even when overturning mighty men, and breaking them in pieces, He will not lay upon man more than right, v. 23. As He will not punish the innocent, so He will not exact of the guilty more than their iniquities deserve; of the proportion between the sin and the punishment, Infinite Wisdom shall be the Judge; for God will be justified when He speaks, and clear when He judges. Therefore Job was very much to be blamed, and is here well advised to let fall his action. It is not for man ever to purpose to enter into judgment with the Omnipotent; so some read the whole v. Job had often wished to plead his cause before God. Elihu asks, 'To what purpose? The judgment already given concerning thee will certainly be affirmed; no errors can be found in it, nor any exceptions taken to it, but, after all, it must rest as it is.' All is well that God does, and will be found so.

To prove, that, when God destroys the mighty men, and strikes them as wicked men, He does not lay upon them more than right, He shows what their wickedness was; (v. 27, 28.) and let any compare that with their punishment, and then judge whether they did not deserve it. In short, these unjust judges, whom God will justly judge, neither feared God, nor regarded man. This is at the bottom of all the wickedness of the wicked, they turn back from God; and it is because they do not consider, not because they cannot; they will not. From inconsideration comes impiety, and thence all immorality. Their case is bad who have the prayers and tears of the poor against them; for the cry of the oppressed will, sooner or later, draw down vengeance on the heads of the oppressors, and no one can say, that this is more than right, Ex. 22: 23.

4. God has an uncontrollable dominion in all the affairs of men, and so guides and governs whatever concerns both communities and persons, that, as what He designs cannot be defeated, so what He does cannot be changed, v. 29. What can make them uneasy, whose souls dwell at ease in God? See Phil. 4: 7. The smiles of all the world cannot quiet those whom God troubles with his frowns.

5. God is wise, and careful of the public welfare, therefore provides that the hypocrite reign not, lest the people be ensnared, v. 30. The praise of men, and power, are the hypocrite's reward, his aim. Tyrants sometimes use religion as a cloak for ambition, and by hypocrisy come to the throne. The people, when hypocrites reign, are likely to be ensnared in sin, or trouble, or both. Power, in the hands of dissemblers, is often destructive to the rights and liberties of a people, which they are more easily wheedled out of, than forced out of. Much mischief has been done likewise to the power of godliness, under the pretence of a form of godliness. Divine Providence takes care of the people, to prevent this danger, that the hypocrite reign not; either that he do not reign at all, or not long. If God has mercy in store for a people, He will either prevent the rise, or hasten the ruin, of hypocritical rulers.

V. 31—37. I. Elihu instructs Job what to say under his affliction, v. 31, 32. In general, he would have him repent of his misconduct, and indecent expressions. Job's other friends would have had him own himself a wicked man, and by overdoing they undid. Let us remember this, in giving reproofs, and not make the matter worse than it is; for the stretching of the crime may defeat the prosecution. Elihu directs Job,

1. To humble himself before God for his sins, and to accept the punishment of them; 'I have borne chastisement. What I suffer comes justly upon me, therefore I will bear it, and not only justify God in it, but acknowledge his goodness.' Many are chastised, that do not bear chastisement, do not bear it well, and so, in effect, do not bear it at all. Penitents, if sincere, will take all well that God does, and will bear chastisement as a medicinal operation intended for good.

2. To pray to God to discover his sins to him, v. 32. A good man is willing to know the worst of himself, and particularly, under affliction: and what God designs in it.

3. To promise reformation, v. 31. The penitent here completes his repentance; for it is not enough to be sorry for our sins, but we must go and sin no more, and, as here, bind ourselves with the bond of a fixed resolution never more to return to folly. This is meet to be said in a steadfast purpose, and to God in a solemn promise and vow.

II. He reasons with him concerning his discontent and uneasiness under his affliction, v. 33. We are ready to think every thing that concerns us should be just as we would have it; but Elihu here shows, 1. That it is absurd and unreasonable to expect it. He speaks with a great deference to the divine will and wisdom, and a satisfaction therein. It is highly fit every thing should be according to God's mind. Elihu speaks also with a just disdain of the pretensions of the proud, who would be their own carvers. Should we always have the good we have a mind to enjoy? We should then wrongfully encroach on others, and foolishly ensnare ourselves. Must we never be afflicted, because we have no mind to it? Or, if we must be afflicted, is it fit we should choose what rod we will be beaten with? No, every thing should be according to God's mind. 2. That it is in vain, and to no purpose, to expect it. 'God will take his own way, fulfil his own counsel, and been plain, if he had been a hypocrite, advanced to authority, but now depressed, lest he should lead the people into sin and misery. Yet he did not venture to condemn him, but hoped the best. SCOTT.

Verses 31—37.

(31:35—40.)—Job had given some ground for these charges: but Elihu evidently made the worst of his expressions, and criminated him much more than the Lord afterwards did. (38:2. 40:1—8. 42:1—9.)—Several of the clauses in these vs. are to us very difficult, and consequently the end, because of [p] his answers for wicked men.

37 For he addeth [q] rebellion unto his sin, [r] he clappeth his hands among us, and [s] multiplieth his words against God.

CHAP. XXXV.

Elihu further reproves Job's words in justifying himself; and shows, that the effects of man's conduct extend to man alone, and not to God, 1—8. He observes, that if God hear not the cry of the oppressed, it is because they do not address him aright, 9—13. He exhorts Job to patience and trust in God, 14—16.

ELIHU spake moreover, and said,

2 * Thinkest thou this to be right, that thou saidst, [b] My righteousness is more than God's?

3 For thou saidst, [c] What advantage will it be unto thee? and, What profit shall I have, * if I be cleansed from my sin?

recompense according to the sentence of his own justice, whether thou art pleased or displeased; it is therefore thy wisdom to be easy, and make the best of that which is, as it is out of thy power to make it otherwise. III. He appeals to all intelligent, indifferent persons, whether there was not great sin and folly in what Job said. 1. He would have the matter thoroughly examined, and brought to an issue, v. 36. Many understand 'Let his troubles be continued till he be thoroughly humbled, made to see his error, and to retract what he has so presumptuously said against God and his providence. Let the trial be continued till the end be obtained.' 2. He appeals both to God and man, and desires the judgment of both upon it. Some read v. 36. as an appeal to God, O my Father, let Job be tried. So the margin of our Bibles, for the same word signifies my desire, and my father; and some suppose he lifted up his eyes, when he said this, meaning, 'O my Father which art in heaven, let Job be tried till he be subdued.' When praying for the benefit of afflictions either to ourselves or others, we must eye God as a Father, because they are fatherly corrections, and a part of our filial education, Heb. 12: 7. He appeals to the bystanders, v. 34. [whether, as he said, Job had not] talked foolishly, (v. 35.) in this matter; whatever his heart is, his words are without prudence. What he said to his wife, may be retorted on himself, ch. 2: 10. Sometimes we need and deserve those reproofs ourselves, which we have given to others. Those that reproach God's wisdom, really reproach their own. He had also talked wickedly, and taken part with God's enemies; what he has said, tends to strengthen the hands, and harden the hearts, of wicked people in their wickedness. 'He has, moreover, insulted God's friends, and hectored over them, as if he had gotten the day, and silenced us all.' To speak ill is bad enough, but to clap our hands, and triumph in it when we have done, as if error and passion had won the victory, is much worse. Finally, he has spoken against God Himself, and, by standing to what he had said, added rebellion to his sin. To speak, though but one word, against God, by whom we speak, and for whom we ought to speak, is a great sin; what is it then to multiply words against Him, as if we would out-talk Him? What is it to repeat them, instead of unsaying them? Those that have sinned, and, when they are called to repent, thus go on frowardly, add rebellion to their sin, and make it exceeding sinful.

CHAP. XXXV. Job being still silent, Elihu here, a third time, undertakes to show him that he had spoken amiss, and ought to recant. Three improper sayings he here charges him with, and returns answer to them distinctly.

V. 1—8. I. Here are the bad words Elihu charges on Job, v. 2, 3. To evince their badness, he appeals to himself, which intimates Elihu's confidence, the reproof he now gave was just: (for they that have truth and equity on their side, sooner or later will have every man's conscience on their side,) and his good opinion of Job, that he thought better than he spake, and, though he had spoken amiss, yet, when he perceived his mistake, he would not stand to it. He reproves Job for,

1. Justifying himself more than God, the thing that first provoked him, (ch. 32: 2.) 'Thou hast, in effect, said, My righteousness is more than God's,' i. e. 'I have done more for God than ever He did for me; so that, when the accounts are balanced, He will be brought in my debtor;' a most unjust and wicked thought: for, though we be ever so good, God is not our debtor; and though our afflictions be ever so great, God is not unrighteous.

2. Disowning the benefits and advantages of religion, because he suffers these things, v. 3. This is gathered from ch. 9: 30, 31. and ch. 10: 15. The psalmist, when he compared his own afflictions with the prosperity of the wicked, was tempted to say, Verily I have cleansed my heart in vain. And if Job said so, he did, in effect, say, My righteousness is more than God's; (v. 2.) for if he got nothing by his religion, God was more beholden to him than he to God. But though there might be some color for it, yet it was not fair to charge these words on Job, when he himself had made them the wicked words of prospering sinners, ch. 21: 15. and had immediately disclaimed them, v. 16. It is not a fair way of disputing, to charge men with those consequences of their opinions, which they expressly renounce.

II. The good answer of Elihu, v. 4. 'I will undertake to answer thee, and thy companions with thee,' i. e. 'all that are ready to justify thy sayings; and all others that say as thou: I have that to offer which will silence them all:' viz. his old maxim, ch. 33: 12. That God is greater than man; a truth, which, if duly improved, will serve many good purposes, and this particularly, to prove that God is debtor to no man: his being obliged by his purpose and promise, is only to Himself. That is a challenge no man can take up, Rom. 11: 35. Who hath first given to God, let him prove it, and it shall be recompensed to him again. Why demand, as a just debt, to gain by our religion, (as Job seemed to,) when the God we serve does not gain by it?

1. Elihu needs not prove that God is above man; it is agreed by all; but he endeavors to affect Job and us with it, by an ocular demonstration of the height of the heavens and the clouds, v. 5.

2. But hence he infers, that God is not affected, either one way or other, by any thing we do. To men we are in a capacity either of doing injury, or kindness, v. 8. And in both, the sovereign Lord and Judge of all will interest Himself, rewarding those that do good, punishing those that do hurt, to fellow creatures and fellow subjects; but, Job

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 16—37. It is evident, that it must be immensely more dangerous and atrocious to arraign the conduct of God, than that of any earthly prince. Yet all our murmurs, when duly investigated, will be found to have a tendency to the blasphemous sentiment, that the Governor of the world hates right: they condemn Him who is most just, and are therefore pregnant with rebellion. But He knows the works of all men, and sees far more evil in every one of us, than we suspect: therefore in his most terrible judgments his justice must be acknowledged; and even when 'the wicked shall be turned into hell, and all the nations that forget God,' the publishing of their crimes will demonstrate the righteousness of their dreadful doom. But the vengeance of the Almighty, either here or hereafter, will be most terrible against apostate professors of his holy religion; those who have deliberately rejected his authority, and his Gospel; and such as have cloked their ambitious designs under a hypocritical profession of piety.—It is meet, we address ourselves to God, when He afflicts us, with the language of humble submission: confessing our transgressions, and praying to be further enlightened in the knowledge of his truth, and acquaintance with our own sinfulness; and that He would incline and enable us to repent; and to forsake all our sins; that 'where we have done iniquity, we may do so no more.'

are differently interpreted. Patrick paraphrases v. 33. thus: 'Hast thou addressed thyself to God in this manner? Answer me that question; for God will recompense it, if thou dost despise such good counsel; which perhaps thou wilt choose to do; but so would not I. Speak therefore what thy opinion is.' SCOTT.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXV. V. 1—3. Job had labored to prove, that there was no exact discrimination in this world between the righteous and the wicked; and he seemed to Elihu to assert, that it would be no advantage to any one, (as it had been none to him,) to seek diligently to be cleansed from sin. This he thought equivalent to saying, 'that his righteousness was more than God's:' for he did his duty; but God did not fulfil his promises, nay, He punished him more severely than he deserved. Job had not spoken exactly these words, and certainly had no such meaning: but he had dropped some expressions capable of being thus understood; and it was proper they should be noticed, lest others should make a bad use of them. (9:22—24. 10:4—7. 21:7—16. 27:2—6.) SCOTT.

If I be cleansed from my sin; (3) 'by it more than by my sin.' (M.) This appears to be the more exact rendering. 'What profit shall I have by my righteousness, more than by my sin?' In.

erred then in saying, What profit is it that I am cleansed? God was no gainer by his reformation; who then would gain, if he himself did not? We can demand nothing from God, nor have any reason to complain if we have not what we expect, but to be thankful that we have better than we deserve.

V. 9—13. Elihu here answers another word of Job, which, he thought, reflected much on God's justice and goodness, and therefore ought not to pass without a remark.

I. Job complained, that God did not regard the cries of the oppressed against their oppressors, v. 9. This seems to refer to those words of Job, (ch. 24: 12.) and is a thing Job knows not what to make of, nor how to reconcile to the justice of God and his government. Is there a righteous God, and can it be, that He should so slowly hear, so slowly see?

II. How Elihu solves the difficulty: If the cries of the oppressed be not heard, the fault is not in God, He is ready to hear and help them, but the fault is in themselves; they ask and have not, because they ask amiss. They cry out, by reason of the arm of the mighty, but it is a complaining cry, a wailing cry, not a penitent, praying cry, the cry of nature and passion, not of grace. See Hos. 11: 14. They have not cried unto Me with their heart when they howled upon their beds. How then can we expect they should be answered and relieved?

1. They do not inquire after God, nor seek to acquaint themselves with Him, under their affliction, v. 10. Afflictions are sent, to direct and quicken us to inquire early after God, Ps. 78: 34. But of the many that are afflicted and oppressed, how few get the good they might get by their affliction! It should drive them to God, [and obedience to all his laws,] but how seldom is this the case! It is lamentable to see so little religion among the poor and miserable part of mankind. Every one complains of his troubles; but none saith, Where is God my Maker? i. e. None [reform their disobedience, or] repent of their sins, none return to Him that smites them, none seek the face and favor of God, and that comfort in Him which would balance their outward afflictions. They are wholly taken up with the wretchedness of their condition, as if that would excuse them in living without God in the world, which should engage them to cleave the more closely to Him. All are asking, Where is mirth? Where is wealth? Where is a good bargain? But none ask, Where is God my Maker?

2. They do not notice their mercies in and under their afflictions, nor are thankful for them, therefore cannot expect God to deliver from them. (1.) He provides for our inward comfort and joy under outward troubles, and we ought to use that, and wait his time for their removal. He gives songs in the night, i. e. when our condition is ever so dark, sad, and melancholy, there is that in God, his providence and promise, sufficient, not only to support, but to fill with joy and consolation, and enable us, in every thing, to give thanks, and even to rejoice in tribulation. When we only pore on afflictions, and reject the consolations of God treasured up for us, it is just to reject our prayers. (2.) He preserves to us the use of reason and understanding, v. 11. who teaches us more than the beasts of the earth, i. e. who has endued us with more noble powers and faculties, [to know and practise his universal laws,] than they are endued with, and has made us capable of more excellent pleasures and employments here and for ever. Now this comes in here, [1.] As that which furnishes us with matter for thanksgiving, even under the heaviest burden of affliction; those that kill the body, cannot hurt our immortal souls; and if our affliction prevail not to disturb our reason, and the peace of our consciences, we may be thankful, how pressing soever our calamities otherwise are. [2.] As a reason why we should, under our afflictions, inquire after God our Maker, and seek unto Him. The greatest excellency of reason, is, that it makes us capable of religion, [of finding out and doing God's will.] And it is in that especially that we are taught more than the beasts and the fowls. They have wonderful instincts and sagacities in seeking out food, physic, shelter; but none are capable of inquiring, Where is God my Maker? Something like logic, and philosophy, and politics, has been observed among the brute-creatures, but never any thing of divinity or religion; these are peculiar to man. If, therefore, the oppressed only cry by reason of the arm of the mighty, and do not look up to God, they do no more than the brutes, (who complain when hurt,) and they forget that instruction and wisdom by which they are advanced so far above them. God relieves the brute-creatures, because they cry to Him according to the best of their capacity, Ps. 104: 21. ch. 38:41. But what reason have men to expect relief, who are capable of inquiring after God as their Maker, and yet cry to Him no otherwise than as brutes do?

3. They are proud and unhumbled under afflictions, sent to hide pride from them, v. 12. There they cry, exclaim against their oppressors, and complain to all about them, not sparing to reflect on God Himself and his providence; but none give answer. God does not work deliverance for them, and perhaps men do not much regard them; because of the pride of evil men; they are evil men; they regard iniquity in their hearts, therefore God will not hear their prayers, Ps. 66: 18. Is. 1: 15. God hears not such sinners. They have, it may be, brought themselves into trouble by their own wickedness, they are the devil's poor; and then who can pity them? Yet this is not all; they are proud still, therefore they do not seek unto God; (Ps. 10: 4.) or if they do cry unto Him, therefore He does not answer, for He hears only the desire of the humble, (Ps. 10: 17.) and delivers those by his providence, whom He has first, by his grace, prepared and made fit for deliverance; and that we are not, if, under humbling afflictions, our hearts remain unhumbled, and pride unmortified. The case is plain then, If we cry to God for the removal of the oppression and affliction we are under, and it is not removed, the reason is, not because the Lord's hand is shortened, or his ear heavy, but because the affliction has not done its work; we are not sufficiently humbled, and therefore must thank ourselves that it is continued.

4. They are not sincere and upright, and inward with God, in their supplications to Him, therefore He does not hear and answer them, v. 13. God will not hear vanity, i. e. the hypocritical prayer, which is a vain prayer, coming out of feigned lips.

V. 14—16. I. Here is another improper word, Elihu reproves, v. 14. Thou sayest thou shalt not see Him; i. e. 1. Complainest thou dost not understand the meaning of his severe dealings with thee, nor discern the drift and design of them,' ch. 23: 8, 9. And, 2. 'Thou despairest of seeing his gracious returns to thee, of seeing better days again, and art ready to give up all for gone;' as Hezekiah, Isa. 38: 11. I shall not see the Lord. As, in prosperity, we are ready to think our mountain will never be brought low; so, in adversity, we are ready to think our valley will never be filled, but, in both, to conclude that to-morrow must

Verses 9—13.

Job had stated, that the oppressed cry out, but are not delivered, and that the oppressors remain unpunished: (24:2—12.) and Elihu, in showing how the wickedness of some men made others to suffer, attempted to account for this. (Ps. 42:6—10. Hab. 3:17—19. Acts 16:25—28. Rom. 5:3—5.)—God would not regard the vain and rebellious complaints of ungodly men. (Notes, Judg. 10:13—16. 2 Sam. 22:37—42. Prov. 1:24—31. Is. 57:13. 58:2—12. 59:1—8. John 9:27—34.) And indeed Job's complaint, that the Lord would not hear his cry, (19:7.) as Elihu supposed, originated from a similar cause: for though he might not be an ungodly man, yet he had not duly humbled himself under his afflictions, and therefore he was disregarded. CHAP. XXXVI.

Elihu requires attention, while, with truth and knowledge, he shows the justice of God in all his judgments, the designs of his chastisements, and the profit of making a right use of them, 1—15. He reproves, warns, and counsels Job, 16—21. He reminds him that the power of God is uncontrollable; and that his works and dispensations should be magnified, but cannot be comprehended, 22—33.

be as this day; which is as absurd, as to think that the weather, when it is either fair or foul, will be always so, that the flowing tide will always flow, or the ebbing tide will always ebb.

II. Elihu's answer to this despairing word.

1. When he looked up to God, he had no just reason to speak thus despairingly; 'There is a day of judgment, when all the seeming disorders of providence will be set to rights, and its dark chapters expounded.' When we consider that God is infinitely wise, and righteous, and faithful, and that He is a God of judgment, (Isa. 30: 18.) we shall see no reason to despair of relief from Him, but all reason to hope in Him, that it will come in due time, in the best time.

2. That, if he had not yet seen an end of his troubles, the reason was, Because he did not thus trust in God, and wait for Him, v. 15. 'The affliction which came at first from love, has now displeasure mixed with it.' If there be mixtures of divine wrath in our afflictions, it is because we do not behave aright under them; we quarrel with God, are fretful and impatient, and distrustful of the Divine Providence. This was Job's case; The foolishness of man perverts his way, and then his heart frets against the Lord; yet Elihu thinks Job, being in great extremity, did not know and consider that as he should, that it was his own fault that he was not yet delivered.

He concludes, therefore, that Job opens his mouth in vain, v. 16. It is in vain for us either to appeal to God, or to acquit ourselves, if we do not study to answer the end of affliction; and in vain to pray for relief, if we do not [do our best, and] trust in God: let not that man who distrusts God, think that he shall receive any thing from Him. Or this may refer to all that Job had said. Having showed the absurdity of some passages in his discourse, he concludes there were many others, in like manner, the fruits of his ignorance and mistake. He did not, as his other friends, condemn him for a hypocrite, but charges him only with Moses' sin, speaking unadvisedly with his lips, when his spirit was provoked. When at any time we do so, (and who is there that offends not in word?) it is a mercy to be told of it, and we must take it patiently and kindly, as Job did; not repeating, but recanting, what we have said amiss.

CHAP. XXXVI. Elihu, having largely reproved Job for some of his unadvised speeches, which Job had nothing to say in vindication of, here comes, more generally, to set him to rights in his notions of God's dealings with him. His other friends had stood to it, that, because he was a wicked man, therefore his afflictions were so great and so long. But Elihu only maintained, that the affliction was sent for his trial, and that, therefore, it was lengthened out, because Job was not, as yet, thoroughly humbled under it, nor had duly accommodated himself to it. He urges many reasons, taken from the wisdom and righteousness of God, his care of his people, and especially his greatness and almighty power, with which, in this and the following ch. he persuades him to submit to the hand of God.

V. 1—4. Once more Elihu begs the patience of the auditory, and Job's particularly, for, 1. He had a good cause, a noble and fruitful subject; to speak on God's behalf. Some, indeed, pretend to speak on God's behalf, who really speak for themselves; but those who sincerely appear in the cause of God, and speak in behalf of his honor, his truths, his ways, his people, shall be sure neither to want instructions, nor to lose their cause, or their fee: or to exhaust their subject. They that have spoken ever so much, may yet find more to be spoken on God's behalf.

2. He had something uncommon to offer, (v. 3.) i. e. 'We will have recourse to our first principles, and the highest notions we can make use of to serve any purpose.' It is worth while to go far, and seek earnestly for this knowledge of God, it will recompense our pains, and [cannot be bought too dear.]

3. His design was undeniably honest; to maintain and clear this truth, that God is righteous in all his ways. In speaking of God, and for Him, it is good to remember that He is our Maker; if He be our Maker, we have our all from Him, must use our all for Him, and be very zealous for his honor.

4. That his management should be very just and fair, v. 4. He will make use of plain, solid arguments, and not the subtleties and niceties of the schools. The perfection of our knowledge, in this world, is, to be honest and sincere in searching out truth, in applying it to ourselves, and in making use of what we know for the good of others.

V. 5—14. Elihu, being to speak on God's behalf, and particularly to ascribe righteousness to his Maker, here shows, that the disposals of Divine Providence are all, not only according to the eternal counsels of his will, but according to the eternal rules of equity. God acts as a righteous Governor. For,

1. He does not think it below Him to notice the meanest of his subjects. Mighty men are apt to look with a haughty disdain on those that are not of distinction, and make no figure; but God, though infinitely mighty, despises not any, v. 5. He takes cognizance of the affairs of the meanest, to do them justice, and to show them kindness. Job thought himself and his cause slighted, because God did not immediately appear for him.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

It is very useful to appeal to men's reason and conscience, concerning their conduct in those things, which have been evidently faulty.—The immensity of the works of God may lead us to some feeble apprehensions of his infinite Majesty; and the consideration of his underived and unchangeable glory and felicity should convince us, that all his commandments, laws, judgments, and dispensations result from his unchangeable perfections. He forbids [by all his laws natural or moral] and punishes that which is evil in itself, and tends to misery: He commands and delights in what is good and tends to felicity, without any possible accession to his own infinite blessedness. This is the proper display of his own glory, and demands the tribute of our adoring praise. The Judge of all the earth cannot but do right, and as He cannot receive any thing from us, which He has not first given unto us, we can have no cause to complain of hard measure when afflicted: and as our Judge is now, as a Savior, on a mercy-seat, we can have no reason to conclude, that it would be in vain for us to repent, to seek forgiveness, and to cleanse ourselves from our iniquities: and when impatience, pride, and unbelief suggest such conclusions, we associate ourselves for the time with the workers of iniquity, and expose ourselves to just reproofs. When God's corrections excite obstinacy, impatience, and unbelief, He will infuse more anger into the bitter cup; will withhold comfort, and appear to disregard the extremities, to which even his people are reduced. Then their rebellious murmurs only add to their guilt and vexation, and they multiply words without knowledge, in attempting to excuse themselves. Let us not then, under affliction, prolong our own misery, by keeping at a distance from the throne of grace, standing in our own vindication, expecting help from other quarters, or despairing of help from God. SCOTT.

Verses 5—15.

In this passage, Elihu laid down his system of divine providence; in which he spake more accurately than the other disputants had done, without attempting to decide on Job's character. Yet he seems to have leaned to the sentiments of Job's friends, that, in some way or other, temporal deliverance and prosperity, or the contrary, generally distinguished between the righteous and the wicked.—Elihu further stated, that wicked men were not under that peculiar protection, which secured the righteous; and therefore their lives were more exposed, and generally terminated prematurely; and this indeed might often take place by the judgment of God, in doing right to the poor but [l] giveth right to the * poor.

7 He [m] withdraweth not his eyes from the righteous: but [n] with kings are they on the throne; yea, [o] he doth establish them for ever, and they are exalted.

8 And [p] if they be bound in fetters, and be holden in [q] cords of affliction;

9 Then [r] he showeth them their work and [s] their transgressions, that they have exceeded.

10 He [t] openeth also their ear to discipline, and [u] commandeth that they return from iniquity.

11 [x] If they obey and serve him, they shall [y] spend their days in prosperity, and their years in pleasures.

12 But [z] if they obey not, they shall † perish by the sword, and they shall [a] die without knowledge.

13 But the hypocrites in heart [b] heap up wrath: [c] they cry not when he [d] bindeth them.

14 ‡ They [e] die in youth, and their life is among the § unclean.

15 He [f] delivereth the ‖ poor in his affliction,

'No,' says Elihu, 'God despises not any;' which is a good reason why we should honor all men. Therefore God despises not any, because his wisdom and strength are incontestably infinite, and the condescensions of his grace can be no diminution to Him. They that are wise and good, will not look on any with scorn and disdain.

2. He gives no countenance to the greatest, if they be bad, v. 6. Their life may be prolonged, yet not under any special care of the Divine Providence, but only its common protection. Job had said, the wicked live, become old, and are mighty in power, ch. 21: 7. 'No,' says Elihu, 'He seldom suffers wicked men to become old. He preserves not their life so long as they expected, nor with that comfort and satisfaction which are indeed our life; and their preservation is but a reservation for the day of wrath,' Rom. 2: 5. [2 Pet. 2: 9.]

3. He is always ready to right those that are any way injured, and to plead their causes, v. 6. He gives right to the poor, avenges their quarrel on their persecutors, and forces them to restore what they have robbed them of. If men will not right the injured poor, God will.

4. He takes a particular care for the protection of his good subjects, v. 7. He withdraws not his eyes from the righteous. Though they seem sometimes neglected and forgotten, and that befalls them which looks like an oversight of Providence, yet the tender, careful eye of their Heavenly Father never withdraws from them. If our eye be ever toward God in duty, his eye will be ever on us in mercy, even when we are at the lowest.

(1.) Sometimes He prefers good people to places of trust and honor, v. 7. When advanced to places of honor and power, it is in mercy to them; for God's grace in them will both arm against the temptations that attend preferment, and enable them to improve opportunities of doing good. It is also in mercy to others; When the righteous bear rule, the city rejoices. But, because it is not often we see good men made great men in this world, this may be supposed to refer to the honor to which the righteous shall rise when their Redeemer shall stand at the latter day on the earth.

(2.) If, at any time, also, He bring them into affliction, it is for the good of their souls, v. 8—10. The distress supposed, v. 8. is imprisonment, as in Joseph's case, or pain, sickness, and poverty, as in Job's; he was caught, and kept fast, in the cords of anguish, so some read. God's design in bringing his people into such distresses is, the benefit of their souls; which consideration should reconcile us to affliction, and make us think well of it. Three things God intends, when He afflicts, [1.] To discover past sins, and bring them to our remembrance, v. 9. shows them that amiss in them, which, before, they did not see; [2.] To dispose our hearts to receive present instructions; then He opens their ear to discipline, v. 10. Whom God chastens, He teaches; (Ps. 94: 12.) and the affliction makes people willing to learn, softens the wax, that it may receive the impression of the seal; yet it does not do it of itself, but the grace of God, working with and by it: He opens the ear that opens the heart, who has the key of David. [3.] To deter and draw us off from iniquity for the future. The affliction is a command to return from iniquity, to have no more to do with sin, to turn from it with an aversion to it, and a resolution never to return to it any more, Hos. 14: 8.

(3.) If the affliction do its work, and accomplish that for which it is sent, He will comfort them again, according to the time He has afflicted them, v. 11. Piety is the only sure way to prosperity and pleasure; this is a certain truth, and yet few will believe it. If we faithfully serve God, we have the promise of outward prosperity, as far as is for God's glory and our good; and who would desire them any further? We have the possession of inward pleasures, the comfort of communion with God, and a good conscience, and that great peace which they have that love God's law. If we rejoice not in the Lord always, and in hope of eternal life, it is our own fault; and what better pleasures can we spend our years in?

(4.) If the affliction do not its work, if his rod do not cure, his sword will kill, v. 12. and the consuming fire will prevail, if the refining fire do not. If Ahaz, in his distress, trespass yet more against the Lord, this is that king Ahaz that is marked for ruin, 2 Chr. 28: 22. Jer. 6: 29, 30. God would have instructed them by afflictions, but they received not instruction, would not take the hints given them; therefore they shall die without knowledge, ere they are aware, without any further previous notices; or, because without knowledge, notwithstanding the means of knowledge they were blessed with. They that die without knowledge, die without grace, and are undone for ever.

Lastly, He brings ruin on hypocrites, the secret enemies of his kingdom, such as he described, v. 12. who, though numbered among the righteous whom he had spoken of before, yet did not obey Him, but, being children of disobedience and darkness, become children of wrath and perdition; these are the hypocrites in heart, who heap up wrath, v. 13. See the nature of hypocrisy; it lies in the heart, which is for the world and the flesh, when the outside seems to be for God and religion. See the mischievousness of it; hypocrites heap up wrath. They are doing that every day which is provoking to God, and will be reckoned with for it altogether in the great day. Rom. 2: 5. Their sins are laid up in store with God among his treasures, Deut. 32: 34. Comp. Jam. 5: 3. They think they are heaping up wealth, heaping up merits, but, when the treasures are opened, it will prove they were heaping up wrath.

Observe, what they do to heap up wrath: They cry not when He binds them; i. e. When in affliction, bound with the cords of trouble, their hearts are hardened, they are stubborn and unhumbled, and will not cry to God, nor apply to Him. Christ denounced many woes against such hypocrites, if they continue impenitent, (v. 14.) 1. They shall die a sudden death, die in youth, when death is most a surprise; and death (i. e. the consequences of it) is always so to hypocrites; as they that die in youth die when they hoped to live, so hypocrites, at death, go to hell, when they hoped to go to heaven. 2. They shall die the second death; their life, after death, (for so it comes in here,) is among the unclean; the fornicators, so (8—14), &c. . . . 'We have obtained glimpses of some of the sanctions of the moral law, which may be briefly recapitulated. If we obey it, we enjoy, 1. The highest gratifications of which our nature is susceptible, in habitual and sustained activity of our noblest faculties. 2. We become objects of esteem and affection to our fellow men, and enjoy exalted social pleasure. 3. Whatever we undertake, being projected in harmony with the course of nature, will prosper. 4. By observing the moral law, we shall place ourselves in the most favorable condition for obeying the organic law, and then enjoy health of body and buoyancy of mind. 5. By obeying the moral, intellectual and organic laws, we shall place ourselves in the best condition for observing the physical laws, and thereby reap countless benefits conferred by them.

'We need just to reverse the picture, to perceive, on the other hand, the penalties by which the Creator punishes infringements of the moral law. There is denial of that elevated, refined, and steady enjoyment which springs from the supreme activity of the moral sentiments and intellect, and from the perception of the harmony between them and the institutions of creation. By infringing the moral law, we become objects of dislike and aversion to our fellow men; and this carries denial of gratification to our social faculties. Whatever we undertake in opposition to the moral law, being an enterprise against the course of nature, cannot succeed; and its fruits must therefore be disappointment and vexation. Inattention to the moral and intellectual law incapacitates us for obedience to the organic and physical laws; and sickness, pain and poverty overtake us. The whole scheme of creation, then, appears constituted for the purpose of enforcing obedience to the moral law;—virtue, religion and happiness, seem to be founded in the inherent constitution of the human faculties, and in the adaptation of the world to them; and not to depend on the fancies, the desires, or the mere will of man.' Combe. Constit. of Man. V. 15—23. Elihu here comes more closely to Job; and,

I. He tells him what God would have done for him, before this, if he had been duly humbled under his affliction, v. 15. 'We all know how ready God is to deliver the poor in his affliction; He always was so; the poor in spirit, those that are of a broken and contrite heart, He looks upon with tenderness, and is ready to help them in affliction. Even so would He have done to thee, if thou hadst submitted to his providence, and conducted thyself well. If thou hadst accommodated thyself to the will of God, thy liberty and plenty would have been restored to thee with advantage,' v. 16. See Deut. 32: 14. Note, It ought to silence us under our afflictions, to consider that, if we were better, it would be every way better with us: if we had answered the ends of an affliction, the affliction would be removed; and deliverance would come, if we were ready for it. God would have done well for us, if we had conducted ourselves well, Ps. 81: 13, 14. Is. 48: 18.

II. He charges him with standing in his own light, and makes him the cause of the continuance of his own trouble, v. 17. 'Whatever thou art really, in this thou hast conducted thyself like a wicked man, hast spoken and done like such; therefore judgment and justice take hold on thee as a wicked man; such as a man's cause is, such will the judgment of God be upon him.' So Patrick.

III. He cautions him not to persist in his frowardness.

1. Let him not make light of divine vengeance, nor feel secure, as if in no danger of it, v. 18. 'Because God is a righteous Governor, who resents all affronts to his government, therefore beware lest He take thee away suddenly with his stroke; and be so wise as to make thy peace with Him quickly, and get his anger turned away from thee.' A warning to this purport Job had given his friends, ch 19: 29. Thus contenders are apt, with too much boldness, to bind one another over to the judgment of God, and threaten one another with his wrath: but he that keeps a good conscience, needs not fear the impotent menaces of proud men. This was a friendly caution to Job, and necessary. Even good men have need to be kept to their duty by the fear of God's wrath. 'Thou art a wise and good man, but beware lest He take thee away, for the wisest and best have enough in them to deserve his stroke.'

2. Let him not promise himself escape, (v. 19, 20.) from God's wrath, through wealth, numbers, or obscurity; or imagine that God retires, as people to their beds. Some understand it of the night of death; that night cuts off men from their place, and Job had earnestly breathed for it, as the hireling desires the evening, ch. 7: 2. Those that passionately wish for death, as a shelter from God's wrath, may perhaps be mistaken. There are those whom wrath pursues into that night.

3. Let him not continue his unjust quarrel with God and his providence, which hitherto he had persisted in, when he should have submitted to the affliction, v. 21. Let us never dare think a favorable thought of sin, nor allow ourselves in it. Elihu thinks Job had need of this caution, he having chosen iniquity rather than affliction, i. e. rather to gratify his own pride and humor in contending with God, than to mortify it by a submission to Him, and accepting the punishment. We may take it more generally, and observe, that they who choose iniquity rather than affliction, make a very foolish choice; they that ease their cares by sinful pleasures, increase their wealth by sinful pursuits, escape their troubles by sinful projects, and evade sufferings for righteousness' sake by sinful compliances against their consciences, these make a choice they will repent of, for there is more evil in the least sin than in the greatest affliction. It is an evil, it is only evil.

4. Let him not dare prescribe to the Almighty, nor give Him his measures, v. 22, 23. (1.) Who puts Him in mind of his way? (so some, v. 23.) Does the Eternal Mind need a remembrancer? No, his own way, as well as ours, is ever before Him, Isa. 40: 13, 14. let us then leave it to Him to govern the world, who is fit to do it. (2.) He is an incomparable Teacher; Who teaches like Him? See Ps. 94: 9, 10. Observe, when Elihu would give glory to God as a Ruler, he praises Him as a Teacher, for rulers must teach; God does so, He binds with the cords of a man. In this, as in all, He is unequalled. None so fit to direct his own and our actions as He: none teaches with such authority and convincing evidence, such condescension and compassion, such power and efficacy, as God. He teaches by the Bible, and that is the best book, by his Son, and He is the best Master. (3.) He is unexceptionably just in all his proceedings; Who can say, Thou hast wrought iniquity? Not, Who dares say it? (many do iniquity, and persons tell them of it, at their peril;) but, Who can say it? Say it with cause, and prove it? It is a maxim without limitation, that the King of kings can do no wrong.

V. 24—33. Elihu is here endeavoring to possess Job with great and high thoughts of God, and so to persuade him into a cheerful submission to his providence.

I. He represents the work of God, in general, as illustrious and conspicuous, v. 24. We are

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—15. When wise and pious men speak in the behalf of God, they are entitled to our strictest and most patient attention. But those who attempt this service, should beware of insincerity and corrupt motives: for many professed teachers of divine truth are evidently consulting their own interest and reputation, and not seeking to glorify God and edify their brethren.—In the glorious character of our God, almighty power, infinite wisdom, and omniscience, harmonize with the most perfect justice, and the most condescending goodness and mercy: and, while his providential kindness reaches to the most rebellious of his enemies on earth; He receives to his special favor the meanest and most guilty, who trust in his mercy, and seek to return to Him and his service. May we enjoy his love, and copy his example; and not despise the poor and weak, or treat with undue severity, or disdain, the most atrocious criminals.—The wicked, however, have no security for the preservation of their lives and comforts: they are interested in no promises, but lie under dreadful threatenings, and are liable every moment to be cut off in their sins; though they be spared from day to day, that they may have space for repentance; or if they neglect it, to fill up the measure of their iniquities. SCOTT.

Verses 16—21.

No doubt Elihu, in this conclusion, was far too severe on Job; for, though he had impatiently and rashly wished for death, he had never at all insinuated that he preferred sin to suffering. SCOTT.

here called to consider the work of God, Eccl. 7:13. 1. It is what men behold, plain before our eyes, nothing more obvious. Look which way we will, we see the productions of God's wisdom and power. Every man may see, afar off, the heaven and all its lights, the earth and all its fruits, to be the work of Omnipotence: much more when we behold them nigh at hand. Look at the minutest works of nature through a microscope! The eternal power and godhead of the Creator are clearly seen and understood, by the things that are made. Every man, even those that have not the benefit of divine revelation, may see this, for there is no speech or language where the voice of these natural, constant preachers is not heard. 2. It ought to be marvellous in our eyes. Man may see his works, and is capable of discerning his hand in them, (which the beasts are not,) therefore man ought to praise them, and give Him the glory of them.

II. He represents God, their Author, as infinite and unsearchable, v. 26. The streams of being, power, and perfection, should lead us to the Fountain. God is great, infinitely so: great, and therefore we know Him not; we know that He is, but not what He is; we know what He is not, but not what He is. We know in part, but not in perfection. This comes in here, as a reason why we must not arraign his proceedings, nor find fault with what He does, because it is speaking evil of the things we understand not, and answering a matter before we hear it. We know not the duration of his existence, for He is eternal: He is a being without beginning, succession, or period, who ever was, and ever will be, and ever the same, the great I AM. This is a good reason why we should not prescribe to Him, or quarrel with Him, because, as He is, such are his operations, quite out of our reach. Thus shall we avoid this [insufferable] presumption, and be filled with proper humility, reverence and adoration.

III. He gives some instances of God's wisdom, power, and sovereign dominion, in the works of nature, and the dispensations of common providence; beginning, in this ch. with the clouds, and rain. We need not be critical in examining either the phrase, or the philosophy, of this noble discourse. Consider the clouds,

1. As springs to this lower world; the source and treasure of its moisture, and a necessary provision, the stagnation of which would be as hurtful to this lower world, as of the blood to the body of man. It is worth while to observe, in this common occurrence, (1.) That the clouds above distil on the earth below: therefore thus the promise of plenty runs, I will hear the heavens, and they shall hear the earth. This intimates that every good gift is from above, and it instructs us to direct our prayers to God, and to look up. (2.) That they are here said to distil upon man, v. 28. for tho' it rain in the wilderness, where no man is, ch. 34: 26. Ps. 104: 11. special respect is had to man herein; among men, He causes his rain to fall upon the just, and upon the unjust. (3.) They are said to distil the water in small drops; not in spouts, as when the windows of heaven were opened. God waters the earth with what He once drowned it with, to let us know how much we lie at his mercy, and how kind He is, in giving rain by drops. (4.) Sometimes the rain pours down in great rain, and this difference between one shower and another must be resolved into the Divine Providence which orders it so. (5.) Though it comes down in drops, yet it distils upon man abundantly, (v. 28.) and therefore is called the river of God which is full of water. (6.) The clouds pour down according to the vapor they draw up, v. 27. So just the heavens are to the earth, but the earth is not so in return. (7.) The produce of the clouds is, sometimes, a great terror, at others, a great favor, v. 31. When He pleases, by them He judges the people He is angry with. [Note, 28: 4.] Storms, and tempests, and excessive rains, de-

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 16—33. It is lamentable, that men professing godliness should ever so yield to murmurs and despondency, as to seem to favor the cause, and justify the objections, of the wicked. Surely they ought to be plainly rebuked; and even warned not to deceive themselves, but to fear lest that wrath come on them, which awaits 'the workers of iniquity:' for how can it be determined that they are the servants of God, who are imitating the conduct of his enemies?—All should remember, that men at death are cut off in their place, and their condition becomes eternally irreversible. (Ec. 11:3—6.) Instead therefore of shrinking from adversity, we should seek deliverance from the love and power of sin; and prefer the greatest suffering to the least iniquity. Yet alas! most men 'choose iniquity rather than affliction.' But this is a miserable choice, of which they will at length bitterly repent; for the favor of God alone can exalt or make us happy.—Every appearance in nature at once displays, and conceals, his infinite glories: much remains incomprehensible; but enough is seen to call forth our gratitude, animate our praises, or excite our consternation. The clouds and rain, with the thunders and lightnings, declare his goodness, and proclaim 'the power of his wrath.' Each object bears a double aspect; and while the worker of iniquity ought to tremble, the true believer should rejoice. (Ps. 97: 1. 99: 1—3.) 'It is the glorious God that maketh the thunder,' as well as that fertilizes the earth; and the children should hear with pleasure their Father's voice, even when nature seems convulsed, and He speaks in terror to his enemies. (Ps. 29:3—11. P. O.) the light of the sun and darkened the air.—It seems evident, that a terrible storm, actually approaching, suggested these thoughts to Elihu. SCOTT.

(27, 28.) 'Elihu adverts to the formation of clouds, and rain, which, notwithstanding the extent of modern discoveries, still (1824) remain, in a great measure, unknown. That exhalation is one cause, is generally admitted, and that heat produces this is ascertained; but by what laws the heat is regulated, so as at one time to hold the particles of water in a buoyant form, and at another, to cause them to fall in gentle or impetuous rain, who can tell? That rain may be formed of different gases, [oxygen and hydrogen,] and that the great agent is heat, has been discovered; but what are the causes of the heat being collected in one part of the atmosphere, or of its [or the gases] being evolved, who can inform us? It is above our comprehension.' BOOTHR.

Hutton's theory of rain, (1787,) is this; 'Air, in cooling, has the property of depositing the moisture it contains. But how is it cooled in the free atmosphere, unless by the contact or commixture of a colder portion? Now the portion of air which is chilled must, in an equal degree, warm the other. If, in consequence, the former be disposed to resign its moisture, the latter is more inclined to retain it; and so, if such opposite effects were balanced, there could on the whole be no precipitation of moisture. The separation of moisture, on the mixing of two masses of damp air at different temperatures, would therefore prove, that the dissolving power of air suffers more diminution from losing part of the combined heat, than it acquires augmentation from gaining an equal measure of it; and consequently, this power must, under equal accessions of heat, increase more slowly at first, than afterwards, thus advancing always with accumulated celerity. The quantity of moisture which air can hold, thus increases in a much faster ratio than its temperature. . . . Showers are most copious during hot weather, and in tropical climates. Rain is most abundant at the equator, and diminishes as we approach the pole. The quantity of rain precipitated from the atmosphere, thus depends on a variety of circumstances,—on the previous dampness of the commixed portions of the fluid,—their difference of heat,—the elevation of their mean temperature,—and the extent of the combination which takes place. When the deposition is slow, the very minute aqueous globules remain suspended and form clouds; but if it be rapid and copious, those particles conglomerate, and produce, according to the temperature of the medium through which they descend, rain, mist, snow, or hail. [Electricity also is supposed to assist or determine these phenomena.] The foregoing theory tallies precisely with our experience in the connection of rain with the variableness of the winds. Steady, dry weather is always accompanied by a steady direction of the winds; whereas in rainy weather the winds are unsteady and variable. The heavy rains of India always fall during the shifting of the monsoons; and while they last, the winds are always veering.' 1831. ENC. AM.

Elihu extols the power of God, shown in thunder and lightning, snow, rain, whirlwinds, and frost, 1—13. His works in these things are inexplicable, 14—22. His perfections should impress men with lowly fear, 23, 24.

AT this also [a] my heart trembleth, and is moved out of his place.

5 God [g] thundereth marvellously with his voice; [h] great things doeth he, which we cannot comprehend.

6 For [i] he saith to the snow, Be thou on the earth; § likewise to the small rain, and to the [k] great rain of his strength.

7 [l] He sealeth up the hand of every man; [m] that all men may know his work.

stroying the fruits of the earth, and causing inundations, come from the clouds; but, on the other hand, from them, usually, He gives meat in abundance; they drop fatness upon the pastures that are clothed with flocks, and the valleys that are covered with corn, Ps. 65: 11—13. Lastly, Notice is sometimes given of the approach of rain, v. 33. We read of its noise, [note, 1 K. 18: 41.] As the noise, so the face of the sky, shows concerning it, Luke 12: 46. The cattle also, by a strange instinct, are apprehensive of a change in the weather nigh at hand, and seek for shelter, shaming man, who will not foresee the evil, and hide himself.

2. As shadows to the upper world, v. 29. They are spread over the earth as a curtain or canopy; how we cannot understand. Shall we then pretend to understand the reasons and methods of God's judicial proceedings with the children of men? v. 32. By coming betwixt, v. 32. ch. 26: 9. (1.) Now they favor us, as an umbrella that shelters from the violent heat of the sun, which otherwise would beat upon us. A cloud of dew in the heat of harvest, is spoken of as a very great refreshment, Isa. 18: 4. (2.) Sometimes they frown on us; for they darken the earth at noon-day, and eclipse the light of the sun. Sin is compared to a cloud, (Isa. 44: 22.) because it comes between us and the light of God's countenance, and obstructs the shining of it. But though the clouds darken the sun for a time, and pour down rain, yet, The sun shines forth after the rain; after He has wearied the cloud, He spreads his light upon it, v. 30. There is a clear shining after rain; (2 Sam. 23: 4.) the sunbeams are darted forth, and reach to cover even the bottom of the sea, thence to exhale a fresh supply of vapors, and so recruit the clouds. In all this we must remember to magnify the work of God.

CHAP. XXXVII. Elihu here goes on to extol the wonderful power of God in the meteors, and all the changes of the weather: if, in those changes, we submit to the will of God, take the weather as it is, and make the best of it, why should we not do so in other changes of our condition?

V. 1—5. Thunder and lightning, which usually go together, are sensible indications of the glory and majesty, the power and terror, of Almighty God, one to the ear, and the other to the eye; in these, God leaves not Himself without witness of his greatness, as, in the rain from heaven, and fruitful seasons, He leaves not Himself without witness of his goodness, (Acts 14: 17.) even to the most stupid and unthinking. Though there are natural causes and useful effects of them, which the philosophers undertake to account for, yet they seem chiefly designed by the Creator to startle and awaken the slumbering world of mankind to the consideration of a God above them. It is very probable, that, while Elihu was speaking, it thundered and lightened, for he speaks of it as present: and God being about to speak, (ch. 38: 1.) these were, as afterward on Sinai, the proper prefaces to command attention and awe.

Our hearts, like Elihu's, should tremble at the thunder, for fear of God's judgments, Ps. 119: 120. He also calls on Job to attend to it, v. 2. Perhaps, as yet, it thundered at a distance, and could not be heard without listening. Thunder is called the voice of the Lord, (Ps. 29: 3, &c.) because, by it, God speaks to men, to fear before Him, and it should remind us of that mighty word by which the world was at first made, which is called thunder, Ps. 104: 7. At the voice of thy thunder, they hasted away, namely, the waters, when God said, Let them be gathered into one place. They that are themselves affected with God's greatness should labor to affect others. From this one instance we may argue to all, that, in the dispensations of his providence, there is that which is too great, too strong, for us to strive against, and too high, too deep, for us to arraign or quarrel with.

V. 6—13. The changes and extremities of the weather, are the subject of a great deal of our common talk and observation; but how seldom we think and speak of these things, as Elihu does here, with an awful regard to God the Director of them, who shows his power, and serves the purposes of his providence, by them? We must notice the glory of God, not only in the thunder and lightning, but in the more common revolutions of the weather, which are not so terrible, and which make less noise. As,

1. In the snow and rain, v. 6. The winter rain, so the LXX; for, in these countries, when the winter was past, the rain was over and gone, Cant. 2: 11. The distinction in the Heb. between the small and the great rain, is this, that the former is called a shower of rain, the latter of rains, many showers in one; but all are the showers of his strength. It is sin and folly to contend with God's providence in the weather; can we hinder, shall we be angry at them? It is as absurd to quarrel with any other disposal of Providence concerning ourselves or ours.

The effect of winter is, that it obliges both men and beasts to retire, making it uncomfortable and unsafe to go abroad, v. 7, 8. Note, The less we have at any time to do in the world, the more we should do for God and our souls. When thus confined to our houses, we should thereby be driven to our Bibles and our knees. Nature directs all creatures to shelter themselves from a storm; and shall man only be unprovided with an ark?

2. In the winds, v. 9. Out of the hidden place, so it may be read, comes the whirlwind; out of the secret chamber, as the word signifies, which I am not so willing to understand of the south, because he says here, (v. 17.) that the wind out of the S. so far from being a whirlwind, is a warming, quieting wind. But, at this time, perhaps, Elihu saw a whirlwind-cloud coming out of the S. and making toward them, out of which the Lord spake soon after, ch. 38: 1. Or, if turbulent winds, which bring showers, come out of the S. cold and drying blasts come out of the N. to scatter the vapors, and clear the air of them.

3. In the frost, v. 10. See the cause of it; the breath of God, i. e. the word of his power, and the command of his will; or, as some understand it, the wind, which is the breath of God, as the thunder is his voice; it is caused by the cold freezing wind out of the N. See its effect; the waters that had spread themselves, and flowed with liberty, are congealed, benumbed, arrested, bound up in crystal fetters. This is such an instance of God's power as, if it were not common, would be next to a miracle.

4. In the clouds; the womb where all these watery meteors are conceived, of which he had

Thou hast a mind to reason with God, and wouldst have us to contend with Him on thy behalf; teach us, then, what to say. 2. He owns his own insufficiency, in speaking both to, and of God, by reason of darkness. Note, The best of men are much in the dark concerning the glorious perfections of the divine nature, and the administrations of the divine government. They that through grace know much of God, know little, nothing, in comparison with what is to be known, and will be known, when what is perfect is come, and the veil rent. When we would speak of God, we speak confusedly and with great uncertainty, and are soon at a loss. As we must always begin with fear and trembling, lest we speak amiss, so we must conclude with shame and blushing, for having spoken no better. Elihu himself had, for his part, spoken well on God's behalf, yet he is so far from thinking God beholden to him for it, or that he was fit to be standing counsel for God, that, (1.) He is even ashamed of what he has said; fears the subject has suffered by his undertaking it, and his performance, so far from meriting thanks, needs pardon. Shall it be told Him, as a meritorious service, that I speak? When we have done all we can for God, we must acknowledge we are unprofitable servants, and have nothing to boast of. He is afraid of saying more. If a man speak, if he undertake to plead, for God, much more, against Him, surely he shall be swallowed up. If he speak presumptuously, God's wrath shall soon consume him; but if ever so well, he will soon lose himself in the mystery, and be overpowered by the divine lustre. Astonishment will strike him blind and dumb.

V. 21—24. Elihu here concludes with some short, but great, sayings concerning God's glory, as desiring to possess others, with his own holy awe. He speaks concisely, and in haste, because, it should seem, he perceived that God was about to take the work into his own hands.

1. He observes, that God, who has said that He will dwell in the thick darkness, and make that his pavilion, is in that awful chariot advancing toward them, as if preparing his throne for judgment, surrounded with clouds and darkness. He saw the cloud, with a whirlwind in its bosom, coming out of the S.; but now it hung so thick, so black, over skies of our N. climates in a rainy morning; and soon after we saw large columns of sand and dust whirled up into the air, and carried along in a body over the plain with a slow and stately motion. One of these passed within a few yards of us, to the N. having been driven over a stony land, to a distance of perhaps 20 miles. It was apparently 80 to 100 ft. in diam., and was certainly of sufficient force, by its constant whirling motion, to throw both men and animals off their legs, so that if crossing a caravan, and broken by the interruption of its course, the danger of suffocation to persons buried beneath its fall would be very great, though, if there were prepared for it, it might not perhaps be fatal.' But at his nearer approach, he is in the utmost hurry and confusion: he is afraid to open his mouth; he is lost in amazement. The glory of God is too dazzling for mortal eyes. their heads, that they could none of them see the bright light, which just before was in the clouds. The light of the sun was now eclipsed; this reminded him of the darkness, by reason of which he could not speak, (v. 19.) and made him afraid to go on, v. 20. Luke 9: 34. Yet he looks to the N. and sees it clear that way, which gives him hope the clouds are not gathering for a deluge. He expects the wind will pass, (so it may be read,) and cleanse them; (Gen. 8: 1.) in token of the return of God's favor; and then fair weather will come out of the north (v. 22.) and all will be well God will not always frown, nor contend for ever.

2. He hastens to conclude, now that God is about to speak; therefore he delivers much in a few words, as the sum of all he had been discoursing of, which, if duly considered, would not only confirm what he had been saying, but make way for what God would say.

With God is terrible majesty Our finite understandings cannot comprehend his infinite perfections. He is excellent in power. The universal extent and irresistible force of his power, are its excellency. He is no less excellent in wisdom and righteousness; in judgment and plenty of justice; else there would be little excellency in his power. In judgments on sinners, there is yet plenty of justice, and deserts. He will not afflict, i. e. willingly; it is no pleasure to Him to grieve the children of men, much less his own children. He never afflicts but when there is cause, and need, and He does not overburden us with affliction, but considers our frame. Some read it thus: 'The Almighty, whom we cannot find out, is great in power, but He will not afflict in judgment; and with Him is plenty of justice, nor is He extreme to mark what we do amiss.' He values not the censures of those that are wise in their own conceit, v. 24. He regards the prayer of the humble, but not the presumptuous prescriptions and policies of the crafty. No, the foolishness of God is wiser than men.

Lastly, From all this it is easy to infer, that, since God is great, He is greatly to be feared; nay, because He is gracious, and will not afflict, men do therefore fear Him, for there is forgiveness with Him, that he may be feared. It is the duty and interest of all to fear God. Men shall fear Him; so some. Sooner or later they shall fear. They that will not fear the Lord and his goodness, shall for ever tremble under the pourings out of the vials of his wrath.

CHAP. XXXVIII. V. 1—3. In most disputes, the strife is, who shall have the last word. Job's friends had, in this controversy, tamely yielded it to Job, and then he to Elihu. But now it remained for God, here, as in every controversy, to decide. Job had often appealed to God, and talked boldly how he would order his cause before Him, and as a prince, go near unto Him; but this is not so easy as some think. When God took the throne, Job had nothing to say in his own defence, but was silent before Him. Job's friends had sometimes appealed to God too, ch. 11: 5. And now, at length, God speaks, when Job, by Elihu's clear and close arguings, was mollified a little, and mortified, and so prepared to hear what God had to say. It is the office of ministers to prepare the way of the Lord. That which the Great God designs in this discourse, is, to humble Job, and bring him to repent of, and to recant, his passionate, indecent expressions concerning God's providential dealings with him; and this He does by calling on Job to compare God's eternity with his own time, God's omniscience with his own ignorance, and God's omnipotence with his own impotency. Observe here,

1. Who speaks; The Lord Jehovah, not a created angel, but the Eternal Word Himself, the second person in the blessed Trinity, by whom the worlds were made. The same that afterward spake from Sinai. Here he begins with the creation of the world, there with the redemption of Israel out of Egypt, and from both is inferred the necessity of our subjection to Him. Elihu had said, God speaks to men, and they do not perceive it, ch. 33: 14. but this they could not but perceive, and

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The attentive mind will perceive affecting displays of the power, wisdom, goodness, and majesty of God, in the operations of nature; and the terrors excited by some of them, should remind us of that tremendous scene which will usher in 'the day of judgment, and perdition of ungodly men.' Oh, that men would attentively hearken to the voice of God, who in various ways 'warns them to flee from the wrath to come;' and from his mercy-seat, with a voice of less terror, but of more glorious excellency, invites them to accept of his salvation and be happy!—All irrational creatures obey the voice and subserve the will of the great Creator: surely then we, whom He hath endued with reason, should be shamed into obedience and submission!—Our wisdom consists, in accommodating ourselves to the situation allotted us; and in deriving benefit, as we can, from those appointments which we cannot alter; in accepting of proffered mercy in the Lord's way; in submitting to his correction and his righteousness; and in leaving all difficulties to another world.—The weather is altogether of God's appointment: it is generally ordered in mercy as well as in wisdom, for the common good; and if at any time it be really afflictive, it is sent for correction, and to call us to repentance and prayer. But the bad opinion which men entertain of the divine management, is evident in their incessant murmurs in this particular; though the result of the whole system, through the year, generally demonstrates the folly and ingratitude, as well as the rebellion, of their complaints. Believers should carefully avoid such peevishness: there are no bad days, as the Lord makes them; but we make ourselves many by our sins.—Whatever scenes we witness, whatever changes we experience, we may stay our minds on Him, who will 'give strength to his people, and bless' them with his unspeakable peace. brought on fair weather, bright and resplendent as gold; for that is the meaning of the original. (M.—Zech. 4:12. marg.)—It is evident, that, towards the close of his discourse, Elihu spake as one in great confusion. Some conjecture, that what is rendered, 'Fair weather cometh out of the N.' referred to some glorious appearance in the N. which intimated the Lord's immediate presence, as about to speak. Elihu evidently thought, Job had been irreverent and presumptuous; and when the Lord Himself spake, He brought exactly the same charge against him. (38: 40:1—5.)—In what other ancient book, can be found so exalted and just sentiments and reasonings, on the perfections and works of God, as every where occur in the sacred volume? SCOTT.

CONCLUDING NOTE. Geography, &c. of Arabia. 'On the W. coast are high chains of mountains, uniting in the N. with the mts. of Syria, and connected with the primitive mts. of Asia: among them are Sinai and Horeb. Its rivers appear only after great rains, and seldom reach the sea; the Aftan is the most considerable. The climate is very various. Countries where it rains half the year, alternate with others, where dew supplies the place of rain for the whole season. (30:10.) The greatest cold prevails on high places, and the most oppressive heat in the plains. Damp winds [v. 17?] succeed to the dry simoom [v. 9.] which is as dangerous to life as the harmattan, and khamseen in Africa. The soil consists of sandy deserts and the most fruitful fields. Wheat, millet, rice, kitchen vegetables, coffee (on trees), manna, sugar-cane, cotton, tropical fruits, senna-leaves, gums, aloes, myrrh, tobacco, indigo, odorous woods, balsam, &c. are the rich products of Arabia. There are also precious stones, iron and other metals, (gold excepted, which, howe[ver] the ancients seem to have found pure in rivers and the earth). The animals are, mules, asses, camels, buffaloes, horned cattle, goats, noble horses, lions, hyænas, antelopes, foxes, apes, jerboas; birds of all sorts, pelicans, ostriches, &c.; esculent locusts, scorpions, &c.' NOTES.

CHAP. XXXVIII. V. 1. The debate would have terminated inconclusively, had it not pleased God to interpose. With terrible majesty the Lord spake out of the cloud, or tempest, which probably was raised to a vehement whirlwind while He was speaking. (M. R.) He addressed Job, and continued Elihu's argument; 'but in inimitable words, excelling his and all other men's, in the loftiness of the style, as much as thunder doth a whisper.' Patrick.—In attempting to comment on these words of the Almighty, we may well say, with Elihu, 'If a man speak, surely he shall be swallowed up.' The very attempt might create a tremor, lest it should be reproved, 'as darkening counsel by words without knowledge:' and, as the whole discourse was intended as a reproof of the want of reverence and modesty, which an eminently wise and pious man had fallen into, it stands as a beacon, cautioning the expositor to keep at a distance from the same perilous rock. But, if giving the supposed meaning, in language more intelligible to the plain modern reader, though immensely less suited to the sublime subject, may assist in understanding the passage; the attempt will meet with a pardon from a merciful God, and perhaps a candid perusal from man. yet we have a more sure word of prophecy.

2. When; Then: when they had all had their saying, yet had not gained their point. When we know not who is in the right, and perhaps are doubtful whether we ourselves are, this may satisfy us, That God will determine shortly in the valley of decision. Job had silenced his three friends, yet could not convince them of his integrity in the main; Elihu had silenced Job, yet could not bring him to acknowledge his mismanagement of this dispute; but now God comes, and does both; convinces Job, first, of his unadvised speaking, and then, having humbled him, honors him, by convincing his three friends that they had done him wrong. These two things God will, sooner or later, do for his people; show them and make them ashamed of their faults, and show others their righteousness, bringing it forth as the light, to shame unjust censures.

3. How; Out of the whirlwind, the rolling and involving cloud, Elihu noticed, ch. 37: 1, 2, 9. A whirlwind prefaced Ezekiel's vision, (Ezek. 1: 4.) and Elijah's, 1 K. 19: 11. God is said to have his way in the whirlwind, (Nah. 1: 3.) and, to show that even the stormy wind fulfils his word, here it was made the vehicle of it. Sometimes God, to command attention, answers his own people in terrible corrections, as out of the whirlwind, but always in righteousness.

4. To whom; He answered Job, directed his speech to him, to convince him of what was amiss, before he cleared him from the unjust aspersions cast on him. It is God only that can effectually convince of sin; and those shall so be humbled, whom He designs to exalt. Those that desire to hear from God, as Job did, shall certainly hear from Him at length.

5. What He said; We may conjecture that Elihu, or some other of the auditory, wrote down verbatim what was delivered out of the whirlwind; when the thunders uttered their voices, John was prepared to write, Rev. 10: 4. Or, if it was not written then, yet, the penman of the book being inspired by the Holy Ghost, we are sure we have here a very true and exact report of what was said; The Spirit (says Christ) shall bring to your remembrance, as He did here, what I have said to you.

The preface is very searching.

(1.) God charges him with ignorance and presumption in what he had said, v. 2. 'Who talks at this rate? Is it Job? Can he so far forget himself?' Note, Darkening the counsels of God's wisdom with our folly, is a great affront and provocation to God. God's counsels are a deep we cannot fathom; we are too apt to talk of them as if we understood them; but, alas! we do but darken them, instead of explaining them; we confound and perplex ourselves and one another, when we dispute of the order of God's decrees, and the designs, and reasons, and methods, of his operations of providence and grace. A humble faith and sincere obedience shall see further and better into the secret of the Lord, than all the philosophy of their schools, and the searches of science so called. This first word which God spake is the more observable, because Job, in his repentance, fastens on it as that which succeeded to humble him, ch. 42: 3. There was some color to have turned it on Elihu, as if God meant him, for he spake last, and was speaking when the whirlwind began; but Job applied it to himself, as it becomes us to do, when faithful reproofs are given, and not (as most do) to billet them on other people.

(2.) He challenges him to give such proofs of his knowledge as would serve to justify his inquiries into the divine counsels, v. 3. 'Gird up now thy loins like a stout man; prepare for the encounter; I will demand of thee, will put some questions to thee; and answer Me, if thou canst, before I answer thine.' Those that go about to call God to an account, must expect thus to be made sensible of their ignorance and arrogance. Job had said, ch. 13: 22. Call Thou, and I will answer: 'Now make thy words good.'

V. 4—11. 1. To humble Job, God here shows him his ignorance, even concerning the earth and the sea. He could give no account of their origination; much less of heaven above or hell beneath, which are at such a distance, or of the several parts of matter which are so minute, and then, least of all, of the divine counsels.

1. I laid the foundations of the earth. This proves Him to be the only living and true God, the God of power, (Is. 40: 21. Jer. 10: 11, 12.) and encourages us to trust in Him at all times, Is. 51: 13, 16. 'Where wast thou then? Thou that hast made such a figure among the children of the east, and settest up for an oracle, and a judge of the divine counsels, where wast thou when the foundations of the earth were laid?' Christ was present when this was done; (Prov. 8: 22, &c. John 1: 1, 2.) but we are of yesterday, and know nothing. Let us not, therefore, find fault with the works of God, nor prescribe to Him.

2. Let him describe how this world was made. How it came to be so finely framed, with so much exactness, and such an admirable symmetry and proportion of all its parts, v. 5. How it came to be so firmly fixed: it is hung upon nothing, yet is established, that it cannot be moved; but who can tell upon what the foundations of it are fastened, that it may not sink with its own weight, or who laid the corner-stone thereof, that the parts of it may not fall asunder? v. 6. What God does, it shall be for ever, therefore, as we cannot find fault with God's work, so we need not be in fear concerning it; it will last, and answer the end, the work of his providence, as well as the work of creation; and the work of redemption is no less firm, of which Christ Himself is both the Foundation and the Corner-stone. The church stands as fast as the earth.

3. Let him repeat, if he can, the songs of praise at that solemnity, v. 7. The angels are called the sons of God, because they bear much of his image, are with Him, and serve Him as a son his father. Now observe here, (1.) The glory of God, as the Creator of the world, is to be celebrated with joy and triumph by all his reasonable creatures; this is the work of angels, and the more we abound in holy, humble, thankful, joyful praise, the more we do the will of God as they do it; they were unanimous in singing God's praises: and the sweetest concerts are in praising God. They all did it, even those who afterward fell, and left their first estate; even those who have praised God may, by the deceitful power of sin, be brought to blaspheme Him, and yet God will be eternally praised.

II. Concerning the limiting of the sea to the place appointed for it, v. 8, &c. This refers to the third day's work, when God said, (Gen. 1: 9.) Let the waters under the heaven be gathered together unto one place, and it was so. He seems to speak here of the sea at its formation, as of an infant at its birth, v. 8, 9. The cloud is made the garment thereof, with which it is covered, and thick darkness (i. e. shores vastly remote and distant from one another, and quite in the dark one to another) is a swaddling band for it, a cradle to receive it. See with what ease the great God manages the raging sea, notwithstanding the violence of its tides, and the strength of its billows, even as the nurse does the child in swaddling-clothes. Moreover, for the sea, as for every one of us, a place is decreed, and there are set up for it bars and doors,

Job was next called on to consider the mighty ocean. At the Creator's word, the seas separated from the dry land, issuing forth as an infant from the womb. The clouds that hover over the ocean, and the unknown shores which surround it, form, as it were, the swaddling-band and garment of it, 'as if it were but as a little babe in the hands of God.' The vast hollows of the earth are its appointed place, in which it is confined, not so much by the barrier of the shores, as by virtue of that inexplicable property, which we call gravitation. SCOTT.

v. 10. and its insolence is checked, v. 11. This is mentioned, also, as a reason why we should stand in awe of God, (Jer. 5: 22.) and yet why we should encourage ourselves in Him, Ps. 65: 7.

V. 12—24. If we will but try ourselves with such interrogatories as these, we shall soon be brought to own, that what we know is nothing in comparison with what we know not. Job is here challenged to give an account of six things.

1. Of the springs of the morning, the day-spring from on high, v. 12—15. As there is no visible being, of which we may be more firmly assured that it is, so there is none which we are more puzzled in describing, nor more doubtful in determining what it is, than the light. We welcome the morning, and are glad of the day-spring; but we take it as we find it, and as the many generations had it that went before us. 'Hast thou, at any time, ordered it earlier or later for thy convenience, or to any other place than its own? Why then pretend to direct the divine counsels, or expect to have the methods of Providence altered in favor of thee?' [Rather find out and obey its laws.] It is God that appoints the morning, and causes the earth to dress itself, as it were, and put on its garment of light. Except to evil-doers, nothing is more comfortable, pleasant, or serviceable, than the light of the morning; but God here observes how unwelcome it is to those that do evil. Job had observed what a terror the morning-light is to criminals, because it discovers them, (ch. 24: 13, &c.) and God here seconds the observation, and asks him, whether the world was indebted to him for that kindness? Whether what is here said of the morning-light, was designed to represent, as in a figure, the light of the gospel of Christ, and to give a type of it, I will not say; but I am sure it may serve to put us in mind of the encomiums given to the gospel just at the rising of its morning-star, by Zecharias, and the virgin Mary. Luke 1: 51, 78.

2. Of the springs of the sea, v. 16. 'Knowest thou what lies in the bottom of the sea, the treasures there hid in the sands? Or canst thou give an account of the rise and original of the waters of the sea? Vapors are continually exhaled out of the sea. Dost thou know how it is continually supplied? Rivers are constantly poured into the sea. Dost thou know how they are continually discharged, so as not to overflow the earth? Art thou acquainted with the secret subterraneous passages by which the waters circulate?' God's way, in the government of the world, is said to be in the sea, and in the great waters, intimating that it is hid from us, and not to be pried into by us.

3. Of the gates of death, v. 16. Death is a grand secret. (1.) We know not beforehand when, or by what means, we or others shall be brought to death; (by what road we must go the way whence we shall not return;) what disease or what disaster will be the door to let us into the house appointed for all living; Man knows not his time. (2.) We cannot describe what death is, how the knot is untied between body and soul, nor how the spirit of a man goes upward, to be we know not what, and live we know not how, as Mr. Norris expresses it; with what dreadful curiosity (says he) does the soul launch out into the vast ocean of eternity, and resign to an untried abyss! Let us make it sure that the gates of heaven shall be opened to us on the other side death. (3.) We have no correspondence at all with separate souls, nor any acquaintance with their state. While here in a world of sense, we speak of the world of spirits, as blind men do of colors, and when we remove thither, shall be amazed to find how much we have mistaken.

4. Of the breadth of the earth, v. 18. The knowledge of this might seem most within his reach; yet he is challenged to declare this, if he can. It is but a point to the universe; yet, small as it is, we cannot be exact in declaring its dimensions. Job had never sailed round the world, nor any before him; so little did men know the breadth of the earth, that it was but a few ages ago the vast continent of America was discovered, which had, time out of mind, lain hid.

5. Of the place and way of light and darkness. The day-spring was spoken of before, (v. 12.) and here again, (v. 19.) and again, v. 24. (1.) How the light and darkness were at first made; when God, in the beginning, first spread darkness upon the face of the deep, and afterward commanded the light to shine out of darkness, by that mighty word, Let there be light, was Job a witness? can he tell where the fountains of light and darkness are, and where those mighty princes keep their courts distinct, while in one world they rule alternately? Though we long ever so much either for the shining forth of the morning, or the shadows of the evening, we know not whither to send, or go, to fetch them, nor can tell the paths to the house thereof, v. 20. Nor are we old enough to describe the birth of the first-born of the visible creation, v. 21. Shall we then undertake to discourse of God's counsels, which were from eternity, or to find out the paths to the house thereof, to solicit for their alteration? God glories, that He forms the light and creates the darkness; we must take those as we find them, and in like manner, accommodate ourselves to the peace and the evil God likewise created, Is. 45: 7. (2.) How they still keep their turns interchangeably. It is God that makes the outgoings of the morning and of the evening to rejoice: we cannot so much as tell whence they come, or whither they go, v. 24. or how the light is parted in the morning, when, in an instant, it shoots itself into all parts of the air above the horizon, as on the wings of the wind, so swiftly, so strongly, scattering the darkness of the night, as the east-wind does the clouds. Hence we read of the wings of the morning, Ps. 139: 9. It is a marvellous change, that passes over us every morning by the return of the light, and every evening by the return of the darkness; but we expect them, and so they are no surprise or uneasiness. If we would, in like manner, count on changes in our outward condition, we should neither in the brightest noon count on perpetual day, nor in the darkest midnight despair of the return of the morning, Eccl. 7: 14.

6. Of the treasures of the snow and hail, v. 22, 23. In the clouds the snow and hail are generated, thence they come in such abundance, that one would think there were treasures of them laid up in store there, whereas indeed they are produced extempore, as I may say, on the occasion. Sometimes they come so opportunely, to serve the purposes of Providence, in God's fighting for his people, and against his and their enemies, that one would think they were laid up as magazines, against the day of battle and war; when God will either contend with the world in general, as in the deluge, or with some particular persons or parties, as Josh. 10: 11. What folly to strive against God!

V. 25—41. Hitherto, God had put such questions to Job, as were proper to convince him of his ignorance and short-sightedness. Now, He 34 [z] Canst thou lift up thy voice to the comes, in the same manner, to show his impotency and weakness.

I. Has Job thunder, lightning, rain, and frost, at command, as God! Observe,

1. How great God is. He has divided a water-course, directs the rain where to fall, even when the shower is most violent, with as much certainty as if it were conveyed by canals or conduit-pipes. Every drop goes as it is directed. God has sworn, that the waters of Noah shall no more return to cover the earth; and we see He is able to make good his promise. The lightning and thunder go not at random, but in the way He directs them. They are mentioned here, because He prepares the lightnings for the rain, Ps. 135: 7. Let not those then that fear God, be afraid of the lightning or the thunder, God means no hurt to such, v. 26, 27. God's providence reaches farther than man's industry; and He can make the earth fruitful, without any art or pains of ours, Gen. 2: 5, 6. it is He that gives the increase. With very peculiar favor He visits and regards man, yet does not overlook the inferior creatures, but causes the bud of the tender herb to spring forth for food for all flesh, as well as for the service of man. Even the wild asses shall have their thirst quenched, Ps. 104: 11. God is, in a sense, the Father of the rain, v. 28. produces it by his power, governs and directs it, and makes what use he pleases of it. Even the small drops of the dew He distils on the earth, as the God of nature, and, as the God of grace, rains righteousness on us, and is Himself as the dew unto Israel; see Hos. 14: 5, 6. Mic. 5: 7. The ice and the frost, (v. 29, 30.) are very common things, which lessens their strangeness. But, considering what a change is made by them in a very little time, how the waters are hid as with a stone, as with a grave-stone, laid on them; (so thick, so strong, is the ice, covering sometimes the face even of the deep;) we may well ask, 'What created power could produce such a wonderful work?' None but that of the Creator Himself. Frost and snow come from Him, and therefore should lead our thoughts and meditations to Him. And we shall the more easily bear the inconveniences of winter, if we learn to make this good use of it.

2. Observe, How weak man is; can he do such things? Could Job? v. 34, 35. (1.) If we lift up our voice to God, to pray for rain, we may have it; (Zech. 10: 1.) but if we lift up our voice to the clouds, to demand it, they will soon tell us they are not at our beck, and we shall go without it, Jer. 14: 22. The heavens will not hear the earth, unless God hear them, Hos. 2: 21. See what poor, indigent, depending creatures we are; we cannot do without rain, nor can we have it when we will. (2.) He cannot commission one flash of lightning, v. 35. 'Canst thou send lightnings, that they may go on thine errand, and do the execution thou wishest for? Will they come at thy call?' No, the ministers of God's wrath will not be ministers of ours. Why should they, since the wrath of man works not the righteousness of God? See Luke 9: 55.

(31, 32.) Pleiades, Orion.] 'Heb. Kymah, (Orion.) Kesil, Pleiades or Hyades, so most agree. See note, 9:9. The Pleiades are also termed Vergiliæ, by the Latins, because they announce the spring (ver), and at their rise the season again becomes mild, the earth loosens, and vegetation revives, and puts forth blossoms: which is understood by the Heb. word maadannoth, delicias, [tr. "sweet influences,"] denoting the beauty and amenity of the spring. So Beigelius, in Ideler, tr. "Canst thou bind on (scatter abroad in the earth) the ornaments [the gemmed jewelry] of the Pleiades?" The Persian poets Saadi and Hafiz speak of "the knots of the Pleiades." To these is opposed the constellation Kesyl, i. e. Orion, because at his rising he excites clouds and tempests, whence Virgil has "cloudy Orion;" here however it is put for the stars bringing the wintry storms, and cold. Cocceius tr. "Canst thou bind again with winter's cold the vernal loosening of the earth, and resolve in the spring season the bindings up of winter?" ['The meaning is, canst thou make it freeze in summer, or thaw in winter?' Orton. Ed.] Doederlein understands, "man cannot tie up the stars, or cause them to remain longer with us, nor loosen their chains, and let them go, or hurry them away." So also Schnaar. Maadannoth rather signifies chains, and so it is often used by the Talmuds: see Buxtorf. And this the parallel demands, which both the Alexandrine and Chal. vers. tr. bond, chains. Tingstad, and Nachmanides also, understand chains. So that the v. means, according to the former, "Canst thou tie or untie the chains, by which the Pleiades, or the stars of the constellation of Orion, are bound together, or drawn along?" Thus also Nachmanides explains the v. of the location, and arrangement of those constellations.' Rosenm. Canst thou produce Lucifer in his time, cause Vesper to rise over the sons of earth?' Sept. 'Hast thou understood the bond of Pleiad, and opened the seal of Orion? Wilt thou disclose mazzouth in his season, and Hesperos by (epi) his hair, wilt thou bring them?' Referring perhaps to what the Greeks called the hair of Berenice? Canst thou bring forth in its season any one of the signs or stars of the northern hemisphere?' Rosenm.] 'The Indian division of the zodiac into the 12 usual signs, says Sir W. Jones, has been known in the E. from time immemorial. It was known, also, by the most ancient Chaldees and Phœnicians. Hyde.' Hewlett. For existing Egyptian zodiacs, however, see note, end of 2 K. 23: Bailly 'is quite of the opinion' of Pluche, 'that the signs of the zodiac originated in the pastoral life of the first men:' in Chaldea, perhaps, but as they were also said to be invented in Egypt, 'we must probably refer them to some people more ancient than either, from whom both borrowed them.' Astronomie Ancienne. A cut (a) is given of an Indian zodiac from Bailly, furnished by J. Call to Maskelyne, for the Phil. Transact: and also a cut (b) from citizen Dupuis, of a copper medal struck in Egypt, by the Roman emperor Antoninus. Dupuis remarks, that in observing the constant path among the fixed stars, in which the sun, moon and planets moved, the ancients 'fixed the 12 points where the moon was full, during each revolution of the sun; distinguishing these 12 divisions, by as many marks or emblematic signs, and the circle thus partitioned by conspicuous stars, was called the circle or wheel of the signs. The place of the sun at the vernal equinox was taken as the 1st point, or point of his departure. The planets were considered as his special attendants. The zodiac being thus, as it were, the measure of the effects produced by the sun at each annual revolution, there was attributed to it, as contained in all its divisions, all the sun's creative activity. But, as is usual, the signs were confounded with their cause; so the parts of the zodiac, or the signs which corresponded to such or such an effect of the sun on the earth, or in the air, or waters, seemed to have received, in deposit, that certain portion of his energy. Thus the [illegible] of the summer solstice burned, the scorpion of autumn deprived nature maud and cognizance; we have not. 1. We cannot alter the influences of the stars, or the ordinary course of nature, (v. 31.) Gen. 1:14. not the Pleiades, or the seven stars, a constellation which lies in so small a compass, (none in less,) yet sheds very benign influences on the earth; those of Orion, or that magnificent constellation which makes so great a figure, (none greater,) and dispenses rough and unpleasing influences. But God can change both summer and winter when He pleases, can make the spring cold, and so bind the sweet influences of Pleiades, and the winter warm, and so loose the bands of Orion. 2. We cannot bring forth Mazzaroth—the stars in the southern signs, nor guide Arcturus—those in the northern, v. 32. God appoints their rising and setting. 3. We are not only unconcerned in the government of the stars, but utterly unacquainted with it; we now not the ordinances of heaven, v. 33. So far from being able to change them, we can give no account of them: they are a secret to us. Shall we then pretend to know God's counsels, and their reasons?

III. God is the Author and Giver, the Father and Fountain, of all wisdom and understanding, v. 36. The souls of men are nobler and more excellent than the stars. The faculties of reason with which man is endued, and the wonderful performances of thought, bring him into some alliance to the blessed angels; and whence comes this light, but from the Father of lights? We did not make our own souls, nor can we describe how they act, or how they are united to our bodies. He only, that made them, knows them, and knows how to manage them. He fashioneth men's hearts alike in some things, and yet unlike in others. True wisdom, with its furniture and improvement, comes from Him as the God of grace, and the Father of every good and perfect gift. Shall we then pretend to be wiser than God, who have all our wisdom from Him? Nay, shall we pretend to be wise above our sphere, and beyond the limits He that gave us our understanding sets to it?

IV. God has the clouds under his cognizance and government, but so have not we, v. 37. Can any man, with all his wisdom, undertake to number them? or (as it may be read) to declare and describe their nature? Though near us, in our own atmosphere, yet we know little more of them than of the stars at their great distance. And when they pour down rain in abundance, so that the dust grows into solid mire, and the clods cleave fast together, (v. 38.) who can stay them, that it may not always rain? The power and goodness of God are herein to be acknowledged, that He gives the earth rain enough, but does not surfeit it; softens it, but does not drown it; makes it fit for the plough, but not unfit for the seed.

V. God provides food, not we, for the inferior creatures. The following ch. is wholly taken up with the instances of God's power and goodness about animals; therefore some transfer to it the last three vs. of this ch. which speak of the provision made,

1. For the lions, v. 39, 40. 'Thou dost not pretend the clouds and stars have any dependence on thee, for they are above thee; but, on the earth, thou thinkest thyself paramount, valuest thyself on thy possessions of cattle which thou wast once owner of, the oxen, and asses, and camels, that were fed at thy crib. But wilt thou undertake the maintenance of the lions? No, thou needest not, they can shift for themselves without thee: thou canst not, for thou hast not wherewithal to satisfy them: thou darest not; shouldest thou come to feed them, they would be upon thee. But I do it.' See the all-sufficiency of the Divine Providence: it has wherewithal to satisfy the desire of every living thing, even the most ravenous. See its bounty, in that, wherever it has given life, it will give livelihood, even to creatures not only not serviceable, but dangerous, to man; and see its sovereignty, [and benevolent wisdom,] that it suffers some creatures to be killed for the support of other creatures, the harmless sheep, to fill the appetite of the young lions; [making even universal death 'favorable to the enjoyment not only of the race, but of each individual animal while life is given. Old age to such would prove a burden;' 'and by their production without restraint, creatures would be multiplied beyond all limits, till even the globe itself could not contain them. The preservation of each individual produced, would lead to the ultimate destruction of the species.' See G. Combe, and St. Pierre.]

2. For the young ravens, v. 41. As ravenous beasts, so ravenous birds, are fed by the Divine Providence. The ravens, young ones, are specially necessitous, and God supplies them, Ps. 147: 9. God's feeding the fowls, specially these, Matt. 6:26. is an encouragement to us to trust Him for our daily bread. The ravens, they say, neglect their young: and indeed those that are ravenous of her fecundity, and poisoned her productions. What is said of the stars (marking influential residences of the sun) in the zodiac, applies to those out of, but related to it by position. It being perceived that, every year, when a particular star arose in the morning for the first time, at the end of night, after having disappeared for some time, at setting; or when the same star, after having been seen, at last ceased to be, and disappeared for some time, the sun was in a certain sign, and produced in sublunary nature a certain effect: then the star was connected with the sign, and seemed to share its influence.[Vs. 31,33.] Thus Sirius passed in Egypt for the cause of the overflowings of the Nile. [Bailly notices another division of the zodiac by the moon, 'which being perceived to run through the zodiac, between 27 and 28 hours, caused its division into 27 parts among the Siamese and Indians, and 28 with all nations of high antiquity, as the Arabs, Chinese, Persians, Indians. These divisions were marked by conspicuous stars in the zodiac, and when these did not occur there, they chose stars out of the zodiac, even as far as 40° of Lat. The divisions were called residences, houses, in the Chinese, and Coptic, or ancient Egyptian,' &c. The Chaldeans made all the stars into 24 constellations, 12 for the N. and 12 for the S. hemisphere: other nations more.] Regarding as the 1st sign that which about 2500 B. C. answered to the vernal equinox, the 1*st div.* of the zodiac was figured by an ox or bull, and so on, the 12th by a ram. CONCLUDING NOTE. 'The poet having worked up his drama with the most admirable skill, in this ch. represents the Deity as interrogating Job, in the loftiest style, and the boldest images. A celebrated ancient writer, [Longinus,] in a Treatise on the Sublime, shows how much interrogations contribute to it. This speech of the Almighty is made up of them; and indeed it seems to be the proper style of incensed majesty. He who asks the guilty a proper question, makes him in effect pass sentence on himself.' ORTON

CHAP. XXXIX.

God shows his own power, and man's weakness and ignorance, by instancing from among animals, the wild goats and hinds, 1—4; the wild ass, 5—8; the unicorn, 9—12; the peacock and ostrich, 13—18; the war-horse, 19—25; the hawk and eagle, 26—30.

KNOWEST thou the time when [a] the wild goats of the rock bring forth? or canst thou mark [b] when the hinds do calve?

2 Canst thou number [c] the months that they fulfil? or knowest thou the time when they bring forth?

3 They bow themselves, they bring forth their young ones, they cast out their sorrows.

4 Their young ones are in good liking, they grow up with corn; they go forth, and return not unto them.

to others, are commonly barbarous to their own, and unnatural. In that distress, they cry; for they are noisy, clamorous creatures; and this is interpreted a crying to God. It being the distress of nature, it is looked upon as directed to the God of nature. The putting of so favorable a construction as this on the cries of the young ravens, may encourage us in our prayers, though we can but cry, Abba, Father. Some way or other, God provides for them, so that they grow up, and come to maturity. And He that takes this care of them, certainly will not be wanting to his people, or theirs.

CHAP. XXXIX. God proceeds here to show Job what little reason he had to charge Him with unkindness, who was so compassionate to the inferior creatures, and took such a tender care of them; or to boast of himself, and his own good deeds before God, which were nothing to the divine mercies. He shows him also, what great reason he had to be humble, who knew so little of the nature of the creatures about him, and had so little influence on them, and to submit to that God on whom they all depend.

V. 1—12. God here shows Job what little acquaintance he had with the untamed creatures that run wild in the deserts, and live at large, but are the care of the Divine Providence. As,

1. The wild goats and the hinds. What is noticed concerning them, is, the bringing forth, and bringing up, of their young ones, v. 3, 4. For as every individual is fed, so every species of animals is preserved, by the care of the Divine Providence, and, for aught we know, none extinct [since man's creation, perhaps. ED.] to this day. Some think it is intimated, (Ps. 29: 9.) that God by thunder helps the hinds in calving. Let it be observed, for the comfort of women in labor: and let the young hinds (v. 4.) be an example to children, when grown up, not to be always hanging on their parents, and cravings from them, but to put forth themselves to get their own livelihood, and to requite their parents.

2. The wild ass; a creature we frequently read of in Scripture; some say, untameable. Man is said to be born as the wild ass's colt, so hard to be governed. The tame ass is bound to labor, but the wild ass has unbounded liberty, v. 5. no bonds on him. Note, Freedom from service, and liberty to range at pleasure, are but the privileges of a wild ass. It is a pity any of human kind should covet it, or value themselves on it. It is better to labor and be good for something, than ramble and be good for nothing. But if, among men, Providence sets some at liberty, and suffers them to live at ease, while others are doomed to servitude, we must not marvel at the matter, it is so among the brute-creatures. Observe, The tame ass, that labors, and is serviceable to man, has his master's crib to go to, both for shelter and food, and lives in a fruitful land: but the wild ass, that will have his liberty, must have it in a barren land. He that will not labor, let him not eat. He that will, shall eat the labor of his hands, and have also to give to him that needs. Jacob, the shepherd, had good red pottage to spare, when Esau, a sportsman, was ready to perish for hunger. A further description of the liberty and livelihood of the wild ass we have, v. 7, 8. He has no owner, nor will he be in subjection: he scorns the multitude of the city. He laughs at those that live in the tumult and bustle of cities, (so Patrick,) thinking himself happier in the wilderness; and opinion is

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The condescension of the God of glory, in making Himself known to sinful man for his humiliation, instead of executing vengeance on him for his rebellion, demands our highest admiration, and our warmest gratitude: and the most tremendous method, by which He abases a sinner in the dust, should be acknowledged as the effect of his mercy; for it tends to comfort, and joy, and salvation.—When the wisest of men presume to intrude into those 'secret things which belong to God,' and to be 'wise above what is written,' they are sure to 'darken counsel by words without knowledge,' and perhaps undesignedly to serve the cause of impiety, or skepticism: so that numbers, who have been vain of their acute, learned, and accurate reasonings on mysterious subjects, and who have been admired for their sagacity and judgment, will meet with such a rebuke from the Lord, as Job did, or rather one far more severe. We should then be very careful, in all our investigations, not to exceed our assigned limits; not to go out of our depth; nor to leave the friendly shore of the Word of God, to launch into the immense ocean of infinities. Conscious of our ignorance, guilt, and weakness, it becomes us to speak with trembling humility and reverence, when the perfections, decrees, or operations of God are our subject. (Ps. 139: 4—6.)—But indeed none of us are suitably impressed with awe of the infinite majesty of God: our appeals to Him generally savor of presumption.—Though He sometimes deigns to reason with his creatures, and to demonstrate his equity in his dealings with them; yet He more generally silences the arrogant objector, by a display of his infinite power, authority, and majesty, as more becoming the Sovereign of the world. Indeed, all nature proclaims his glory: no creature fully comprehends his works; but contemplation of them, with adoring and exulting praises, forms the delight of each intelligent being, in exact proportion to the extent of his powers, and the degree of his holiness. And, in proportion as the new creating-Spirit renders us like the [angels] in knowledge and holiness; we shall become capable of participating their exalted joys, and find pleasures of which we now have scarcely a conception.—But, the boasted knowledge of mankind is in fact a very small matter: the best informed perceive most of their own ignorance in every thing: none can fully understand the most common phænomena of nature; and after all the discoveries of modern times, they remain, in some respects, as inexplicable as ever.—Indeed, we are of yesterday; our days are passing away as a shadow: and a humble willingness to be taught of God, and to credit his 'sure testimony,' as contained in the sacred oracles, with a diligent attention to our proper interest and duty, as fallen creatures under a dispensation of mercy, are infinitely preferable to all the learning of the schools. Not that learning should be depreciated; provided it be accompanied with humility, kept in its proper place, directed to its proper objects, and not allowed to interfere within the province of revelation and faith. Yet even in natural things man's scanty measure of knowledge avails him but little; for he still finds himself unable to effect those alterations, which might give him ease, or conduce to his comfort. [See, however, notes on chs. 34, 36.] The constancy and exactness, with which natural effects are produced, should remind us of the faithfulness of the Lord's promises, and the immutability of his counsel; and excite us to be constant and exact in our course of daily worship and obedience.* SCOTT.

* We must be careful not to make the abuse of knowledge, all knowledge, an argument against its use: for the more true knowledge we have, when the heart is right, the better 'obedience' can we give to God. Nor can we, without knowledge, understand what is the 'province of revelation,' and what of faith; but must fall, bound hand and foot, into superstitious belief. Indolence would prefer this, the mere contemplative faith, as taught by many of the Asiatics of all ages; and some expect that simple faith will inspire with necessary knowledge; or 'the new-creating Spirit' will do it when we already have other means; this, too, gratifies human indolence and pride; Christ says, he that doeth God's will shall know of the doctrine; the Bible inculcates a well directed activity of all our powers, as duty: and when God's sovereignty has so richly endowed us with the means of knowledge, we may not say that a display of power, appealing to fear and wonder only, is more becoming 'the Sovereign of the world' than appeals to our other faculties. Pride does not belong to God; it is overbearing self-complacency, a mortal feeling. How indispensable is a true philosophy of mind and matter, knowledge, as well as humility and faith, to the full education of the physical, animal, intellectual, and moral man! When thus educated, the reach and the limits of our nature will be known, and we shall fitly receive the communications of God, and be suitably affected by the displays of his power; a loving reverence will take the place of tormenting fear, true humility of pernicious meanness, the unbounded confidence of faith will forever deliver us from the disquieting whispers of distrust, the agonies of that despair which those will know who love not God. But see on Ps. 19. Ed.

NOTES.

CHAP. XXXIX. V. 1—4. In this ch. some animals are selected, the nature or situation of which is peculiarly illustrative of the power, wisdom, and manifold works of God: and the questions proposed concerning them, were suited to convince Job how little he knew or could do. The several species of the wild goats, and hinds, are continued from age to age; but not by the care of man. They bring forth their young with difficulty and pain, yet need no human help; soon forget their sorrows; and their young, being active and vigorous, are in a short time able to shift for themselves, by entering the corn-fields, as well as pastures and meadows, notwithstanding the precautions of the owner. SCOTT.

the rate of things. The range of the mountains is his pasture, a bare pasture; there he searches here and there after a green thing, as he can find it and pick it up, for he has no owner; whereas the laboring asses have green things in plenty, without searching. From the untameableness of this and other creatures, we may infer how unfit we are to give law to Providence, who cannot give law even to a wild ass's colt.

3. The unicorn; Rhem; a strong creature, (Num. 92: 22.) a stately, proud creature, Ps. 63: 10. He is able to serve, but not willing; and God here challenges Job to force him to it. Job expected every thing should be just as he would have it. 'Since thou dost pretend' (says God) 'to bring every thing beneath thy sway, begin with the unicorn. Will he abide by thy crib? No, Thou canst not tame him, nor bind him with his band, nor set him to draw the harrow; nor will he bring home thy seed, nor gather it into thy barn,' v. 10—12. There are creatures that are willing to serve man, and seem to take a pleasure in it, and to have a love for their masters; but there are such as will never be brought to it; and it is the effect of sin: man is revolted from his subjection to his Maker, and is therefore justly punished with the revolt of the inferior creatures from their subjection to him; and yet, as an instance of God's good-will to man, there are some that are still serviceable to him. By the unicorn here, some think is meant the wild bull. 'Thou darest not trust him; though his strength is great, yet thou wilt not leave thy labor to him; thou wilt never depend on him; for therefore he will not draw the plough, because He that made him never designed him for it. A disposition to labor is as much the gift of God, as an ability for it; and it is a great mercy, if, where God gives strength for service, He gives a heart; it is what we should pray for, and reason ourselves into, which the brutes cannot do; for, as among beasts, so among men, those may justly be reckoned wild and abandoned to the deserts, who have no mind either to take pains, or to do good.

V. 13—18. The ostrich is a wonderful animal, a very large bird, but it never flies. Some have called it a winged camel. God here gives an account of it.

1. In common with the peacock, it has beautiful feathers, v. 13. Gavest thou proud wings unto the peacocks? So some read it. Fine feathers make proud birds. The peacock is an emblem of pride; the ostrich too is a foolish bird; for wisdom does not always go along with beauty and gaiety. Other birds do not envy the peacock or the ostrich their gaudy colors, nor complain for want of them; why then should we repine, if we see others wear better clothes than we can afford? God gives his gifts variously; and those gifts are not always the most valuable, that make the finest show. Who would not rather have the voice of the nightingale, than the tail of the peacock; the eye of the eagle, and her soaring wing, and the natural affection of the stork, than the beautiful wings and feathers of the ostrich, which can never rise above the earth, and is without natural affection? We must suppose, either that God, by a special providence, with the heat of the sun and the sand (so some think) hatches the neglected eggs of the ostrich, as He feeds the neglected young ones of the raven; or that, though the ostrich often leaves her eggs thus, yet not always. The reason why she thus exposes her eggs, is, she is without natural affection, v. 16. To be hardened against any is unamiable, even in a brute, much more in a rational creature that boasts of humanity; especially to be hardened against young ones. V. 17. intimates, that the art other animals have to nourish and preserve their young, is God's gift; and that, where it is not, God denies it, that, by the folly of the ostrich, as well as by the wisdom of the ant, we may learn to be wise; for, careless as the ostrich is of her eggs, many people are as careless of their own souls; and many parents of their own children. Thus their labor in rearing them becomes vain; and it were better for their country they had never been born. Are not also too many ministers equally careless of

The rhinoceros (which is generally supposed to be here intended,) is possessed of immense strength: (*M. R. h. Yet Job was not so absurd as to expect this from him; nor would he depend on his assistance to plough his land, or gather in his harvest: knowing that it would be vain and dangerous, to attempt any thing of this kind with so powerful and fierce a creature. But was it not far more perilous to quarrel with the allotments of the Almighty? Scott.

The Creator has divided his gifts among his creatures as He saw good; and in this, and in every other thing, his will and wisdom should be implicitly submitted to. (M.) The ostrich is remarkable for its stupid insensibility in various respects. But when she is alarmed for her own safety, she uses her wings to assist her in running, and in this many exceeds in swiftness the fleetest animals which have no wings. Scott.—The accounts of the ostrich are somewhat contradictory, especially as regards her parental affection: see a full description of the animal, from Dr. Shaw, in Dr. A. Clarke. Perhaps the habits, &c. of the African ostrich are somewhat different from those of the Arabian: but a French writer asserts, that 'the only difference between the ostrich of Africa and that of Hindostan is in color and size. If their forms were alike, the mass of the black ostrich would be double that of the grey.' The black 'African or true ostrich is 7 to 9 ft. high.' Enc. Am. 'The male is accompanied by from 2 to 6 females, who all lay their eggs (disposed, the smaller end inwards, in circles,) in the same nest, (hollowed in the earth,) and incubate by turns, [v. 16.] during the day. The male takes their place at night, both to keep up the heat and defend the eggs. A nest contains from 12 even to 60 eggs, but generally from 24 to 32. Incubation does not stop the laying: the last laid eggs, however, are not placed in the nest, but aside, reserved for nourishment to the young when first they break the egg. They incubate 36 to 40 days. Nests sometime contain eggs broken to pieces, for, when the ostrich finds her nest discovered, she breaks her eggs.' [V. 16.] The French writer, who extracts this account, considers it contradictory to Scripture; but, if true, is it not strictly reconcilable to it, even in our translation? How probable that some of 6 parents should forget some of 50 eggs, all in the same nest; how little would they distinguish their own from others [v. 16.]; how different the parental care which feeds part of the brood on another part, from the tenderness of most birds, particularly the stork and eagle. Surely we cannot have a great opinion of the wisdom according to vulgar opinion) of a bird, who breaks her eggs to save them from harm. Shaw, too, states that they devour their excrement greedily, and that he saw an ostrich swallow a 'bullet scorching hot from the mould, without uneasiness.' It is well known to swallow iron, stones, &c. which are but slightly acted upon in their passage, and are not of course digested and assimilated. The bird, in flight, runs in a circle, which enables the Arabs, by changing horses, at last to run it down: these two classes of facts, also, agree with v. 17. The Enc. Am. says, 'no bird has a stronger affection for its offspring, or watches its nest with more assiduity. Contrary to the general opinion, she always broods over her eggs [the whole 40?] at night, [comp. above,] only leaving them during the hottest part of the day. If the eggs be touched, she destroys them.' But, says Dr. Shaw, 'a very little of that storge, or natural affection, so strong in other animals, is observable in the ostrich. For, upon the

2. Mark what care the ostrich has of herself. She leaves her eggs in danger, but, if she herself be in danger, no creature shall strive better to get out of the way. Then she lifts up her wings on high, and a horseman, at full speed, cannot overtake her, v. 18. Those that are least under the law of natural affection, often contend most for the law of self-preservation.

V. 19—25. God, having displayed his own power in those creatures that are strong, and despise man, here shows it in one scarcely inferior to any of them in strength, and yet very tame, and serviceable to man, the horse; especially, the horse that is prepared against the day of battle, and is serviceable to man at a time when he has more than ordinary occasion for his service. It seems there was, in Job's country, a noble, generous breed of horses. Job, it is probable, kept many, though they are not mentioned among his possessions; cattle for use in husbandry being there valued more than those for state and war, which alone, horses were then reserved for.

High mettle is the praise of a horse rather than of a man, whom fierceness and rage ill become. This description of the war-horse will help to explain that character given of presumptuous sinners, Jer. 8: 6. Every one turneth to his course, as the horse rusheth into the battle. When a man's heart is fully set in him to do evil, and he is carried on in a wicked way by the violence of inordinate appetites and passions, there is no making him afraid of the wrath of God, and the fatal consequences of sin. Let his own conscience set before him the curse of the law, the death, that is the wages of sin, and all the terrors of the Almighty, in battle-array; he mocks at this fear, and is not affrighted, neither turns he back from the flaming sword of the cherubim. Let ministers lift up their voice like a trumpet, to proclaim the wrath of God against him, he believes not that it is the sound of the trumpet, nor that God and his heralds are in earnest with him; but what will be the end is easy to foresee.

V. 26—30. The birds of the air also are proofs of the wonderful power and providence of God. Two stately ones are specified,

1. The hawk, a noble bird, of great strength and sagacity, and yet a bird of prey, v. 26. here noticed for her flight, which is swift and strong, and especially for the course she steers toward the south, whither she follows the sun in winter, out of the colder countries in the north, especially when she is to cast her plumes, and renew them. This is her wisdom, and it was God, and not man, that gave it her. Pity, the reclaimed hawk, which is taught to fly at man's command, and to make him sport, should at any time be abused to the dishonor of God, since from God she receives that wisdom which makes her flight entertaining and serviceable.

2. The eagle, a royal bird, and yet a bird of prey too, the permission of which, nay, the giving of power to which, may help to reconcile us to the prosperity of oppressors among men. The eagle is here noticed, (1.) For the height of her flight; no bird soars so high, has so strong a wing, nor can so well bear the light of the sun, v. 27. (2.) For the strength of her nest, which sets her and her young out of the reach of danger, v. 28. Secure sinners think themselves as safe in their sins as the eagle in her nest on high, in the clefts of the rock, Jer. 49: 16. But I will bring thee down from thence, saith the Lord. The higher bad men sit above the resentments of the earth, the nearer they ought to think themselves to the vengeance

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—18. The infinite power, wisdom, and goodness of God are legible in all the variety of his creatures. Every species of animals reminds us of our ignorance and impotence: they continue as God has created them, and we can neither understand whence their different propensities arise, nor yet alter them: we often can derive no benefit from them; nay, some of them seem a nuisance to us, nor can we know for what purpose they were created. Yet we should acknowledge the wisdom of God, and submit to his will: we ought to be thankful for the benefit derived from some, and to be patient under the inconveniences occasioned by others: and we may learn from them, to confide in his kind providence, and to aim to answer the end of our creation.—It is very absurd for rational creatures to be vain of personal beauty, strength, courage, agility, or external decorations; when they are eclipsed in them all by the various species of brutes.—It is lamentable to observe, that many human beings are more stupid, and hardened against their young, than the very ostrich, the disgrace of the animal tribes. By contemptuous defiance or forgetfulness of God, or vain attempts to hide or excuse their sins, men plainly show that God has judicially deprived them of understanding. SCOTT.

least distant noise, or trivial occasion, she forsakes her eggs, or young, to which, perhaps, she never returns; or if she do, it may be too late to restore, or preserve life. So the Arabs sometimes find whole nests of undisturbed eggs, some sweet and good, others addle and corrupted; others again have their young of different growths, according to the assumed time since they were forsaken. They often meet a few of the little ones, no bigger than well grown pullets, half-starved, straggling and moaning about, like so many distressed orphans, for their mother: v. 16. Lam. 4.3.' It is an easy assumption of wisdom, to reject 'vulgar opinions,' but is it not more truly wise to do it with reason? God, who knew how many of the species of ostrich could be supported in the barren desert, doubtless knew what instincts to give, and by what force to deny to common instincts, in the native inhabitants of those deserts, to accomplish his all-wise purposes in their creation. 'Ostriches make a loud, doleful noise in the night. [Note, Lev. 11:16.] I have often heard them groan as if in the greatest agonies. (Mic. 1:8.) Jaanah, therefore, and rinonim, the SS. name for ostrich, may very properly be deduced from onah and ronan, meaning to cry out aloud.' Shaw. Ostrich feathers are still highly prized, and the tribute paid to the kings of Egypt, as well as the use of the feather, as an honorable symbol, of justice, &c. (cuts, Ex. 25:18. 1:8. 2 Chr. 15:9. Ps. 62:9. &c.) on the earliest monuments, show that they have been valued ever since history began (v. 13.). ED.

(13.) 'The wing of the ostrich-tribe is for flapping, but of the stork and the falcon for flight.' Good.—The ostrich uses its wings only to increase its speed in running, which is so great, that 'Xenophon says, Cyrus had horses that could overtake the goat and the wild ass; but none that could reach the ostrich [v. 18.]: 1000 golden ducats, or 100 camels, was the stated price of a horse that could.' Young, in Dr. A. Clarke. ID.

Verses 19—25.

This description of the horse has been universally admired, as inimitably sublime. It especially relates to those horses which are used in war; and in which the eastern countries have always excelled. (Note, Ps. 147:10, 11. 93:1, 2. Gen. 9:1, 2.) SCOTT.

(23.) The quiver (he bears) rattleth (with its arrows) against (his flanks), &c. The fleet and brave Arab troops of horse, have ever been a terror, from their agility, dexterity, equipments, and manner of attack, to the best disciplined foreign armies. ED.

(24.) 'He swalloweth with his motion and concussion the ground.' (Rosenm.) I. e. it disappears before him, in his rapid course, as if swallowed out of sight. A striking figure, exactly conveying the idea experienced by one who moves very swiftly over the earth. There seems a shaking, gliding motion, the ground seems to hurry by like a stream, or like gurgling water passing into the throat,) and appears to be instantly swallowed up, especially if the look be directed straight forward. This is felt in the swiftest modern travelling. ED.—Believeth.] 'Most understand, he so joys in the war-trumpet, he can hardly for delight believe his senses that it actually sounds. Others; nor seems he to believe that it is a war trumpet's sound, so little does its noise affect him with fear. I prefer, with Bochart, "he cannot stand still, [for eagerness,] when he hears the trumpet."' ROSENM.

God calls on Job to answer, 1, 2. Job humbles himself, and will proceed no further, 3—5. God requires him to show by acts of power, that he is able to save himself, 6—14. The power of the Lord is shown in behemoth, 15—24.

of Heaven. (3.) For her quicksightedness, v. 29. not upward, but downward, in quest of her prey. In this, she is an emblem of a hypocrite, who, while, in the profession of religion, he seems to rise toward heaven, keeps his eye and heart on the prey on earth, some temporal advantage, some widow's house or other, that he hopes to devour, under pretence of devotion. (4.) For the way she has of maintaining herself and her young; she preys on living animals, which she seizes and tears to pieces, and then carries to her young ones, who are taught to suck up blood; they do it by instinct, and know no better; but for men that have reason and conscience, to thirst after blood, is what could scarcely be believed, if there had not been, in every age, wretched instances of it. She also preys on the dead bodies of men; where the slain are, there is she. Our Savior refers to this instinct of the eagle, Matt. 24: 28. Every creature will make toward its proper food; for He that provides their food, has implanted that inclination. These, and many such instances of natural power and sagacity in the inferior creatures, which we cannot account for, oblige us to confess our own weakness and ignorance, and to give glory to God, as the Fountain of all being, power, wisdom, and perfection.

CHAP. XL. V. 1—5. Here is,

I. A humbling challenge God gave to Job, v. 1, 2; which stands by itself here as the application of the whole. It should seem, God paused to allow Job to answer; but he was in such confusion, he remained silent. As this is not said to be spoken out of the whirlwind; some think God said it in a still small voice, which wrought more upon Job than the whirlwind, as on Elijah, 1 K. 19: 12, 13. Though Job had not spoken, yet God is said to answer him; for He knows men's thoughts, and can return a suitable answer to their silence.

1. God's convincing question is a question with disdain; Shall any teach God knowledge? ch. 21: 22. Intimating, that those who quarrel with God, do, in effect, go about to teach Him how to mend his work. But is it a thing to be suffered, that any man should teach his Maker? Some read it, Is it any wisdom to contend with the Almighty? The answer is easy; No, it is the greatest folly in the world. Is it wisdom to contend with Him whom it will certainly be our ruin to oppose, and unspeakably our interest to submit to?

2. He demands a speedy reply; 'He that reproaches God, let him answer this question to his own conscience, thus, 'Far be it from me to contend with the Almighty, or to instruct Him.' Those have high thoughts of themselves, and mean thoughts of God, who reprove any thing He says or does.

II. Job's humble submission thereupon. The good man is here overcome by God's treatment of him, so much better and more candid than that of his friends, and yields himself a conquered captive to the grace of God. 1. Sensible he has sinned, he owns it, and therefore calls himself vile, v. 4. Sin debases us, and penitents abase themselves, reproach themselves, are ashamed, yea, even confounded. Job now vilifies, as much as ever he had justified and magnified himself: repentance changes men's opinion of themselves. His silence, he says, was not sullen, but because he was convinced he had been in the wrong. Those that are truly sensible of sinfulness and vileness, dare not justify themselves before God, but are ashamed that ever they entertained such a thought, and, in token of it, lay their hand on their mouth.

2. He promises so to offend no more; for Elihu had told him this was meet to say to God. When we have spoken amiss, we must repent of it, and not repeat nor stand to it. He enjoins himself silence, v. 4. It is bad to think amiss, but much worse to speak amiss, for that is an allowance of the evil thought, publishing of the seditious libel; therefore, if thou hast thought evil, lay thy hand on thy mouth, and let it go no further, and that will be an evidence for thee, that what thou thoughtest, thou allowest not. Job had suffered his evil thoughts to vent themselves; 'Once have I spoken amiss, yea twice,' i. e. 'divers times; but I have done.' Observe, true repentance is to rectify our errors, and our false principles, in doing as we did. It is to return from every by-path, and to proceed not one step further in it; 'I will not add,' so the word is; 'I will never indulge my passion so much again, nor give myself such a liberty of speech.' Till it comes to this, we come short of repentance. Further, Those who dispute with God, will be silenced. Job had been very forward in demanding a conference with God, and talked very boldly, how plain he would make his case, and how sure he was he should be justified; as a prince he would go near unto Him, (ch. 31: 37.) he would come even to his seat; (ch. 23: 3.) but he lets fall his plea. 'Lord, the wisdom and right are all on thy side, and I have done foolishly and wickedly in questioning it.'

V. 6—14. Job was greatly humbled for what God had already said, but not sufficiently; therefore God here proceeds to reason with him, in the same manner, and to the same purport, as before, v. 6. Observe, 1. Those who duly receive what they have heard from God, and profit by it, shall hear more from Him. 2. Those who are truly convinced of sin, and penitent for it, yet have need to be more thoroughly convinced, and to be made more deeply penitent. Those who are under convictions, who have their sins set in order before their eyes, and their hearts broken for them, must learn from this instance not to catch at comfort too soon; it will be everlasting when it comes, therefore prepare for it by deep humiliation, that the wound be searched to the bottom, and not healed slightly. When our hearts begin to melt and relent, let those considerations be dwelt upon and pursued, which will help to make a thorough, effectual softening.

God begins with a challenge, v. 7. as before, ch. 38: 3. and every proud heart must be ruined, or brought to confess, that we cannot vie with God,

1. For justice; that God is righteous and holy with us, but we are unrighteous and unholy toward Him, v. 8. Many of Job's complaints had too much of a tendency to accuse God's justice; I cry out of wrong, says he, but I am not

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 19—30. Man, by nature, is prone to imitate the animals in their worst qualities. Like the wild ass, he scorns the yoke of God; and like the wild bull in the net, he rages against his corrections. Even his courage is generally unreasonable, instinctive, and furious, like that of a horse. His feet are swift to shed blood, or to venture his own life, when ambition, avarice, or revenge inspires him. Moreover, men naturally glory in their own strength and prowess, and rejoice in ostentatiously displaying them; and are more disposed to seek renown by rendering themselves terrible, than by becoming useful. [The nature, instincts, or propensities we have in common with the animals, indeed, predominate over man's highest nature, to our shame be it spoken, in all the earth.]—God forbid, we should be like the eagle only in soaring aloft, and in keenness of sight; but, reverencing the Divine Majesty, and abasing ourselves before Him in deep repentance, may we by faith and love mount upwards as on eagles' wings, till we obtain 'those things which are above, where Christ sitteth on the right hand of God.' SCOTT.

(27.) On high.] Mark the contrasted variety of instincts! The ostrich has her careless nest on the ground; the eagle, most careful of her young, builds her long retained home, of such durable materials as to be almost indestructible, on high: each is diversely gifted with instincts corresponding to their relative situations, by an all-adjusting, all-wise benevolence! ED.

(30.) As the eagle is said not to feed except on what she kills herself, the word slain, forms an argument with some for tr. nesher (eagle) by 'the vulture,' note, Matt. 24:28. Cruden says, some eagles [i. e. some species of the genus falco?] feed on carrion. 'When the bald eagle has fasted for some time, its appetite is extremely voracious and indiscriminate. Even the most putrid carrion is acceptable. The sight of the eagle is exquisite. [V. 29.] Few birds provide more abundantly for their young, than the bald eagle:' note, v. 27. Enc. Am. ED.

heard; but such language is by no means to be suffered. God's judgment cannot, must not, be disannulled, for we are sure it is according to truth, therefore it is great impudence and iniquity in us to call it in question. Our duty is to condemn ourselves, that God may be righteous; as David, Ps. 51: 4. See Neh. 9: 33. Dan. 9: 7.

2. For power; and therefore, as it is great impiety, so it is great impudence, to contest with Him, and we go as much against our interest, as we do against reason and right, v. 9. The power of creatures, even angels, is derived from God, limited by Him, and dependent on Him; but the power of God is original, independent, and unlimited.

3. For beauty and majesty; v. 10. God decks Himself with such majesty and glory, as are the terror of all the powers of darkness, and make them tremble; He arrays Himself with such glory and beauty, as are the wonder of angels, and all the saints in light, and make them rejoice. David could dwell all his days in God's house, to behold the beauty of the Lord. But, in comparison, what is all the majesty and excellency by which princes think to make themselves feared, and all the glory and beauty by which lovers think to make themselves beloved! Does Job think to carry the day by looking great, if even the sun shall be ashamed, and the moon confounded, when God shines forth!

4. For dominion over the proud, v. 11—14. Here the cause is put on this short issue; if Job can abase proud oppressors as easily and effectually with a look, even, as God can, it shall be acknowledged he has some color to compare with God. Observe, Proud people are wicked people, and pride is at the bottom of a great deal of wickedness in this world, both toward God and man, and the wicked will be trodden down in their place, i. e. wherever found. They were proudly confederate to do mischief, but are now hid together, to their shame, in the dust, ch. 17: 16. Nay, as malefactors condemned, they have their faces covered, as Haman's; He binds their faces in secret; they are treated, so complete is the victory, as dead men; Lazarus, in the grave, had his face bound about. Now by this God proves Himself to be God. Does He thus hate proud men? Then He is holy. Will He thus punish them? Then He is the just Judge of the world. Can He thus humble them? Then He is the Lord Almighty. When God had abased proud Pharaoh, and hid him in the sand of the Red Sea, Jethro inferred this, Ex. 18: 11. See Rev. 19: 1, 2.

(1.) Job had cast abroad the rage of his wrath toward heaven, complaining of the prosperity and power of tyrants and oppressors, and must God regard it, when it had so little effect on men; He was ready to charge God with mal-administration for suffering it; but he ought not to find fault, except he could mend. If God, and He only, has power to humble and bring down proud men, no doubt He has wisdom to know when and how, and it is not for us to prescribe to Him, or to teach Him how to govern the world.

(2.) The justice, here promised, shall be done him, if he can perform such mighty works v. 14. 'Then will I also confess unto thee, that thy right hand is sufficient to save thee, though it be too weak to contend with Me.' It is man's innate pride and ambition, that he would be his own savior, would have his own hands sufficient for him, and be independent; but what presumption! Our own hands cannot save us by recommending us to God's grace, much less by rescuing us from his justice; if our own power cannot humble our enemies, it cannot save ourselves; but if it could, God Himself would confess it. He never did, nor ever will, defraud any of his just praise, nor deny merited honor. But since we cannot save, we must confess it, and therefore into his hand commit ourselves.

V. 15—24. God, for the further proving of his own power, and disproving of Job's pretensions, concludes his discourse with the description of two vast animals, far exceeding man in bulk and strength, behemoth, and leviathan.

I. In these vs. we have the former described. Behemoth signifies beasts in general, but must here mean some particular species. Some understand it of the bull; others of an amphibious animal, [well-known once in Egypt, but now seen in Nubia,] called the river-horse, (Hippopotamus,) living among the fish in the Nile, but coming out to feed on the earth. [One was 16 ft. 9 in. long, 6 ft. 9 in. high, and 15 ft. round. PAXTON.] But I confess I see no reason to depart from the ancient and most generally received opinion, that the elephant is here described, which, among so many four-footed beasts as we have had the natural history of, (ch. 38: and 39:) we can scarcely suppose would be omitted. Some understand v. 17. of the trunk of the elephant, the word (tr. tail) signifying any extreme part, and in that there is indeed a wonderful strength. No animal whatsoever comes near the elephant for strength of body, which is the main thing insisted on in this description.

1. He feeds on the productions of the earth, and not on other animals, v. 15, 20. and the beasts of the field do not tremble before him, nor flee from him, as from a lion, but play about him, knowing they are in no danger. This may give us occasion, (1.) To acknowledge the goodness of God, that a creature which requires so much food, should not feed on flesh. (2.) To commend living on herbs and fruits, without flesh, according to the original appointment of man's food, Gen. 1: 29. Even the strength of an elephant, as of a horse and an ox, may be supported without flesh; and why not that of a man? Though, therefore, we use the liberty God has allowed us, yet be not among riotous eaters of flesh. (3.) To commend a quiet and peaceable life. Who would not rather, like the elephant, have his neighbors easy and pleasant about him, than, like the lion, have them all afraid of him?

2. He is a very great and greedy drinker, not of wine and strong drink, (to be greedy of that is peculiar to man, who by his drunkenness makes a beast of himself,) but of fair water: and so much, that one would think he could drink up a river, if you would give him time, and not hasten him. Or, when he drinks, confident of his own strength and safety, he makes no haste, in fear. His eye anticipates more than he can take, v. 24. as that of a

Verses 9—14.

The Lord would not at all deign to argue the question of right with his servant; but insisted on that being taken for granted. 'Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?' [who alone endowed us with the sense of right! What does man know of right or wrong, except as he has been constituted by God to feel it?] (Gen. 18:23—26. Jer. 12: 1—4.) [See Wayland's Mor. Sci.] SCOTT.

(13.) Bind their faces in secret.] 'The bodies of the rich Egyptians (3000 yrs. ago) were generally thus embalmed; the brain was extracted through the nostrils, the entrails through an incision in the side mostly, the body shaved, washed, salted, and after a certain period steeped in balsam and wrapped up in linen [or cotton, see Rosellini] bandages; each finger and toe was separately enveloped, or sometimes sheathed in a gold case. The bandages were then folded round each of the limbs, and finally round the whole body, to the number of 15 to 20 thicknesses. The head was the object of particular attention; it was sometimes enveloped in several folds of fine muslin; the first was glued to the skin, and the others to the first; the whole was then coated with a fine plaster, &c. Instead, the mummy is sometimes contained in a sort of sheath of paper or linen, coated with a layer of plaster, on which are paintings [often of the judgment-trial, cut, Ps. 62:9.] and gilding; the name of the deceased, his relations, titles, &c. The whole is then placed in a coffin [of sycamore or cedar wood, paper, or stone]. Mummies present very different appearances; some, opened, have been dried by vegetable and balsamic substances, (as aromatic gums, or asphaltum,) others by salt. The former are reddish, and in good preservation, the latter, black, hard, smooth,' &c. See Enc. Am. and Rosellini; and comp. notes, John 11:44. Gen. 50:26. ED.

Verses 15—24.

There have been various opinions concerning behemoth: but probably the most ancient is the most true; namely, that the elephant is intended. The word is often used for quadrupeds in general; and more frequently for cattle, or animals which feed on vegetables, as distinguished from the carnivorous animals. This, however, is not exclusively the case: but probably it cannot be clearly shown ever to mean any other than land animals, of which the elephant is the largest and most remarkable. It is evident the elephant surpasses all other quadrupeds in size, strength, sagacity, and longevity; and yet is equally remarkable for his gentleness, when not provoked.—Probably, it was not become customary at that time to take, tame, and employ elephants in war or in journeying, as has since been done. SCOTT.—This word, denoting a species of creature made when the earth was also fit to receive human beings (which the phrase, with thee, may possibly allude to), note, end of Job; seems well considered by Scott, to stand for the largest of land animals; and if the Heb. words of natural history, as is asserted, often mean as well the order, as the genus, species, or even covetous man. His nose has in it strength for the purpose; for when he goes greedily to drink with it, he pierces through snares or nets, which perhaps are laid in the waters to catch fish. He makes nothing of difficulties in his way, so great is his strength, so eager his appetite.

II. The use of this description. We have taken a view of this mountain of a beast, here set before us, not merely as a show, but as an argument to humble ourselves before the great God; for,

1. He made it. This beast is here called the chief, in its kind, of the ways of God; (v. 19.) an eminent instance of the Creator's power and wisdom. They that will peruse accounts of the elephant, will find that his capacities approach nearer to those of reason, than the capacities of any other brute-creature whatsoever, and therefore he is fitly called the chief of the ways of God, in the inferior part of the creation no creature below man being preferable to him.

2. He made him with man, as He made other four-footed beasts; on the same day with man, (Gen. 1: 25, 26.) whereas the fish and fowl were made the day before; He made him, to live and move on the same earth, in the same element, and therefore man and beast are said to be jointly preserved by Divine Providence, as fellow-commoners, 'I made that beast as well as thee, and he does not quarrel with Me; why then dost thou? I made thee as well as that beast, therefore I can as easily manage thee, whether thou refuse or choose. I made him with thee, that thou mayest look on him, and receive instruction.' We need not go far for proofs and instances of God's almighty power and sovereign dominion; they are near us, with us, under our eye, wherever we are.

3. The same hand that made him, notwithstanding his bulk and strength, can unmake him at pleasure, can kill an elephant as easily as a worm or a fly, and without the imputation either of waste or wrong, v. 19. May not God do what He will with his own? He that has power to create with a word, no doubt, has power to destroy with a word, and can as easily speak the creature into nothing, as, at first, He spake it out of nothing. The behemoth perhaps is here intended (as well as the leviathan afterward) to represent those proud tyrants and oppressors, whom God had just now challenged Job to abase. They think themselves as well fortified against God's judgments, as the elephant with his bones of brass and iron; but He that made man's soul, knows all the avenues to it, and can make the sword of justice approach it, and touch it in the most tender part. He that framed the engine, and put its parts together, knows how to take it in pieces. Wo to him therefore that strives with his Maker, for He that made, has therefore power to make him miserable, and will not make him happy, unless he will be ruled by Him.

CHAP. XLI. 1—10. Whether this leviathan be a whale or a crocodile, is a great dispute among the learned, which I will not undertake to determine; some of the particulars agree more easily to the one, others to the other; both are very strong and fierce, and the power of the Creator appears in them. Sir R. Blackmore, though he admits the more received opinion concerning the behemoth, that that must be the elephant, yet agrees with Bochart that the leviathan is the crocodile, so well known in the river of Egypt. I confess I incline rather to understand it of the whale, not only because it is much larger, and a nobler animal, but because, in the history of the Creation, there is such express notice of it, as is not of any other species of animals whatsoever, Gen. 1: 21. God created great whales; by which it appears, not only that whales were well known in those parts, in Moses' time, who lived a little after Job,

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

It behooves us to speak with great reverence and caution concerning the ways and works of God: for it will appear at length, that many of our expressions sprang from such corrupt principles, and led to such desperate conclusions, that we could not on reflection do otherwise than unreservedly condemn them. Yet all our words must be given an account of at the day of judgment, and be produced as evidences of the frame of our hearts: and, probably, it will then appear, that the presumptuous cavils and objections of philosophic speculators, sprang from deeper enmity against God, and were more provoking to Him, than the scandalous profligacy of the profane and licentious. One clear and distinct view of God's holy majesty would appal the stoutest rebel on earth; or even drive him to despair, if not tempered with discoveries of his mercy. How then will the wicked bear the blaze of his glory at the approaching day of wrath and judgment?—But when we see this glory of our God 'in the face of Jesus Christ,' we are humbled without being terrified; and our deepest reverence and self-abasement consist with filial confidence and love.—The progressive renewal of a believer proceeds in the same way of conviction, humiliation, and watchfulness against remaining sin, as his first conversion did; and every progressive step in this way makes us more and more sensible, that we, in no case, have either right or reason to complain. Even when we protest against ill-treatment from men, or vindicate ourselves from injurious charges, we are apt to reflect on God; and to be so tenacious of our own right or reputation, as to neglect a proper regard to his honor; and we frequently seem as if we would 'disannul his judgment, and condemn Him, that we may be righteous.'—Happy are they, who trust in God, and leave Him to manage all their concerns, who orders all things in heaven and earth, in perfect wisdom, justice, truth, and goodness. SCOTT.

individual, we may understand this word, behemoth, even of the largest land animals known to have existed. These are the mammoth (or fossil elephant), and the mastodon, called mammoth by the Indians of N. America, which is graminivorous, and herbivorous, though the Indian tradition says it was driven to the N. W. by the Great Spirit, lest it should devour all other animals. Mammoth sounds much like the Heb. bhmoth, m and b being interchangeable in many languages. The Russian word for the fossil elephant is momot (the hammer, flail, corn-trampler, trampler?). 'Although a Hebrew would regard the word [behemoth] as a pluralis excellentiæ, yet it may have originated from the Egyptian word Pehemout, river ox.' Gesenius. Note, 41:7. 'The tusk of a mammoth seen by Adams in Siberia, was 9 ft. long, the skeleton 9½ ft. high, and 14 long, from nose to coccyx. The mastodon skeleton at Philadelphia is 18 ft. long, 11 ft. 5 in. high; tusks 10 ft. 7 in. long. It seems to have been provided with a trunk, and in its food and manner of living to have much resembled the elephant. There are no traces within the period of history of the existence of these animals as a living genus.' Enc. Am. Their position, upright, the skull often above ground, (with bones of existing races, in the most recent class of bogs, never covered by diluvium,) as if mired, as bisons still are, while frequenting salt-licks, show them contemporary with the latest formations. See Rogers; Geol. of U. S. That possibly these greatest of God's works might not all have been extinct in the extensive forests and morasses of Asia, especially, when it was a newer and probably less peopled world, than now, so as to be known to those addressed in v. 19. is but a conjecture, of little enough weight, to add perhaps unnecessarily to those already brought forward in these vs. But see Bush's 'Illustr. of the SS.' NOTES.

CHAP. XLI. V. 1—11. Naturalists find many difficulties, in applying the particulars of the description to the whale. But several species of whales are known, and probably others exist in different parts of the ocean, with which we have but little acquaintance: and there is some reason to think that the deep contains enormous creatures, comprehended under that general name, which are even larger than any yet taken. (26:5—13.) As 'behemoth' seems to denote the largest of the quadrupeds; so, it is probable, 'leviathan' means the largest of the inhabitants of the ocean. [Note, Ps. 11:1.]—Perhaps, in the days of Job, it was not thought possible to take whales as they now do: but some of the species might have been cast on the shore, and divided for the use of different persons. It however served equally for Job's humiliation, if he supposed it impossible to take them, as if it really had been so. SCOTT.

but that the creation of whales was generally looked upon as a most illustrious proof of the eternal power and godhead of the Creator; and we may conjecture this was the reason (for otherwise it seems unaccountable) why Moses there so particularly mentions the creation of the whales, because God had so lately, in this discourse with Job, more largely insisted on the bulk and strength of that creature than of any other, as the proof of his power; and the leviathan is here spoken of as an inhabitant of the sea, v. 31. which the crocodile is not, so Ps. 104: 25, 26.

I. Job could not catch him, as a little fish, with angling, v. 1, 2. He could not make him his prisoner, nor force him to cry for quarter, or surrender himself at discretion, v. 3, 4. He could not entice him into a cage, and keep him there as a bird for the children to play with, v. 5. He could not serve him up for him and his companions as a banquet; his flesh is too strong for food, and if it were not, he is not easily caught. They could not enrich themselves with his spoil; part the bones to one merchant, the oil to another. Probably the art of taking whales was not brought to perfection then, as it has been since. They could not destroy him, v. 7. He kept out of the reach of their instruments of slaughter, or, if they touched him, they could not touch him to the quick. It was to no purpose to attempt it, so formidable is he, the very sight of him will make a stout man ready to faint, v. 9. Job is bid, at his peril, to lay his hand upon him, v. 8. 'Touch him, if thou dare. Remember the battle, how unable thou art to encounter such a force, and what is therefore likely to be the issue of the battle, and do no more, but desist from the attempt.' And hereby he is admonished to desist from his controversy with God, but to make his peace with Him, remembering what the battle will certainly end in, if he come to an engagement. See Isa. 27: 4, 5.

2. If the inferior creatures, that are put under the feet of man, and over whom he has dominion, keep us in awe thus, how terrible must the majesty of our great Lord be, (v. 10.) against whom man has been so long in rebellion!

V. 11—34. God, having in the foregoing vs. showed Job how unable he was to deal with the leviathan, here sets forth his own power in that massy, mighty creature. Here is,

I. God's sovereign dominion and independency laid down, v. 11. 1. That he is indebted to none of his creatures. 'Who has prevented Me?' i. e. 'Who has laid any obligations on Me, by any service they have done Me? Who can pretend to be before-hand with Me? If any were, I would not long be behind-hand with them, I would soon repay them.' The apostle quotes this, for the silencing of all flesh in God's presence, Who hath first given to Him, and it shall be recompensed to him again? 2. All is his, we are his, all we have and do, therefore we cannot make God our debtor; but of thine own, Lord, have we given Thee. All is his, therefore, if He were indebted to any, He has wherewithal to repay them; the debt is in good hands. All is his, therefore He needs not our services, nor can He be benefited by them. Ps. 50: 12.

II. The proof and illustration of it, from the wonderful structure of the leviathan, v. 12. In our eye, beauty lies in little, because we ourselves are little; but, in God's eye, even the leviathan is comely; and it is not for us to say of any of God's works, that they are ugly or ill-favored. Here is an anatomical view (as it were) of the leviathan; for God's works appear most beautiful and excellent, and his wisdom and power appear most in them, when they are taken in pieces, and viewed in their several parts and proportions.

1. The leviathan, even at first sight, appears formidable and inaccessible, v. 13, 14. Who dares come so near him, while he is alive, as to discover or take a distinct view of the face of the garment, the skin he is clothed with as with a garment; so near him, as to bridle him like a horse, and so lead him away; so near him, as to be within reach of his jaws, which are like a double bridle? Who will venture to look into his mouth, as we do into a horse's mouth? He that opens the doors of his face, will see his teeth terrible round about.

2. His scales are his beauty and strength, and therefore his pride, v. 15—17. The crocodile is indeed remarkable for his scales; if we understand it of the whale, we must understand by these shields, (for so the word is,) the several coats of his skin. What is remarkable concerning the scales, is, they stick so close together no air can pierce him; hence he is warm and safe. Fishes, that live in the water, are fortified accordingly by the wisdom of Providence, which gives clothes as it gives cold.

3. He scatters terror with his very breath, and looks; if he sneeze, or spout water, it is like a light shining, either with the froth, or the light of the sun shining through it, [or what is called the phosphoric light of the waves, disturbed at night,] v. 18. [Several fishes thus 'blow,' on coming to the surface, and thus, in the night, by their neesings, a light doth shine. Ed.] The eyes of the whale are reported to shine in the night-time, like a flame, or, as here, like the eye-lids of the morning; the same they say of the crocodile. The breath of this creature is so hot and fiery, from the great natural heat generated within, that burning lamps and sparks of fire, smoke and a flame, are said to go out of his mouth, even such as one would think sufficient to set coals on fire, v. 19—21. Probably, these hyperbolical expressions are used concerning the leviathan, to intimate the power and terror of the wrath of God, for that is it which all this is designed to convince us of; fire out of his mouth devours, Ps. 18: 7, 8. The breath of the Almighty, like a stream of brimstone, kindles Tophet, and will for ever keep it burning, Isa. 30: 33. The wicked one shall be consumed with the breath of his mouth, 2 Thess. 2: 8.

4. He is of invincible strength, and most terrible fierceness. Take a view of his neck, and particulars of the description to any one animal, the mere conjecture is thrown out, that the frightful creature called the sea-serpent, might have been seen and described by voyagers to India, and the countries beyond, as early as Job's time, and is alluded to here as the vastest of ocean animals. Ps. 104:26. This serpent has been seen lately on the N. E. coasts of the U. S. and is represented as, 'from 100 to 140 ft. in length: but all accounts agree as to the protuberances on its back, its vertical sinuosities, and its [elevated] serpent-shaped head.' Enc. Am. The expressions here seem too hyperbolical if applied to the crocodile, and we have no better proof that the whale was known to Job, than that the sea-serpent was. Ed.

(7.) Barbed irons . . . fish-spears.] 'In Egypt, fishing, fowling and the chase were among the amusements of the great; birds were taken by nets or traps, shot with a bow, or felled with a stick thrown at them. The fish were taken in nets, by angling, or spearing with a trident, like that still used by the South Sea islanders. (Is. 19:8, 10. and see the cut.) The chase of the hippopotamus was mostly an amusement, though it was sometimes taken for the sake of its hide, which was used for shields ("for shields and helmets, impenetrable." Pliny.) as by the modern Æthiopians.—The mode of attacking and securing the hippopotamus, appears to have been very similar to that now adopted about Sennâr. It was first entangled by a running noose, at the extremity of a long line wound upon a reel, and then struck by the spear of the chasseur. This weapon consisted of a broad, flat blade, furnished with a deep tooth, or barb, at the side, having attached to its upper end a strong rope of considerable length, running over the notched summit of a wooden shaft, which was inserted in the head or blade, like a common javelin. It was thrown, of course, in the same manner: but on striking, the shaft fell, and the iron head alone remained in the body of the animal, which, on receiving a wound, plunged into deep water, the rope having been immediately let out. When fatigued by exertion, the hippopotamus was dragged to the boat, from which it again plunged, and the same was repeated till it became perfectly exhausted; frequently receiving additional wounds, and being entangled by other nooses, which the attendants held ready, as it was brought within their reach.' 'Other wild animals were hunted in cars, or on foot, with the bow, or with hounds in slips, leopards, and even lions.' Wilkinson.

Verses 12—34.

The remainder of this ch. contains a particular and most sublime description of leviathan.—It is undeniable, that some particulars in this description do not accord to any known species of whale; for 14 Who can open [s] the doors of his face? [t] his teeth are terrible [u] round about.

15 His * scales are his [u] pride, shut up together as with [x] a close seal.

16 One is so near to another, that no air can come between them.

17 They are joined one to another, they stick together, that they cannot be sundered.

18 By his neesings a light doth shine, and his eyes are like [y] the eyelids of the morning.

19 [z] Out of his mouth go burning lamps, and sparks of fire leap out.

20 Out of his nostrils goeth smoke, [a] as out of a seething pot or caldron.

21 His breath [b] kindleth coals, and a flame goeth out of his mouth.

22 [c] In his neck remaineth strength, and sorrow † is turned into joy before him.

23 The ‡ flakes of his flesh [d] are joined together: they are firm in themselves; they cannot be moved.

24 His heart is as firm as a stone; yea, [e] as hard as a piece of the nether mill-stone.

25 When he raiseth up himself, the mighty are afraid; [f] by reason of breakings they purify themselves.

26 [g] The sword of him that layeth at him cannot hold: the spear, the dart, nor the § habergeon.

27 He esteemeth iron as straw, and brass as rotten wood.

28 The arrow cannot make him flee: [h] slingstones are turned with him into stubble.

29 Darts are counted as stubble: [i] he laugheth at the shaking of a spear.

30 || Sharp stones are under him: he spreadeth sharp pointed things upon the mire.

31 He maketh [k] the deep to boil like a pot: he maketh the sea like a pot of ointment.

32 He maketh a path to shine after him: one would think the deep to be hoary.

33 [l] Upon earth there is not his like, who [¶] is made without fear.

34 He beholdeth all high things: [m] he is a king over all the children of pride.

there remains strength, v. 22. His head and his body are well-set together; sorrow rejoices, or rides in triumph, before him, for he makes terrible work wherever he comes. Or, Those storms which are the sorrow of others, are his joy; what is tossing to others, is dancing to him. His flesh is well-knit, v. 23. The flakes of it are joined so closely together, and are so firm, that it is hard to pierce it; he is as if he were all bone; his flesh is of brass, which Job had complained his was not, ch. 6: 12. His heart is as firm as a stone, v. 24. He has spirit equal to his bodily strength, and, though bulky, is sprightly, and not unwieldy; as his flesh and skin cannot be pierced, so his courage cannot be daunted; but, on the contrary, he puts all he meets into consternation, v. 25. When he raises up himself, like a moving mountain in the great waters, even the mighty are afraid lest he do them some mischief: by reason of the breakings he makes in the water, which threaten death, they purify themselves, confess their sins, betake themselves to their prayers, and get ready for death. We read (ch. 3: 8.) of those who, when they raise up a leviathan, are in such a fright, that they curse the day. It was a fear which, it seems, used to drive some to their curses, and others to their prayers; for as now, so then there were seafaring men of different characters, and on whom the terrors of the sea have contrary effects.

5. All the instruments of slaughter used against him, do him no hurt, therefore are no terror to him, v. 26—29. It is the picture of a hard-hearted sinner, that despises the terrors of the Almighty, and laughs at all the threatenings of his Word. The leviathan so little dreads the weapons used against him, that, to show how hardy he is, he chooses to lie on the sharp stones, the sharp pointed things, (v. 30.) and lies as easy there, as on the soft mire. Those that would endure hardness, must inure themselves to it.

6. When he rolls and tosses, and makes a stir in the water, (v. 31, 32.) or is in pursuit of his prey, he makes the deep to boil like a pot, raises a froth and foam on the water, as is upon a boiling pot, especially a pot of boiling ointment; and he makes a path to shine after him, [like the wake of a ship.] One may trace the leviathan under water by the bubbles on the surface; and yet who can take that advantage against him in pursuing him? Men track hares in the snow and kill them, but he that tracks the leviathan dares not come near him.

Lastly, Having given this particular account of his parts, and his power, and his comely proportion, four things in general conclude the description of this animal, v. 33, 34. He is, 1. A none such among the inferior creatures; On earth there is not his like, no creature in this world is comparable to him for strength and terror; or, the earth is here distinguished from the sea; His dominion is not on the earth, so some, but in the waters; none of all the savage creatures on earth come near him for bulk and strength. 2. More bold and daring than any other creature. 3. Very proud; though lodged in the deep, yet he beholds all high things; the rolling waves, the impending rocks, the hovering clouds, and the ships under sail with top and top-gallant, this mighty animal beholds with contempt. Those that are great, are apt to be scornful. 4. That he is a king over all the children of pride, i. e. He is the proudest of all proud ones, has more to be proud of (so Mr. Caryl); and so it is a mortification to the haughtiness and lofty looks of men. Some understand it

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

If language so sublime was proper in describing the terrible force of 'leviathan,' what words can express the power of God's indignation, who 'is a consuming fire!' But He more delights in showing his glory from the mercy-seat; and in encouraging sinners to take refuge 'under the shadow of his wings,' and to prostrate themselves before Him. If his anger be thus turned away, his omnipotence will be our protection. Satan, the king and father of all the children of pride, with his legions of evil spirits, is not confined to the ocean; nor can he be fenced out or resisted by our puny arm [alone]. 'The poor in spirit,' who humbly trust in the Lord's mercy, may defy and resist this tremendous foe, and be made more than conquerors over him. They should however remember, that they are saved wholly by grace; 'for who hath prevented the LORD, that He should repay him?' And if mercifully rescued from the deserved wrath of God, and from the malice of Satan, they have no right to complain of any affliction or distress; or to boast of any wisdom, strength, or endowment. Submission, dependence, grateful obedience are their part; and to give all the glory to their gracious God and Savior. —When any man becomes proud of his personal strength and courage, let him be reminded of leviathan: when he is vain of his sagacity, ingenuity, or mental endowments, let him consider how much Satan excels him in them all. none of them are covered with scales, or have an impenetrable skin: but it agrees still less with any other creature that we know; and especially is wholly unsuited to the crocodile.—The ancient fathers generally understood the passage as an emblematic, or typical description of Satan, that 'king over all the children of pride.' The first row of the body consists of 6 scales, the former variety having only 4. The other scales of the body are nearly alike in both. They do not exceed 18 or 19 ft. in length, though travellers have mentioned some of stupendous size. Pliny says 22 cubits; a later author gives them 40 ft.; and a recent traveller at least 50 or 60; by which it might be inferred they continue to increase in length. CHAP. XLII.

Job, in deep humility, submits to God, 1—6. God decides in Job's favor; and requires his three friends to present burnt-offerings for their sins, and submissively to engage Job to pray for them, 7, 8. They obey, and God accepts Job, 9. His prosperity is restored and doubled, 10—12. His children, 13—15. His age and death, 16, 17.

THEN Job answered the LORD, and said,

2 I know that [a] thou canst do every thing, and that [b] no thought [*] can be withholden from thee.

3 [c] Who is he that hideth counsel without knowledge? therefore have I uttered that I understood not; [d] things too wonderful for me, which I knew not.

4 [e] Hear, I beseech thee, and I will speak: [f] I will demand of thee, and declare thou unto me.

5 I have [g] heard of thee by the hearing of the ear; but now [h] mine eye seeth thee.

6 Wherefore [i] I abhor myself, and [k] repent in dust and ashes.

CHAP. XLII. Solomon says, Better is the end of a thing than its beginning; so in Job's story. Three things we have met with in this book, which, I confess, have troubled me much; but we find all the three grievances thoroughly redressed in this ch. It has been a great trouble to us, 1. To see such a holy man as Job, so fretful, peevish, and uneasy to himself, and especially to hear him quarrel with God, and speak indecently to Him; but, though he thus fall, he is not utterly cast down, for here he recovers himself by repentance, is sorry for what he has said amiss, unsays it, and humbles himself before God. 2. To see Job and his friends so much at variance, not only differing in their opinions, but giving one another a great many hard words, and passing severe censures one on another, though they were all very wise and good men; but here we have the differences between them happily adjusted, all the peevish reflections they had cast upon one another forgiven and forgotten, and all joining in sacrifices and prayers, mutually accepted of God. 3. To see a man of such eminent piety and usefulness as Job, so grievously afflicted, so pained, sick, poor, reproached, so slighted, and made the very centre of all the calamities of human life; but here we have this grievance redressed too; Job healed of all his ailments, more honored and beloved than ever, enriched with an estate double what he had before, surrounded with all the comforts of life, and as great an instance of prosperity, as ever he had been of affliction and patience. All this is written for our learning, that we, under these and the like discouragements, through patience and comfort of this Scripture, may have hope.

V. 1—6. The words of Job, justifying himself, were ended, ch. 31: 40. After that, he said no more to that purport: the words of Job, judging and condemning himself, began, ch. 40: 4, 5. Here he goes on with words to the same purport; though his patience had not its perfect work, his repentance for his impatience had. He is here thoroughly humbled for his folly and unadvised speaking, and it was forgiven him.

1. He subscribes to the truth of God's unlimited power, knowledge, and dominion, to prove which was the scope of God's discourse out of the whirlwind, v. 2. Corrupt passions and practices arise either from some corrupt principles, or from the neglect and disbelief of the principles of truth; therefore true repentance begins in the acknowledgment of the truth, 2 Tim. 2: 25. Job here owns his judgment convinced of the greatness, glory, and perfection, of God, from which would follow the conviction of his conscience concerning his own folly, in speaking irreverently to Him.

2. He owns himself guilty of what God had charged him with in the beginning of his discourse, v. 3. 'Lord, the first word thou saidst, Who is this that darkens counsel by words without knowledge? convinced me; I own, I am the man that has been so foolish. That word reached my conscience, and set my sin in order before me; it is too plain to be denied, too bad to be excused; I have hid counsel without knowledge; I have ignorantly overlooked the counsels and designs of God in afflicting me, and therefore have quarrelled with God, and insisted too much on my own justification; Therefore I uttered that I understood not,' i. e. 'I have presumptuously passed a judgment on the dispensations of Providence, though I was utterly a stranger to the reasons of them.' And so we are all.

3. He will not answer, but will make supplication to his Judge, as he had said, ch. 9: 15. 'Hear, I beseech thee, and I will speak, v. 4. not as plaintiff or defendant, ch. 13: 22. but as a humble petitioner; not as one that will undertake to teach and prescribe, but as one that desires to learn, and is willing to be prescribed to. Lord, give me leave to ask instruction from Thee, and do not deny it me, do not upbraid me with my folly and self-sufficiency,' Jam. 1: 5. Now he is brought to the prayer Elihu taught him, That which I see not, teach Thou me.

4. He puts himself into the posture of a penitent, and on a right principle. In true repentance there must be not only conviction of sin, but contrition and godly sorrow for it, sorrowing according to God, 2 Cor. 7: 9. Such was Job's. In his repentance,

(1.) He eyed God, v. 5. 'I have heard of Thee many a time from my teachers, when I was young; from my friends, now of late; yet I was not brought, by what I heard, to submit myself to Thee as I ought; the notions I had, served me only to talk of, and had not a due influence on my mind: but now Thou hast by immediate revelation discovered Thyself to me in thy glorious majesty; now mine eyes see Thee, now I feel the power of those truths which before I had only the notion of, therefore now I repent, and unsay what I have foolishly said.' Note, 1. It is a great mercy to have a good education, and to know the things of God by the instructions of his Word and ministers;

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6. The Lord will assuredly bring those whom He loves to adore Him, in humble submission and self-abasement.—Clear discoveries of the glorious power and wisdom of God, even in the inanimate or irrational works of the creation, tend to humble our pride, and to induce us to subscribe to his rebukes, and to the charges which his Word brings against us; to fear his wrath above all things, and to expect every blessing from his favor. As none of his thoughts can fail of accomplishment, so none of ours can escape his notice, but must all be accounted for at the day of judgment.—Even the true believer, in discoursing of heavenly things, is very liable to go out of his depth; and by uttering what he does not understand, and speculating on things too wonderful for him, he often exposes himself to rebukes for his rashness and irreverence. What then will be the case of the infidel, the skeptic, and the disputer of this world? They will be speechless, and despair; whilst all the world shall behold and acknowledge the wisdom, justice, and goodness of those laws, truths, and decrees, which they arraigned and blasphemed as unjust, oppressive, and unreasonable. It behooves us humbly to crave God's instructions, and to be satisfied with the explanations He vouchsafes to give of those difficulties which intercept our path. For many hear of Him, from parents and teachers, who have no heart-affecting, influential views of his perfections. After all they have heard, He is to them an unknown God; for they do not so know Him, as to reverence, love, trust, and submit to Him.—All true knowledge of God proportionably humbles and abases us, and causes us 'to abhor ourselves, and repent in dust and ashes;' but false doctrines and mere speculative knowledge puff men up, and feed their self-importance. By this criterion let us judge ourselves, and our knowledge in religion: let us take care not to be put off with empty notions; or to be satisfied with our present measure of humiliation and experience. Did such self-abasing language suit the lips of Job, that most eminent saint and servant of God, at the moment when every grace was in its fullest exercise, and can any language be too humiliating for us? If we start, and scruple to say, that we 'abhor ourselves;' or if we find that we cannot do it with sincerity, does it not demonstrate, that we have never perceived so much of the divine glory, as Job had, and therefore are not made so sensible of our own guilt and pollution? For it would be very arrogant for any of us to suppose ourselves better, by nature and practice, or more eminent in faith, patience, or piety, than this most approved and applauded character. SCOTT.

NOTES.

CHAP. XLII. V. 1—6. (Note, 40:3—5.) Job, borne down as it were with a torrent of light and conviction, at length answered; not in his own vindication, but with unreserved submission. (M.—Notes, Prov. 19:21. Is. 46:10,11. Dan. 4:34—37. Eph. 1:9—12.)—No doubt Job, before this, had had spiritual and experimental knowledge of God in some measure; but nothing equal to what he received now. 8 Therefore take unto you now [o] seven bullocks and seven rams, and [p] go to my servant Job, and [q] offer up for yourselves a burnt-offering, and [r] my servant Job shall pray for you; for * him I will accept: [s] lest I deal with you after your folly, in that ye have not spoken of me the thing which is right, like my servant Job.

faith comes by hearing, and then it is most likely to come, when we hear attentively, and with the hearing of the ear. 2. When the understanding is enlightened by the Spirit of grace, our knowledge of divine things as far exceeds what we had before, as that by ocular demonstration exceeds that by report and common fame. By the teachings of men God reveals his Son to us; but by the teachings of his Spirit He reveals his Son in us, (Gal. 1:16.) and so changes us into the same image, 2 Cor. 3:18. 3. God is pleased sometimes to manifest Himself most fully to his people by the rebukes of his word and providence. 'The rod and reproof give wisdom. Blessed is he whom Thou chastenest and teachest.'

(2.) He eyed himself, thought hardly of himself, and thereby expressed his sorrow for his sins, v. 6. Observe, 1. It concerns us to be deeply humbled for sins we are convinced of, and not to rest in a slight, superficial displeasure. Even good people, that have no gross enormities to repent of, must be greatly afflicted in soul for the workings and breakings out of pride, passion, peevishness, and discontent, and all their hasty, unadvised speeches. Till the enemy be effectually humbled, the peace will be insecure. 2. Outward expressions of godly sorrow well become penitents; without an inward change, they do but mock God; but where they come from sincere contrition of soul, the sinner by them gives glory to God, takes shame to himself, and may be instrumental to bring others to repentance. Job's afflictions had brought him to the ashes, (ch. 2:8.) but now his sins brought him thither. True penitents mourn for their sins as heartily, as ever they did for outward afflictions; for they see more evils in their sins than in their troubles. 3. Self-loathing is evermore the companion of true repentance, Ezek. 6:9. We must not only blame ourselves for the wrong we have by sin done our own souls, but must abhor ourselves, as having by sin made ourselves odious to the pure and holy God; if sin be truly an abomination to us, sin in ourselves will especially be so; the nearer, the more loathsome. 4. The more we see of God's glory and majesty, and of the vileness and odiousness of sin, and of ourselves because of sin, the more we shall abase and abhor ourselves for it. 'Now mine eyes see what a God He is, whom I have offended, his majesty, and the tenderness of his mercy; now I see what a just and holy God He is, whose wrath I have incurred; wherefore I abhor myself,' Isa. 6:5. God had challenged Job to look upon proud men and abase them; 'I cannot,' says Job, 'pretend to it; I have enough to get my own proud heart humbled, to bring that low.' Let us leave it to God to govern the world, and make it our care, in the strength of his grace, to govern ourselves and our own hearts well.

V. 7—9. Job, in his discourses, had complained very much of his friends' censures, and hard usage, and had appealed to God as Judge between him and them, and thought it hard, that judgment was not immediately given on the appeal. While God was catechising Job out of the whirlwind, one would have thought the cause would certainly go against him; but here, to our great surprise, we find the definitive sentence given in Job's favor. Wherefore judge nothing before the time. Those who are truly righteous before God, may have their righteousness clouded and eclipsed by great and uncommon afflictions, the severe censures of men, their own frailties and foolish passions, the sharp reproofs of the Word and conscience, and the deep humiliation of their own spirits under the sense of God's terrors; and yet, in due time, these clouds shall all blow over, and God will bring forth their righteousness as the light, and their judgment as the noon-day. Here is,

I. Judgment against Job's three friends. Elihu is not censured, for he distinguished himself from the rest in the management of the dispute, and acted, not as a party, but as a moderator; and moderation will have its praise with God, whether it have with men or no. While we were examining the discourses on both sides, we could not cleave the hair between them; nor would we, for all the world, have been to give the decisive sentence on the case, lest we should have determined wrong: but it is well the judgment is the Lord's, according to truth; to it we will refer ourselves, and by it abide. In it,

1. After God had convinced and humbled Job, and brought him to repentance, then He owned, comforted, and honored him, not till then; we are not ready for God's approbation till we judge and condemn ourselves; but then He will heal us, He that has smitten, will bind us. The Comforter shall convince, John 16:8. See in what method we are to expect divine acceptance. It is taken for granted, all his offences are forgiven, for if dignified, as here, no doubt he is justified. Job had sometimes intimated, with great assurance, that God would clear him at last, and was not made ashamed of the hope.

(1.) God calls him again and again his servant Job, and seems to take a pleasure in calling him so, as before his troubles, ch. 1:8. 'Though poor and despised, he is my servant, as dear to me as when in prosperity; he has his faults, yet sees his error, and retracts it, therefore he is my servant Job still.' If we still hold fast the integrity and fidelity of servants to God, as Job, though for a time deprived of the credit and comfort of the relation, we shall be restored to it at last, as he. The devil had undertaken to prove Job a hypocrite, and his three friends had condemned him as wicked; but God will confess those whom He accepts, and not suffer them to be run down by the malice of hell or earth. If God says, Well done, good and faithful servant, it is of little consequence who says otherwise.

(2.) He owns he had spoken of Him the thing that was right, beyond what his antagonists had done; had given a much better account of the Divine Providence. They had wronged God, by making prosperity a mark of the true church, and affliction a certain indication of God's wrath; but Job had done Him right, by maintaining that God's love and hatred are to be judged of by what is in men, not by what is before them, Eccl. 9:1. Observe, [1.] Those do most justice to God and his providence, who have an eye to the rewards and punishments of another world more than to those of this, and with the prospect of those solve the difficulties of the present administration. [2.] Though Job had spoken some things amiss, even concerning God, whom he made too bold with, yet he is commended for what he spake that was right. We must not only not reject what is true and good, but must not deny it its due praise, though there appear in it a mixture of human frailty and infirmity. [3.] Job was in the right, and his friends in the wrong, yet he was in pain, and they at ease; a plain evidence, that we cannot judge of men and their sentiments by looking in their faces or purses; He only can do it infallibly, who sees men's hearts.

(3.) Job, notwithstanding all their wrong, is so good, and of such a humble, tender, forgiving spirit, he will very readily pray for his friends, and use his interest in heaven on their behalf. 'I know he will. I have pardoned him, and he has the comfort of it, therefore he will pardon you.'

(4.) God appoints him priest of this congregation, and promises to accept him and his mediation. Those whom God washes from their sins, He makes to Himself kings and priests. True penitents shall not only find favor as petitioners for themselves, but be accepted as intercessors for others also. This was a great honor, the appointing him to offer sacrifice for his friends, as formerly for his own children, ch. 1:5. And a happy presage it was of his restoration to prosperity, indeed a good step towards it, thus to be restored to the priesthood. Thus he became a type of Christ, through whom alone we and our spiritual sacrifices are acceptable to God; see 1 Pet. 2:5. And as Job prayed and offered sacrifice for those that had grieved and wounded his spirit, so Christ prayed and died for his persecutors, and ever lives, making intercession for the transgressors.

2. Job's friends were good men and belonged to God, therefore He would not leave them in their mistake any more than Job, but, having humbled him by a discourse out of the whirlwind, He takes another course to humble them. Job, who was ingly this writer omits a great part of them. They are however found in the Heb. and in other versions, manuscripts, &c. Deciding in this peremptory manner on the Word of God, is irreverent and dangerous in the extreme. SCOTT.

Verses 7—9.

It is not unlikely, that some readers have been ready to conclude, while we have gone through the preceding chs. that the discourses of Job have been too favorably, and those of his friends too unfavorably explained. But this ch. was all along considered as the clue of the whole narration; without which it would have been presumptuous to decide positively, and without hesitation. It is however evident, that the general doctrine of Job was more honorable to God, and consistent with the truth, than that of his friends. (4:1—11. 5:3—5,25—27. 8:1—7,20—22. 9:22—24. 11:1—4,13—20. 15:1—13. 18:2—4. 20:1—9. 22

10 And the LORD [a] turned the captivity of Job, [x] when he prayed for his friends: also [y] the LORD * gave Job twice as much as he had before.

11 Then came there unto him [z] all his brethren, and all his sisters; and all they that had been of his acquaintance before, and did eat bread with him in his house: and [a] they bemoaned him, and comforted him over all the evil that the LORD had brought upon him: [b] every man also gave him a piece of money, and every one an earring of gold.

12 [c] So the LORD blessed the latter end of Job more than his beginning: for [d] he had fourteen thousand sheep, and six thousand camels, and a thousand yoke of oxen, and a thousand she asses.

13 He had also [e] seven sons and three daughters.

dearest, was first chidden, but the rest in turn. When they heard Job talked to, probably they flattered themselves they were in the right, and Job in all the fault, but God soon made them know the contrary. In most disputes and controversies, there is something amiss on both sides, and both should be made to see their errors. God addresses this to Eliphaz, not only as the senior, but as the ringleader in the attack on Job. Now, (1.) They had not spoken of God the thing that was right, like Job, i. e. they had censured and condemned Job, on a false hypothesis, had represented God fighting against Job as an Enemy, when really He was only trying him as a Friend; this was not right. Those do not say well of God, who represent his fatherly chastisements of his own children as judicial punishments, and who cut them off from his favor on account of them. Note, It is dangerous to judge uncharitably of the spiritual and eternal state of others, for, in so doing, we may perhaps condemn those whom God has accepted, which is a great provocation to Him, it is offending his little ones. (2.) God assures them He was angry with them; God is very angry with those who despise and reproach their brethren, insult over them, judge hardly of them, either for their calamities, or infirmities. (3.) He requires a sacrifice, to atone for what they had said amiss, v. 8. for it should seem, that, before the law of Moses, all sacrifices were wholly burnt, and therefore were called burnt-offerings. God is often angry at that in us, of which we ourselves are proud, and sees much amiss in what we think was done well. (4.) He orders them to beg Job to offer their sacrifices, and pray for them, otherwise they should not be accepted. It was to humble them, Rev. 3: 9. The foolish virgins will beg oil of the wise. To oblige them also to make their peace with Job, as the condition of peace with God. If thy brother has aught against thee, (as Job had a great deal against them,) first be reconciled to thy brother, and then come and offer thy gift. Satisfaction must first be made for wrong done, according as the nature of the thing requires, before we can hope to obtain from God the forgiveness of sin. See how thoroughly God espoused the cause of his servant Job. Those who differ in judgment about less things, yet are one in Christ the great Sacrifice, and meet at the same throne of grace, and therefore ought to love and bear with one another. Our quarrels with God always begin on our part, but the reconciliation begins on his.

II. The acquiescence of Job's friends in this judgment, v. 9. They were good men, and, as soon as they understood what the mind of the Lord was, they did as He commanded them, speedily and without gainsaying, though against flesh and blood. Those who would be reconciled to God, must carefully use the prescribed means and methods. They that conscientiously observe God's commands, need not doubt his favor; The Lord also accepted Job, and his friends, in answer to his prayer. It is not said, He accepted them, (though that is implied,) but, He accepted Job, for them; so He has made us accepted in the Beloved, Eph. 1: 6. Matt. 3: 17. God being graciously reconciled, Job was easily reconciled. This must be the top of our ambition, not to have praise of men, but to please God.

V. 10—17. Ye have heard of the patience of Job, says the apostle, (Jam. 5: 11.) and have seen the end of the Lord, i. e. what end the Lord, at length, put to his troubles. Perhaps, too, this extraordinary prosperity was intended to be, to us Christians, a type and figure of the glory and happiness of heaven, which the afflictions of this present time are working for us.

1. Job's sorest complaint was, that God appeared against him: but now God plainly appeared for him, and watched over him to build and to plant, like as He had (at least, in his apprehension) watched over him to pluck up and to throw down, Jer. 31: 28. God turned his captivity, i. e. redressed his grievances, and took away all the causes of his complaints; he loosed him from the bond with which Satan had now, for a great while, bound him. We may suppose all his bodily pains and distempers were now healed, so suddenly, and thoroughly, that the cure was next to miraculous; more, he felt a very great alteration in his mind; it was calm and easy, the tumult all over, his disquieting thoughts all vanished, his fears silenced, and the consolations of God now as much the delight of his soul, as his terrors had been its burden: the tide turned just then when he was praying for his friends, over his sacrifice for them; not when he was disputing with them, no, though he had right on his side; for God is better served and pleased with warm devotions than warm disputations. When Job completed his repentance by forgiving men their trespasses, then God completed his remission by turning his captivity. Christ has taught us to pray with, and for others, in teaching us to say, Our Father; and in seeking mercy for others, we may find mercy ourselves. Some, by the turning of Job's captivity, understand the restitution the Sabeans and Chaldeans made of the cattle they had taken from him, God wonderfully inclining them to do it; and with these he began the world again. Probably, it was so; those spoilers had swallowed down his riches, but they were forced to vomit them up again, ch. 20: 15. But I rather understand this more generally of the turn now given. It is also probable God at first, some way or other, intimated to him, that it was his gracious purpose, by degrees, in due time, to prosper him with twice as much as ever he had, to encourage his hope and quicken his industry, and that it might appear that this wonderful increase was a special token of God's favor, Heb. 10: 35. Job's friends had often put their severe censure on this issue, If thou wert pure and upright, surely now He would awake for thee, ch. 8: 6. But He does not awake for thee, therefore thou art not upright; 'I will, even by that, demonstrate the integrity of my servant Job.' Now it appeared Job had reason to bless God for taking away, (as he did, ch. 1: 21.) since it made so good a return

Semitic Language. In the book we have just been considering, we find a specimen of several members (see the pref.) of that great family of languages, thus described by Heeren. 'On the E. bank of the river Halys, began the empire of a mighty language spoken from the Halys E. as far as the Tigris; and from the heights of Caucasus to the S. coast of Arabia; and which, with some variations, preserves every where a distinctive or original character, being usually styled SEMITIC. Its dialects were the Cappadocian, in the W. countries on the banks of the Halys; the Syrian, between the Mediterranean and the Euphrates; and the Assyrian, on the farther side of the Tigris, in Kurdistan, or the ancient Adiabene; the Chaldæan, in Babylonia; the Hebrew and Samaritan in Palestine; the Phœnician, in the maritime cities of Phœnicia and their extensive colonies; and lastly, the Arabic, extending not only over the whole of the Arabian peninsula, but also over the steppes of Mesopotamia, which have at all times been frequented by wandering hordes of Arabs. Several of these dialects still survive; with others we are acquainted only through their literary fragments; and it cannot be doubted that at some remote period, antecedent to the commencement of historical records, one mighty race possessed these vast plains, varying in character according to the nature of the country which they inhabited; in the deserts of Arabia pursuing a nomad life; in Syria applying themselves to agriculture, and taking up settled abodes; in Babylonia erecting the most magnificent cities of ancient times, and in Phœnicia opening the earliest ports, and constructing those that have thriven, must acknowledge their obligations. The last days of a good man sometimes prove his best days, his last works his best works, his last comforts his best comforts; for his path, like that of the morning-light, shines more and more to the perfect day. His end is peace. God is pleased sometimes strangely to outdo the expectations of his afflicted people, who thought they should never live to see better days, that we may not despair even in the depths of adversity; we know not what good times we may yet be reserved for. Job's possessions were just doubled; which is a remarkable instance of the extent of the Divine Providence to things that seem minute, as this, the exact number of a man's cattle; as also of the harmony of Providence, and the reference of one event to another; known unto God are all his works, from the beginning to the end. Job's other possessions, no doubt, were increased in proportion.

4. His family was built up again, and he had great comfort in his children, v. 13—15. The last of his afflictions and the most grievous, was, the death of all his children at once: his friends upbraided him with it, (ch. 8: 4.) but God repaired even that breach in process of time, either by the same wife, or, she being dead, by another. Some give this reason why his children were not doubled tions, were very kind, v. 11. They had been estranged, and it was not the least of his grievances ch. 19: 13, &c. They bemoaned him, when they talked over the calamities of his afflicted state; and comforted him, when they noticed God's gracious returns to him. These were not such great, learned, eloquent men as the miserable comforters, but proved much more skilful and kind. God sometimes chooses the foolish and weak things of the world, as for conviction, so for comfort. They made a collection among them to repair his losses, and set him up again: did not think it enough to say, Be warmed, Be filled. But why? God put it in their hearts; and every creature is that to us that He makes it.

3. His estate strangely increased, by God's blessing on the little his friends gave him: it is He that gives us power to get wealth, and success in honest endeavors. Those therefore that would thrive, must have an eye to God's blessing, and as his cattle were, that they that were dead were not lost, but gone before to a better world; therefore if he have but the same number, they may be reckoned doubled. The names of his daughters are here registered, (v. 14.) because, in the significations of them, they seemed designed to perpetuate the remembrance of God's great goodness to him in the surprising change of his condition; he called the first Jemima, The day, because of the shining forth of his prosperity after a dark night of affliction. The next Kezia, a spice of a very fragrant smell, because (says Patrick) God had healed his ulcers. The third Keren-happuch, i. e. Plenty restored, or A horn of paint; because (says he) God had wiped away the tears which fouled his face, ch. 16: 16. We are told, v. 15. no women were so fair. In the O. T. we often find women praised for beauty, as Sarah, Rebekah, and many others; but never any in the N. T. whose beauty is in the least noticed, no not the Virgin Mary herself, because the beauty of holiness is that which is brought to a much clearer light by the Gospel. Their father supplied them great fortunes. Probably they had some extraordinary personal merit, which Job eyed. Perhaps they excelled their brethren in wisdom and piety; therefore, that they might continue in his family, a stay and blessing, he made them co-heirs.

5. The life of Job was long. We are told he lived 140 years; whence some conjecture he was 70 when in his troubles, and that so his age was doubled, as his possessions. He lived till he was satisfied, for he died full of days, willing to leave the world; not peevishly so, as in the days of his affliction, but piously so; thus, as Eliphaz had encouraged him to hope, he came to his grave like a shock of corn in his season.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 7—17. When the Lord has duly humbled and graciously pardoned his servants, He will clear their reputations, silence their slanderers, answer their confidence, and exceed their largest expectations; and He will also teach them, after his example, to forgive, love, and pray for those who have injured them. In this frame of spirit, they will be prepared to bear honor in an unassuming manner, and then He will confer it. He generally first rebukes those whom He most loves: (5: 17. Heb. 12: 4—11. Rev. 3: 18, 19.) but let not such, as for a time escape, be too confident, for their turn will soon come.—It is indeed very painful to be confuted, rebuked, and constrained to confess our mistakes and offences, and to beg the assistance and good offices of those, whom we have despised, condemned, and injured. Yet the true penitent will submit to all this and far more, when the will of God is known: his self-abasement will be proportioned to his former self-confidence; and whenever we approach God in his ordinances, such mutual concessions, restitutions, and forgivenesses should first be attended to. (Matt. 5: 23, 24.) Nothing cements the affections of believers, who have jarred or disputed, so much as praying with and for each other: when they enjoy communion with their common Savior, they feel a more lively disposition to delight in 'the communion of the saints;' and to forget all which for a season interrupted it; and 'the effectual, fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much.'—When a man is oppressed, censured, and tempted, He appears very different, from what he does when delivered and comforted: and he that is at ease, can scarcely conceive what effect sharp trials would have upon him.—Whether the Lord gives us health, long life, affluence, friends, and flourishing families, or not; we shall eventually be happy, if we patiently suffer according to his will.—But though Job's trials and their happy event are replete with instruction and consolation, to the suffering and tempted believer; yet we shall be still more edified and encouraged by looking unto Jesus. May we then experience his grace, share his victories, tread in his steps, and copy his patience; and we shall find in the 'event, that the Lord is pitiful, and of tender mercy.'—But 'we have need of patience, that after having done the will of God, we may receive the promise.' fleets which secured to them the commerce of the known world.' HEEREN.

Structure of the Earth.

As the subject of Geology, in connection with the SS. would be improperly dismissed with the notes, Gen. 1: 1 and 2, and 1—10; and as the structure of the earth, and, there is some reason to think, even fossil remains, are alluded to in this most ancient book; the little space, here left us, is well occupied with the following remarks of Prof. HITCHCOCK, whose opinions need no commendation to an American reader who loves the hallowed union of science, philosophy and religion. The able professor considers (1836) the following points in Geology (among others) as established. '(1.) The sea and land have changed places at least once, and probably oftener, in some parts: i. e. a large part of existing continents once formed, and for a long period, the bottom of the ocean; from whence it has been subsequently elevated, either gradually, or by paroxysms, by means of a volcanic or internal force. (2.) The whole crust of the globe, or all known rocks, have resulted from the operation of second causes, either igneous or aqueous. (3.) For the most part, the processes by which the stratified rocks, especially the fossiliferous ores, have been formed, was such as are now in operation on the globe; and consequently, must have required a great length of time for their completion, even if those causes operated in early times with greater intensity than at present. (Almost every fact proves this to a practical geologist, and nearly every geologist adopts it.) (4.) The animals and vegetables found in the rocks, must have lived and died near the spots where they are now found; or if drifted at all, it could not have been, in most instances, but a short distance. (5.) These fossil animals and plants, even in high latitudes, correspond more nearly to those found living within the tropics, than to those within the temperate or frigid zones. (6.) From this and other considerations, it is clear that the temperature of the globe in early times must have been higher than at present. (7.) In the secondary rocks, (in which term I include all the fossiliferous strata below the tertiary,) no species of animals or plants corresponds with those in the tertiary strata; and hence they could not when alive have been contemporaries; i. e. the races buried in the secondary rocks, must have become extinct before those in the tertiary strata had an existence. (8.) No species among living animals and plants corresponds to those now found in the secondary rocks; (which constitute by far the greatest part of the fossiliferous strata,) and only a small proportion of those in the tertiary strata correspond to living species; and those that do correspond are found chiefly in the upper portions of the tertiary. Hence the existing races could not have lived on the earth at the same time with those in the secondary rocks, and but few if any with those in the tertiary rocks. In other words, great and sometimes entire changes of organic life have taken place on the globe since its original creation. (9.) In all countries hitherto examined, the remains of man have not been found except in alluvium, and in a few instances in what is called diluvium, and therefore he could not have existed in such countries at the same time with the fossil races found deeper in the earth.' Bib. Repos. April, 1836. ED.

AN EXPOSITION,

WITH

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS AND NOTES,

UPON THE BOOK OF PSALMS.

We have now before us one of the choicest and most excellent parts of all the O. T.; nay, so much is there in it of CHRIST and his gospel, as well as of GOD and his law, that it has been called the abstract, or summary, of both Testaments. The history of Israel led us to camps and council-boards; the book of Job brought us into the schools; but this brings us into the sanctuary, and directs us into communion with GOD, by solacing and reposing our souls in Him, lifting up, and letting out, our hearts toward Him: and we understand not ourselves, if we say not, It is good to be here.

I. The title of this book is, 1. The Psalms, Luke 24: 44. in Hebrew, Tehillim, properly Psalms of praise; because many of them are such: but Psalms is a more general word, meaning all metrical compositions fitted to be sung, as well historical, doctrinal, or supplicatory, as laudatory; and to excite all the other affections, as well as this of joy. The divine institution of singing psalms is thus largely displayed; for we are directed, not only to praise GOD, but to teach and admonish ourselves and one another in psalms, and hymns, and spiritual songs, Col. 3: 16. 2. The Book of Psalms, Acts 1: 20. It is a collection of all the divinely inspired psalms, which, though composed at several times and on several occasions, are here put together without any reference to, or dependence on, one another, for the service of the church.

II. The Author of this book is, no doubt, originally the Blessed Spirit. They are spiritual songs, words which the Holy Ghost taught. David wrote most of them, therefore he is called the sweet Psalmist of Israel, 2 Sam. 23: 1. Some that have not his name in their titles, yet are expressly ascribed to him elsewhere; as Ps. 2: (Acts 4: 25.) and Ps. 96: 105. (1 Chr. 16.) One psalm is expressly said to be the prayer of Moses, Ps. 90. and that some were penned by Asaph, is intimated, 2 Chr. 29: 30. Some seem to have been penned long after; as Ps. 137. at the time of the captivity in Babylon; but the far greater part were certainly penned by David himself, whose genius lay toward poetry and music, and who was raised up, qualified, and animated, to establish the ordinance of singing psalms in the church of GOD, as Moses and Aaron were, in their day, to settle the ordinances of sacrifice; theirs is superseded, but his remains, and will to the end of time, when it shall be swallowed up in the songs of eternity. Herein David was a type of CHRIST, who descended from him, not from Moses, because he came to take away sacrifice, (the family of Moses was soon lost and extinct.) but to establish and perpetuate joy and praise; for of the family of David in CHRIST there shall be no end.

III. The scope of it is manifestly, 1. To assist the exercises of natural religion. The book of Job helps to prove our first principles of the divine perfections and providence; but this to improve them in prayers and praises, and professions of desire toward Him, dependence on Him, and an entire devotedness and resignation to Him. Other parts of Scripture show that GOD is infinitely above man, and his sovereign LORD; but this shows that He may, notwithstanding, be conversed with by us sinful worms of the earth; and there are ways in which, if it be not our own fault, we may keep up communion with Him in all the various conditions of human life. 2. To advance the excellences of revealed religion, and, in the most pleasing, powerful manner, to recommend it to the world. And CHRIST, the Crown and Centre of revealed religion, the Foundation, Corner, and Top-stone, of that blessed building, is here clearly spoken of in type and prophecy; both his sufferings and subsequent glory, and his kingdom. What a high value does this book put on the word of GOD, his statutes and judgments, his covenant, and the great and precious promises of it; and how does it recommend them to us as our guide and stay, and our heritage for ever!

IV. The use of it. No one book of Scripture is more helpful to the devotions of the saints than this, and it has been so in all ages of the church, since it was written. 1. It is of use to be sung. Further than David's psalms we may, but need not go, for hymns and spiritual songs. What the rules of the Hebrew metre were, even the learned are not certain. [See pref. to Poet. Books.] But these psalms ought to be rendered according to the metre of every language, at least, so as that they may be sung for the edification of the church. 2. It is of use to be read and opened by the ministers of CHRIST, as containing great and excellent truths, and rules concerning good and evil. JESUS expounded the gospel psalms to his disciples, and opened their understandings to understand them, Luke 24: 44. 3. It is of use to be read and meditated upon by all good people. The psalmist's experiences are of great use for our direction, caution, and encouragement. David was a man after GOD'S own heart, therefore those who find themselves in some measure according to his heart, have reason to hope they are renewed by the grace of GOD, after the image of GOD, and may have much comfort in the testimony of their consciences for them. 4. The Psalmist's expressions, too, are of great use; by them the Spirit helps our praying infirmities, because we know not what to pray for as we ought. Hos. 14: 2. If we make David's psalms familiar, as we ought, whatever errand we have at the throne of grace, we may thence be assisted in the delivery of it; whatever devout affection is working in us, we may there find apt words wherewith to clothe it. It will be good to collect the most proper and lively expressions of devotion, which we find here, and to methodize them, and reduce them to the several heads of prayer, that they may be the more ready to us. Or, we may take sometimes one choice psalm, and sometimes another, and pray it over, i. e. enlarge on each v. in our own thoughts, and offer up our meditations to God, as they arise from the expressions we find there. The book is also a directory to the actions of our lives, and teaches us how to order our conversation aright, so as that, in the end, we may see the salvation of GOD, Ps. 50: 23. The Psalms were thus serviceable to the Old Testament Church, but to us Christians they may be of more use than they could be to them who lived before the coming of CHRIST; for, as Moses' sacrifices, so David's songs, are expounded and made more intelligible by the Gospel of CHRIST, which lets us within the veil; so that, if to David's prayers and praises we add Paul's prayers in his Epistles, and the new songs in the Revelation, we shall be thoroughly furnished for this good work; for the Scripture, perfected, makes the man of GOD perfect. HENRY.

Various divisions of this book have been made, apparently without much reason.—'The version of the Psalms, in our Bible, which was made by the translators employed by James the First, is posterior to that printed in our prayer books, which was executed in 1539. This last, as very excellent, and familiarized by custom, was retained in the Liturgy; though, as translated chiefly from the Septuagint, it does not so exactly correspond with the original, as does that in our Bibles.' Gray's Key. Indeed the Prayer-book translation is in no respect comparable to the Bible translation. SCOTT.

As to the division of this book, we need not be solicitous; there is no connection, or very seldom, between one psalm and another; but the order wherein we here find them, seems to be ancient, for that which is now the second psalm, was so in the Apostles' time, Acts 13: 33. The vulgar Latin joins the 9: and 10: together; all popish authors quote by that, so that thenceforward, throughout the book, their number is one short of ours; our 11: is their 10: our 119: their 118. But then they divide the 147: into two, and so make up the number of 150. Some have endeavored to reduce the psalms to proper heads, according to the matter of them, but there is often such a variety of matter in one and the same psalm, that it cannot be done with any certainty; yet the seven penitential psalms have been in a particular manner singled out by the devotions of many. They are reckoned to be the 6, 22, 38, 51, 102, 130, and 143. [See note, end of Ps.] The psalms were divided into five books, each concluding with Amen, Amen, or Hallelujah; the first ending with Ps. 41: the second with Ps. 72: the third with Ps. 89: the fourth with Ps. 106: the fifth with Ps. 150. Others divide them into three fifties; others into sixty parts, two for every day of the month, one for the morning, the other for the evening. Let good Christians divide them for themselves, so as may best increase their acquaintance with them, that they may have them at hand on all occasions, and may sing them in the Spirit and with the understanding. [See the 'Chronological arrangement of the Psalms,' from Cot. Bib., next page.*] HENRY.

'It is plain, from Jos. 10: 13. and 2 Sam. 1: 18. that the Hebrews had poems and collections of poems which were sacred, long before David's time; but the psalms belong, principally, to the ages which elapsed between the time of David and the Babylonian captivity: it is matter of dispute, whether some of them are more ancient than this period; some are certainly more modern, but it cannot be proved, by sufficient arguments, that any are as recent as the age of Antiochus Epiphanes and the Maccabees.' JAHN.—'This collection of sacred hymns has ever been held in the highest estimation. Athanasius styles them an epitome of the whole Scriptures; Basil, a compendium of theology; Luther, a little Bible, and the summary of the Old Testament; and Melancthon, the most eloquent writing in the world.' Critica Biblica.—'In general, it may be viewed as a collection of sacred odes, composed by different bards, on various occasions of national history, individual experience, and prophetic excitement. The subjects embraced are endlessly diversified; corresponding to the varieties of nature, the complex operations of the divine government, the changing fortunes of the Jewish people, the vicissitudes of the life of David, the symbolical character of ritual worship, the progressive disclosures of the divine will, and the manifold states of the church on earth and in heaven.... It is a kind of sacred repository of all the great elements of devotion and praise. The most vital inquiry, perhaps, involved in the legitimate interpretation of this inspired book, is that which relates to it as a prophecy of the Messiah, and the times of the Gentiles. For my part, I can perceive no infallible guide but in the comments and appropriations of Christ and his apostles. Where they have set the example of recognising the prophetic spirit, we are safe in following in their footsteps: beyond this, all is doubt and uncertainty.' But 'he who has read the book of psalms without being led to Bethlehem, to the judgment-hall of Pilate, to the garden of Gethsemane, to the scene of crucifixion, to the mount of Olives, and to the Throne of Heaven, has had his spiritual vision obscured by ignorance, or blinded by prejudice.' Dr. JOHN MORISON.

The word Psalms is from the Greek, and denotes that these sacred hymns were, when sung, accompanied with the psaltery, harp, or lute: and indeed, from the time of David, psalmody, with various kinds of instrumental music, formed a considerable part of the daily worship at the sanctuary. (1 Chr. 9: 33. 15: 16—22. 16: 4—6, 37—43. 25:)—The whole collection is often called, 'The Psalms of David.' (See 2 Sam. 23: 1—4.)—Josephus informs us, that the Levites were enjoined to preserve, at the temple, all such hymns as might be composed in honor of God: and it is thought by some learned men, that the book of Psalms which we now have was selected from a much larger number, as divinely inspired, and therefore admissible into the canon of Scripture; while many others were rejected, as not entitled to this honorable distinction. However this may be, the entire book has certainly been considered as a part of the 'oracles of God' in every age, by an invariable testimony. Nearly fifty of the Psalms are quoted, or referred to, in the N. T. Our Lord, proposing a question to the scribes concerning the Messiah, introduces a passage from Ps. 110. in this manner: 'David himself said by the Holy Ghost;' and 'David in Spirit calleth him Lord:' and when instructing his disciples, after his resurrection, He says: 'All things must be fulfilled, which are written in the law of Moses, and in the Prophets, and in the Psalms, concerning Me.' (Matt. 24: 41—46. Mark 12: 35—37. Luke 24: 44—49.) In like manner, the apostle Paul, quoting a passage from Ps. 95. which he ascribes to David, uses this language; 'Wherefore as the Holy Ghost saith, To-day, if ye will hear his voice.' (Heb. 3: 7—13. 4: 3—11.) The assembled Christian church also applies the second Psalm to Christ, in these words: 'Lord, thou art God,... who by the mouth of thy servant David hast said.' (Acts 4: 23—28.) In so decided a manner is the divine inspiration of the O. T. attested by Christ and his apostles.—The Jewish writers indeed are unwilling to bestow on David the title of prophet, and ascribe to him only a subordinate kind of inspiration, according to the several distinctions which they have devised in this respect: [see pref. to Poet. Books:] but Peter expressly calls him a prophet; (Acts 2: 30.) and the number and clearness of the predictions which he delivered, and which were evidently fulfilled after many ages, most fully prove him entitled to that character. Indeed, the several particulars respecting the descent, kingdom, priesthood, and life of Christ, &c. with the success of his Gospel, and the calling of the Gentiles, are so circumstantially foretold in one or other of the Psalms, that a history of these events might in great measure be compiled from them; and in some cases, with a minuteness to which historians seldom descend.—The words which our Lord used on the cross, in two instances, were taken from the Psalms; and the insulting language of his persecutors was the very same as David, above a thousand years before, had put into their mouths. (Ps. 22: 1, 7, 8. 31: 5. Matt. 27: 39—46. Luke 23: 46.)—Many Psalms indeed are, directly and throughout, prophecies of Christ; various passages in others must be interpreted of Him: and David was so eminent a type of the Savior, that his very name, in some instances in the prophecies, is given to this his most illustrious Descendant. (Ez. 37: 24, 25. Is. 55: 1—5. Ez. 34: 23—31. Hos. 3: 4, 5.) But besides this, that union, which subsists between the Redeemer and his people, and the conformity thence resulting, are of such a nature, that it is impossible the same things should not apply in many respects to both, though a discrimination must needs be observed in others. This may lead us to an obvious decision of the controversy, which has often been agitated, whether all the Psalms should be applied to Christ, or not. No doubt every pious mind will allow, that each of them either immediately points to Him in his Person, character, and offices; or may be so applied as to lead the believer's thoughts to Him, who is the centre of all acceptable religion: and probably there are few persons, who suppose that all the Psalms speak of Christ in exactly the same manner; but rather according to the nature of the subject. 'The Psalms are an epitome of the Bible, adapted to devotion. They treat occasionally of the creation and formation of the world, the dispensations of Providence, and the economy of Grace; the transactions of the patriarchs; the Exodus of Israel, their journey through the wilderness, and settlement in Canaan; their law, priesthood, and ritual; the exploits of their great men, wrought through faith; their sins and captivities; their repentances and restorations; the sufferings and victories of David; the peaceful and happy reign of Solomon; the advent of Messiah, with its effects and consequences; his incarnation, birth, life, passion, death, resurrection, ascension, kingdom, and priesthood; the effusion of the Spirit; the conversion of the nations; the rejection of the Jews; the establishment, increase, and perpetuity of the Christian church; the end of the world; the general judgment; the condemnation of the wicked, and the final triumph of the righteous with their Lord and King. These are the subjects here presented to our meditation.... They are... adorned with the figures and set off with the graces of poetry; and poetry itself is designed yet further to be recommended by the charms of music, thus consecrated to the service of God; that so delight may prepare the way for improvement, and pleasure become the handmaid of wisdom, while every turbulent passion is calmed by sacred melody, and the evil spirit is still dispossessed by the Harp of the son of Jesse.' Bp. Horne's Pref. to his Comm. on the Ps. 3*d ed.* 8*vo. Oxf.* 1781, pp. i, ii.—'They present religion to us in its most engaging dress; communicating truths, which philosophy could never investigate, in a style which poetry can never equal; while history is made the vehicle of prophecy, and Creation lends all its charms to paint the glories of Redemption.' Ib. p. lxiv.—'Besides their incomparable fitness to express our sentiments, they are at the same time memorials of, and appeals to, former mercies and deliverances; they are acknowledgments of prophecies accomplished.' Ib. p. xxviii.—In commenting therefore on this book, we should continually keep the Savior in our mind; and while we consider who He was, and what He did; how and why He suffered, and how He rose and reigns; we should also endeavor to learn what his true disciples are, what they ought to be, and what they actually do aspire after. The literal meaning, as far as the Psalmist is concerned, should be adverted to, where it can be ascertained; the particulars noted, in which Christ is predicted or typified; and the use that is to be made of every part of each Psalm to encourage the faith and hope, to direct the temper and conduct, to enliven the devotions, and to assist the self-examination of the reader, should be plainly shown.—We are also here continually reminded of what we must have to struggle against, from within and from without, and how we may succeed in this conflict: and solemn warnings, and denunciations of vengeance against oppressors and persecutors, and the despisers and opposers of Christ and his gospel, are every where interspersed. This indeed has been considered as an objection to the use of the Psalms, in public or private devotion; and a prejudice has arisen in some pious minds against several parts of them, as if contrary to the Christian spirit: but, doubtless, the right spirit has always been the same; and these parts must be considered, either as direct prophecies, or as divinely inspired declarations of the certain doom awaiting all the opposers of Christ, and his cause or people; and not as expressions of private resentment, or malevolence against injurious individuals. In short, there is nothing in true religion, doctrinal, experimental, and practical, but will present itself to our attention, while we meditate on the Psalms: scarcely any part of the book, which, when properly understood and accommodated, will not be found to suit the case of private Christians, and which may not be usefully employed in public worship: hardly an occasion of praise and thanksgiving can be conceived, to which some portion of them, faithfully rendered in poetical versions, may not be applied with peculiar energy and propriety; and indeed the Christian's use of them in the closet, and the minister's in the pulpit, will generally increase, with their growing experience of the power of true religion in their own hearts. From this eulogium on this part of Scripture, let the reader be excited to meditate on it carefully for himself; but let him not expect too much from the expositor. Brevity must be consulted; a writer's inclination may exceed his ability; and at last, the teaching Spirit of God, sought in fervent prayer, leading the pious soul into the genuine exercise of faith, hope, love, and gratitude, will do more to enable a man to enter into the Psalmist's views, than any human explication. If the author is enabled to suggest a few profitable hints on each Psalm, he shall have cause to be very thankful. SCOTT.

NOTES.

PSALM I. V. 1—3. This psalm is generally considered as a preface to the book, and supposed to have been prefixed to it by Ezra. The translation in our prayer-book renders this in the past tense; and though the original might very well bear that meaning, yet the context and the whole tenor of Scripture show, that this cannot be the exclusive sense; for that would imply, that they alone are blessed, who never have walked in the counsel of the ungodly, nor stood in the way of sinners, nor sat in the seat of the scornful: whereas penitent believers, whatever their previous character has been, are partakers of the blessings, which is evidenced by their subsequent conduct; and none but they answer this description. (32:1,2. 106:3—6. 119:1—5. Matt. 5:1—12. Luke 11:27, 28. Rom. 4:6—8.)—'The ungodly' are those, however moral or virtuous, who profanely despise spiritual blessings, and live without any due regard to God and religion, as all unconverted men do.—'The counsel of the ungodly' signifies, the maxims and principles of worldly men, who form their plans and calculate advantages or disadvantages, according to their several pursuits, without bringing eternal things, and the favor or displeasure of God, into the account: and 'walking in this counsel,' signifies an habitual conduct formed on such principles, and regulated according to such rules. 'Sinners,' in this climax, seems to mean, those who add to their ungodliness, gross immoralities, and such crimes as natural conscience and the opinion of the world protest against. (Luke 7:37—39. John 9:24—34. Rom. 5:6—10.) And to 'stand in the way of sinners,' implies, the habit of vices gradually overcoming the sense of shame and remorse of conscience; till a quiet, rarely interrupted by convictions, is superinduced. Yet these occasional convictions are the source of uneasiness; and this prepares the sinner for 'sitting down in the seat of the scornful.'—'The scornful' no doubt are those, who encourage themselves and each other in ungodliness and wickedness, by infidel and atheistical tenets; and who have recourse to corrupt principles, to bear them out in corrupt practices; and so are given up to a blinded and deluded mind, as a punishment of their conduct in following the impulse of a wicked heart. The seat of the scornful. (1) 'The seat of pestilences.' Sept. See Acts 24:5. Ps. I. V. 1—3. This is a psalm of instruction concerning good and evil. The different character and condition of godly and wicked people, is here plainly stated in a few words; so that every man, if he will be faithful to himself, may here see his own face, and then read his own doom. That division of the children of men into saints and sinners, as it is ancient, ever since the struggle began between sin and grace, the seed of the woman and the seed of the serpent, so it is lasting, and will survive all other divisions and subdivisions of men; for by this, men's everlasting state will be determined, and the distinction will last as long as heaven and hell. Whoever collected the psalms of David, (probably it was Ezra,) with good reason put this psalm first, as a preface to the rest, because it is absolutely necessary, to the acceptance of our devotions, that we be righteous before God, (for only the prayer of the upright is his delight,) therefore, that we be right in our notions of blessedness, and in our choice of the way that leads to it. Those are not fit to put up good prayers, who do not walk in good ways.

I. An error in the choice of our standard and leader, is original and fatal; but if we be right here, we are in a fair way to do well.

1. A godly man, that he may avoid the evil, utterly renounces the conduct of evil-doers, and will not be led by them, v. 1. This part of his character is put first, because those that will keep the commandments of their God, must say to evil-doers, Depart from us, 119: 115. and departing from evil, is that in which wisdom begins. The world is full of evil-doers; but they are here described by three characters, ungodly, sinners, and scornful. See by what steps men arrive at the height of impiety. None reach the height of vice at once. They are ungodly first, casting off the fear of God, and living in the neglect of their duty to Him: but when the services of religion are laid aside, they come to be sinners, break out into open rebellion against God, and engage in the service of sin and Satan; at length, they come to be scorners, openly defy all that is sacred, scoff at religion, and make a jest of sin. The word we translate ungodly, signifies such as are unsettled, aim at no certain end, and walk by no certain rule, but are at the command of every lust, and at the beck of every temptation. The word for sinners, signifies such as are determined for the practice of sin, and set it up as their trade. The scornful, are those that set their mouths against the heavens. These the good man sees with a sad heart, but he shuns them, wherever he sees them. He does not do as they do; and, that he may not, he does not converse familiarly with them. He does not walk in the counsel of the ungodly; though ever so witty, and subtle, and learned, if ungodly, they shall not be the men of his counsel; he does not consent to them, nor say as they say, Luke 23: 51. adopt their principles, or act according to their advice. He stands not in the way of sinners; their way shall not be his, he will not come into it, much less continue in it, as the sinner does, who sets himself in a way that is not good, 36: 4. He will not associate with them, nor choose them for his companions. He does not stand in their way, to be picked up by them, (Prov. 7: 8.) but keeps as far from them as from a place or person infected with the plague, for fear of the contagion, Prov. 4: 14, 15. He that would be kept from harm, must keep out of harm's way. He sits not in the seat of the scornful; not in close cabal, to find out ways and means to support and advance the devil's kingdom, or in open judgment, magisterially to condemn the generation of the righteous. The seat of the drunkards, is the seat of the scornful, 69: 12. Happy the man that never sits in it, Hos. 7: 5.

2. A godly man, that he may do what is good and cleave to it, submits to the direction of the Word of God, and makes that familiar to him, v. 2. This keeps him out of the way of the ungodly, and fortifies him against their temptations. We may judge of our spiritual state by asking, 'What is the law of God to us? What account do we make of it! What place has it in us?' See here, (1.) The entire affection a good man has for the law of God; his delight is in it, though it be a law, a yoke, because it is the law of God, holy, just, and good, which he freely consents to, and so delights in, after the inner man, Rom. 7: 16, 22. All who are well pleased that there is a God, must be well pleased that there is a Bible, a revelation of God, of his will, and the only way to happiness in Him. (2.) The intimate acquaintance a good man keeps up with the Word of God; in that law doth he meditate day and night; by this it appears his delight is in it, for what we love, we love to think of, 119: 97. No time is amiss for meditating on the Word of God. We must not only do it morning and evening; but thoughts of it should be interwoven with the business and converse of every day, and with the repose and slumbers of every night; When I awake, I am still with Thee.

II. An assurance of the godly man's happiness, with which we should encourage ourselves to answer the character of such.

1. He is blessed, v. 1. God blesses him, and that blessing will make him happy: none of the ingredients of happiness shall be wanting to him. When he undertakes to describe a blessed man, he describes a good man; for, after all, those only are truly happy, that are truly holy; and we are more concerned to know the way to blessedness, than to know wherein blessedness will consist. Nay, goodness and holiness are not only the way to happiness, Rev. 22: 14, but happiness itself; supposing there was not another life after this, yet that man is a happy man, that keeps in the way of his duty.

2. He shall be like a tree, fruitful and flourishing. The means of grace are here called the rivers of water, those rivers which make glad the city of our God, 46: 4. from these a good man receives supplies of strength and vigor, but in secret, undiscerned ways. His practices are the fruit, abounding to a good account, Phil. 4: 17. It is expected that those who enjoy the mercies of grace, will, both in the temper of their minds, and in the tenor of their lives, comply with the intentions of that grace, and then, to the praise of the great Vine-Dresser, they bring forth fruit in due season. His profession, here called his leaf, [as that which shows him,] shall be preserved from blemish and decay: if the Word of God rule in the heart, that will keep the profession green, both to our comfort and to our credit. Prosperity shall attend him, wherever he goes, soul-prosperity. Whatever he does, in conformity to the law, it shall prosper and succeed, to his mind, or above his hope.

In singing these vs. being duly affected with the malignant and dangerous nature of sin, and transcendent excellences of the divine law, and the power and efficacy of God's grace, from which our fruit is found, we must teach and admonish

34. 36.] 'The exemption in which blessedness is said to consist, includes an immense proportion of the elements of happiness.' MORISON.

(1.) Blessed.] 'The Hebrew word is a noun plural, "Blessings" on the man.' Cottage Bible. 'O! the felicities,' or, 'O! the prosperities of the man!' BUSH.—'The v. is a specimen of gradational parallelism, in which the secondor responsive clause so diversifies the preceding clause, as generally to rise above it, forming a sort of climax; and sometimes by a descending scale in the value of related terms and periods forming an anti-climax; but in all cases with a marked distinction of meaning. This species of parallelism is the most frequent of all: it prevails chiefly in the shorter poems, in many of the psalms, and very frequently in Is.—The exclamation with which the Ps. opens belongs equally to each line of the succeeding triplet. In the triplet itself, each line consists of three members, and the lines gradually rise one above the other, not merely in their general sense, but especially throughout the correspondent members. To walk, implies no more than casual intercourse; to stand, closer intimacy; to sit, fixed and permanent connection; the council, the ordinary place of meeting, or public resort; the way, the select and chosen footpath; the seat, the habitual and final resting place; the unrighteous, negatively wicked; sinners, positively wicked; the scorners, scoffers at the very name or notion of piety and goodness.' CRIT. BIB.

The man.] 'This is emphatic: THAT man; that one among a thousand who lives for the accomplishment of the end for which God created him.' Dr. A. CLARKE.

Verse 2.

Delight in the law.] 'It is a fine symptom of the spiritual health of the mind, when we feel that we delight in the law of the Lord, whether by that law we understand the entire revelation of God, or only its preceptive parts.' ourselves, and one another, to watch against sin and all approaches toward it, to converse much with the Word of God, and abound in the fruit of righteousness: and, in praying over them, we must seek to God for his grace both to fortify us against every evil word and work, and to furnish us for every good word and work.

V. 4—6. Here is,

1. The description of the ungodly, v. 4 they are the reverse of the righteous, both in character and condition. The LXX emphatically repeat this, not so the ungodly, they are not so; they are led by the counsel of the wicked, in the way of sinners, to the seat of the scornful; they have no delight in the law of God, and bring forth no fruit, but the grapes of Sodom: whereas the righteous are like useful, fruitful trees, they are like the chaff, the very lightest, of the floor, not capable of being put to any use; of no worth at all in God's account, how highly soever they may value themselves: light and vain, easily driven to and fro by every wind of temptation, and have no steadfastness. Would you know their end? The wrath of God will drive them away in their wickedness, as the wind does the chaff. The chaff may be, for awhile, among the wheat; but He is coming, whose fan is in his hand, and who will thoroughly purge his floor. They that by their own sin and folly make themselves as chaff, will be found so, before the whirlwind and fire of divine wrath, 35: 5. so unable to stand before it, or to escape it, Isa. 17: 13.

2. The doom of the ungodly read, v. 5. There is a judgment to come, in which every man's present character and work, though ever so artfully concealed and disguised, shall be truly and perfectly discovered, and appear in their own colors, and every man's future state will be, by an irreversible sentence, determined for eternity. The ungodly must appear in that judgment, to receive according to the things done in the body; they may hope to come off, nay, to come off with honor, but they shall not stand in the judgment; so plain will the evidence be against them, and so just and impartial the judgment upon it. They will be for ever shut out from the society of the blessed; they shall not stand in the congregation of the righteous; in the judgment, so some, with the saints, as assessors with Christ, and those holy myriads with which He shall come, Jude 14. 1 Cor. 6: 2. Or, in heaven; in the general assembly of the church of the first-born, a congregation of the righteous, of all the saints, and none but saints, and saints made perfect, 2 Thess. 2: 1.

3. The reason of this different state of the godly and wicked, v. 6. (1.) God must have all the glory of the prosperity and happiness of the righteous. They are blessed, because the Lord knows their way. (2.) Sinners must bear all the blame of their own destruction. Therefore the ungodly perish, because the very way they have chosen and resolved to walk, leads directly to destruction, and must necessarily end in it. Or, we may take it thus, The Lord is well pleased with the way of the righteous, therefore, under the influence of his gracious smiles, it shall prosper, and end well; but He is angry at the way of the wicked, therefore it shall perish, and they in it. Let this support the drooping spirits of the righteous, that the Lord knows their way, their hearts, Jer. 12: 3. their secret devotions, Matt. 6: 6. their character; and will shortly make them and their way manifest before the world, to their immortal joy and honor. Let this cast a damp on the security and jollity of sinners, that their way, though pleasant now, will perish at last.

In singing these vs. and praying over them, let us possess ourselves with a holy dread of the wicked man's portion, and deprecate it with a firm and lively expectation of the judgment to come; and stir up ourselves to prepare for it, with a holy care to approve ourselves to God in every thing, entreating his favor with our whole hearts.

Ps. II. As the foregoing Psalm was moral, and showed us our duty, so this is evangelical, and shows us our Savior. Under the type of David's kingdom, which was of divine appointment, met with much opposition, but prevailed at last, the kingdom of the Messiah, the Son of David, is prophesied of, which is the primary intention and scope of the Ps.; and I think there is less in it of the type, and more of the anti-type, than in any of the gospel-psalms, for there is nothing in it but what is applicable to Christ, but some things that are not at all applicable to David, v. 6, 7. Thou art my Son, v. 8. I will give Thee the uttermost parts of the earth, and, v. 12. Kiss the Son. It is interpreted of Christ, Acts 4: 27.—13: 33. Heb. 1: 5. This Ps. as the former, is very fitly prefixed to this book of devotions, because, as it is necessary to our acceptance with God, that we should be subject to the precepts of his law, so it is likewise, that we should be subject to the grace of his gospel, and come to Him in the name of a Mediator. Observe here,

V. 1—6. I. The mighty opposition that would be given to the Messiah and his kingdom, v. 1–3. One would have expected that so great a blessing to this world, should be universally welcomed and embraced; but never were the notions of any sect of philosophers, though ever so [pernicious, or] absurd, nor the powers of any prince or state, though ever so tyrannical, opposed with so much

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The tendency of corrupt nature is from bad to worse. None know, when they first shake off the impressions of a religious education, or venture to neglect known duty, how far they may be left to proceed. And young persons should be warned [to be unremittingly careful of every imagination even, and] not to venture aside into a path which leads to such fatal consequences: for numbers are left to wander from God, to be hardened in sin, and finally to perish. But blessed be God for his covenant of grace, and Jesus the Mediator of it: by his perfect obedience even unto death, He is become 'the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth.' Whenever the sinner becomes sensible of his guilt and misery, he may return by Christ, the living Way, and join the company of the righteous. SCOTT

Verse 6.

'When it is said, "the Lord knoweth the way of the righteous, it is but an emphatic mode of declaring that He smiles on it, that it meets his approving sanction, that it cannot, and shall not lose its gracious reward; that all its trials, temptations, responsibilities and conflicts, are naked and open to his benignant and paternal survey.' MORISON.

NOTES.

Ps. II. V. 1—3. The occasion of this Ps. might be taken from David's advancement to the throne, and his expectation of triumphing over the opposition to his authority, both of disaffected Israelites and the surrounding nations: (2 Sam. 2:4, 9. 5:) but it is throughout an evident prophecy of Christ, and repeatedly quoted as such in the N. T.; where it is ascribed to David, though his name is not prefixed to it. (Acts 4:25—28. 13:33.) SCOTT.

'Many have supposed the occasion of this Ps. is found in 2 Sam. 5: 17, 18. and this is perhaps as probable as any other conjecture, which takes it for granted, that it refers literally and principally to David, and to his inauguration. . . . But every sentence in the Ps. points, as with a line of light, to Christ and his kingdom. . . David was not anointed on Zion, but first at Bethlehem and afterwards at Hebron; nor was his kingdom so extensive or of such a kind as that here spoken of, v. 8, 9. David also warns against 'trusting in princes,' or 'in the son of man'; yet those who trust in the Prince here spoken of, are expressly said to be blessed, v. 12. The whole Ps. therefore, in its original drift, was designed to refer directly, primarily, and exclusively to the Messiah, and the things of his kingdom.' BUSH.—'In some limited sense it may refer to the settlement of David in the throne of Judah and Israel; but its principal design is to celebrate the glories of the Messiah,—to predict the triumphs of his reign,—and to foretell the impending doom of his enemies.' MORISON.—Rosenm. after having shown historically, but very conclusively, that the Ps. cannot refer to David, nor to Solomon, nor to any of the later kings of Judah or of Israel, and therefore to no one but to 'the "great King," the "Anointed" by way of distinction;' yet, strange as it may seem,—thinks, from v. 9. that 'Jesus the Savior was not present to the mind of the poet.'(!) ED.—'The structure of the Ps. is peculiar. There are evident indications of more than one speaker; and we may perhaps safely denominate it, short as it is, a sacred drama, a divine collocution, in which the Father, the Son, and some third party, probably the psalmist, moved by the Holy Ghost, are introduced, bearing their several parts.' violence, as the doctrine and government of Christ. A sign it was from heaven, for the opposition was plainly from hell originally.

1. Christ's adversaries would be princes and people, court and country; not the mighty only, but the mob, the heathen, the people, numbers, communities of them; though usually fond of liberty, yet averse to the liberty Christ came to procure and proclaim. The unbelieving Jews are here [also] called heathen, so wretchedly were they degenerated from the faith and holiness of their ancestors; they stirred up the heathen, the Gentiles, to persecute the Christians. As the Philistines and their lords, Saul and his courtiers, the disaffected party and their ringleaders, opposed David's coming to the crown; so Herod and Pilate, the Gentiles and the Jews, did their utmost against Christ and his interest in men, Acts 4: 27.

2. They muster against the Lord, and his Anointed, all religion in general, the Christian in particular. All enemies to Christ, whatever they pretend, are enemies to God; they have hated both Me and my Father, John 15: 24. The great Author of our holy religion is here called the Lord's Anointed, (Heb. Messiah, Gr. Christ,) in allusion to the anointing of David to be king: He is both authorized and qualified to be the church's Head and King; yet there are those that are against Him; nay, therefore against Him, because impatient of God's authority, envious at Christ's advancement, and rooted in enmity to the Spirit of holiness.

3. Their opposition is described. (1.) As most spiteful and malicious. They rage, fret, gnash their teeth, are vexed, uneasy, and full of indignation, so they have no enjoyment of themselves; see Luke 13: 14. John 11: 47. Acts 5: 17, 33. —19: 28. Idolaters raged at the discovery of their folly, the chief priests and Pharisees at the eclipsing of their glory, and the shaking of their usurped dominion. They that did evil, raged at the light. (2.) As deliberate and politic. They imagine, or meditate; they contrive; and are very confident of success. (3.) As resolute, obstinate [and besotted]. They set themselves, their faces as a flint, their hearts as an adamant, in defiance of reason, conscience, and all the terrors of the Lord. (4.) As combined and confederate. They counsel, assist and animate one another in this opposition; carry their resolutions, unanimously, to push on the unholy war against the Messiah with the utmost vigor: thereupon, councils are called, cabals formed, and all their wits are at work, to prevent the establishment of Christ's kingdom, 83: 5.

4. What they are exasperated at, and aim at, v. 3. They will not be governed; children of Belial, they cannot endure the yoke, at least, the yoke of the Anointed, which will restrain their corrupt appetites and passions, regulate and reform them. Christ has bands and cords for us; they that will be saved by Him, must be ruled by Him; but they are cords of a man, agreeable to right reason, and bands of love, conducive to our true interest: yet against those the quarrel is. Why do men oppose religion, but because they are impatient of its restraints and obligations? They would break asunder the bands of conscience, and the cords of God's commandments.

5. How reasonless, how hopeless, v. 1. Why oppose so just, holy, and gracious a government, supported by Omnipotence! Christ will have a church in the world, and that church shall be glorious and triumphant.

II. The conquest over all this. God sits as one easy and at rest, (v. 4.) out of the reach of all their impotent menaces and attempts: secure of the full accomplishment of his purposes and designs. The perfect repose of the Eternal Mind may be our comfort under all disquietments. Sometimes God is said to awake, and arise, and stir up Himself, for the vanquishing of his enemies; here He is said to sit still, and do it; for the utmost operations of God's omnipotence create no difficulty, nor the least disturbance to his eternal rest.

1. Christ's enemies are laughed at as fools, and justly punished, v. 5. Though God despises them as impotent, yet He does not therefore wink at them, but will make the most daring sinners to tremble before Him. They were vexations to Christ's good subjects; but the day is coming, when vexation shall be recompensed to them.

2. Their councils are turned headlong, v. 6. David was advanced to the throne, notwithstanding the malcontents in his kingdom, and particularly the affronts he received from the garrison of Zion, 2 Sam. 5: 6. The Lord Jesus is exalted to the right hand of the Father, Head over all things to the church, notwithstanding restless enemies. He is sovereign Prince in the kingdom both of providence and grace. God is pleased to call Him his King, because appointed by Him, and intrusted for Him with the sole administration of government and judgment. He is his King, as dear to the Father, and one in whom He is well-pleased. Christ took not this honor to Himself, but was called to it, and He that called Him, owns Him; I have set Him. Christ's throne is set up in his church, i. e. in the hearts of all believers, and in the societies they form. The evangelical law of Christ is said to go forth from Zion, Isa. 2: 3. Mic. 4: 2. therefore that is spoken of as the head-quarters of this General, the royal seat of this Prince, in whom men shall be joyful.

We are to sing these vs. with a holy exultation, triumphing in Jesus Christ as the great Trustee of power; and we are to pray, in firm belief of the assurance here given; 'Father in heaven, Thy kingdom come; let thy Son's kingdom come.'

V. 7—9. We have heard what the kings of the earth have to say against Christ's kingdom, and have heard it gainsaid by Him that sits in heaven; let us now hear what the Messiah Himself says to make good his claims.

I. The kingdom of the Messiah is founded on a decree, an eternal decree, of God the Father; the result of the counsels of the divine wisdom, and the determinations of the divine will, before all worlds, neither of which can be altered. The precept or statute, so some; the covenant or compact, so others; the federal transactions between the Father and the Son concerning man's redemption, represented by the covenant of royalty made with David and his seed, 89: 3. anointed King, they eventually forwarded his exaltation; and their persecution of his disciples drove numbers into remote regions, and thus greatly promoted the promulgation of the gospel. (Notes, Gen. 3:14, 15. John 11:47—53. Acts 8:4.)—After a time, the Roman legions, the executioners of divine vengeance, surrounded Jerusalem; and at length destroyed the city and temple, and subverted both their civil and ecclesiastical state, with the most dreadful miseries and destruction of the devoted Jews; the wretched remains of whom to this day, scattered throughout the nations, unwillingly attest the fulfilment of this ancient prophecy. The Roman empire too, having set itself against the cause of Christ, began directly to decline, and at length sunk in the unequal contest. (Note, Zech. 14:1—3.) The emperor Julian also, an apostate from Christianity, having undertaken to rebuild the temple and restore the Jews, was strangely baffled, and soon came to an untimely end; while the kingdom of Christ continues to this present time, in contempt and defiance of all the machinations of earth. Verses 7—9.

Christ's Sonship in this place seems mentioned as coeval with the decree, which is grounded upon it:—'Thou art my Son, therefore I make the decree, of which, in due time, this declaration shall be published.' Christ is here recognised as the Begotten of the Father, and as partaker of the divine nature and perfections as really, as any son is of the nature of him who begat him. (John 1:18. *M. We follow those who interpret it of the manifestation and public demonstration of Christ's deity by his resurrection.' ASSEMB.

feriority to the Father, by taking on Him the human nature; for, as God, He was equal in power and glory with the Father, and had nothing to ask. It supposes the making of a satisfaction, by the virtue of which, the intercession must be made, and the paying of a price, on which this large demand was to be grounded; see John 17: 4, 5. The Son, in asking the heathen for his inheritance, aims, not only at his own honor, but at their happiness in Him; so that He intercedes for them, ever lives to do so, and is therefore able to save to the uttermost. (2.) The Father will grant the kingdom. It is here promised, his government shall be [1.] Universal; He shall have, not the Jews only, but the Gentiles also. Baptized Christians are the possession of the Lord Jesus; God the Father gives them to Him, when by his Spirit and grace He works on them to submit their necks to the yoke of the Lord Jesus. This is, in part, fulfilled; a great part of the Gentile world received the Gospel, when it was first preached. But it is to be yet further accomplished, when the kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdoms of the Lord, and of his Christ, Rev. 11: 15. Who shall live when God doeth this! [2.] Victorious, v. 9. This was, in part, fulfilled, when the unbelieving, opposing Jews were destroyed by the Romans, represented, Dan. 2: 40. by feet of iron, as here by a rod of iron. It had a further accomplishment in the destruction of the Pagan powers, when the Christian religion came to be established; but it will not be completely fulfilled, till all opposing rule, principality, and power, shall be finally put down, 1 Cor. 15: 24. See 110: 5, 6.

In singing this, and praying it over, we must give glory to Christ as the eternal Son of God, and our rightful Lord, and must take comfort from this promise, and plead it with God, that the kingdom of Christ shall be enlarged and established, and shall triumph over all opposition.

V. 10—12. We have here the practical application of this gospel doctrine, concerning the kingdom of the Messiah, by way of exhortation to the kings and judges of the earth, v. 10. Those that would be truly wise, must receive instruction from the Word of God. Kings and judges stand on a level with common persons before God. What is said to them, is said to all, and is required of every one of us; only it is directed to kings and judges, because of the influence of their example on inferiors, and because rank and power opposed the setting up of Christ's kingdom, v. 2. We are exhorted,

I. To reverence God, and to stand in awe of Him, v. 11. We must serve God in all ordinances of worship, and all instances of a godly conversation, but with a holy fear, a jealousy over ourselves, and a reverence of Him. We must rejoice in God; in subordination to Him, we may rejoice in other things, but still with a holy trembling, Phil. 2: 12. Whatever we rejoice in; in this world, it must always be with trembling, lest we grow vain [and corrupt] in our joy, and be puffed up with the things we rejoice in; and because of their uncertainty, and the damp which a thousand accidents may soon cast on our joy. To rejoice with trembling, is to rejoice as though we rejoiced not.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

As this apostate world is in fact the kingdom of Satan, unconverted men of every rank, party, or character, may be excited by him, to concur in opposing the cause of God, and the kingdom of Christ. But the kings and the rulers of the earth have generally been especially instigated, by the slanders and misrepresentations of false teachers, and other interested persons, as well as by their own prejudices and passions, to combine in this opposition. (Notes, John 16:1—3. Acts 9:3—6. 26:9—11.) But their imaginations are vain, the decree of the Father has in part taken effect; and the kingdom of the Mediator shall at length universally prevail, whilst every enemy shall be dashed in pieces by his iron rod. Acts 2:30. 3:32. but also to his resurrection from the dead, as Rom. 4:24. 8:11. 1 Cor. 15:15.—The kingdom of Christ may be said, in a degree, to have commenced at the advent, yet it was not fully established till after the resurrection. At that period He might be said, in a pre-eminent sense, to have been begotten. Then the open, public announcement was made of what we may term his reigning sonship. This begetting the Son was a visible and momentous act on the part of the eternal Father, performed in the bestowment on Christ of that promised ascendency with which He was to be invested.' BUSH, principally after Hammond.—'It is manifest, this application [of the Apostle, Acts 13:32, 33.] of the clause [in the Ps.] expresses not the effecting, but the annunciation of the Messiah's sonship. The Jews themselves attest, that this Ps. was extant many ages before the birth of Jesus; and many of them allow, that it principally relates to the promised Messiah, whom they are yet vainly expecting! How can any one then be so absurdly skeptical, as to imagine that human sagacity, or mere conjecture, could have suggested explicit predictions, which should at length be verified in the most exact and circumstantial manner, by events no otherwise to be accounted for, than on scriptural principles, and by allowing them to have been effected by the power of God Himself! PSALM III.

David, amidst numerous insulting foes, firmly relies on the divine protection, 1—6. He prays for deliverance, and ascribes salvation to the Lord, 7, 8.

A Psalm of David, [a] when he fled from Absalom his son.

LORD, [b] how are they increased that trouble me! [c] many are they that rise up against me.

2 Many there be which say of my soul, There is [d] no help for him in God. [e] Selah.

is enough to make the proudest sinner miserable, if it fasten on his conscience; for it will burn to the lowest hell: one would think it should therefore follow, 'When his wrath is kindled, wo be to those that despise Him;' but the Psalmist startles at the thought, and blesses those that escape such a doom. They that trust in Him, and so kiss Him, are truly happy; but they will especially appear to be so, when the wrath of Christ is kindled against others.

In singing this, and praying it over, we should have our hearts not only filled with a holy awe of God, but borne up with a cheerful confidence in Christ, in whose mediation we may comfort and encourage ourselves and one another; We are the circumcision, that rejoice in Christ Jesus.

Ps. III. As the foregoing Ps. in the type of David in preferment, showed us the royal dignity of the Redeemer; so this, by the example of David in distress, shows us the peace and holy security of the redeemed. Those speak best of the truths of God, who speak experimentally; so David here speaks of the power and goodness of God, and of the safety and tranquillity of the godly.

V. 1—3. The title of this Ps. and many others, is as a key to open it; when we know on what occasion a Ps. was penned, we know the better how to expound it. This was composed, or meditated, when David fled from Absalom his son. See 2 Sam. 15. &c. 1. David was now in great grief; when, in his flight, he went up the Mount of Olives, he wept greatly, with his head covered, and bare-foot; yet then he composed this comfortable Ps. 2. He was now in great danger, his affairs seemed at the last extremity; yet then he kept hold of his interest in God, and improved that. Perils and frights should drive us to God, not from Him. 3. He was now greatly provoked by those, from whom he had reason to expect better things; this he could not but resent, yet he had calmness enough for devotion. The sedateness of his mind was evinced by the Spirit's coming on him; let no unkindness, no, not of a child or a friend, ever be laid so much to heart as to unfit us for communion with God. 4. He was now suffering for his sin in the matter of Uriah, 2 Sam. 12: 11. which, no doubt, he observed, and took occasion thence to renew his repentance. Yet he did not therefore despair of succor. Even our sorrow for sin must not hinder either our joy, or our hope, in God. 5. He seemed cowardly in fleeing from Absalom, and quitting his royal city, before he had had one struggle for it; yet, by this Ps. it appears, he was full of true courage arising from his faith in God. True Christian fortitude consists more in a gracious security and serenity of mind, in patient bearing, and patient waiting, than in daring enterprises with sword in hand.

In these three vs. he applies himself to God. Whither else should we go, when any thing grieves or frightens us? David was now at a distance from where he used to pray; yet he could find a way open heaven-ward. Wherever we are, and whithersoever driven, we may draw nigh to God. David, in his flight, attends his God,

I. With a representation of his distress, v. 1, 2. That his enemies,

1. Were very many; Absalom's faction, like a snow-ball, strangely gathered in its motion. He speaks of it as one amazed; and well he might. How slippery and deceitful are the many! And how little fidelity and constancy is to be found among men! David had had the hearts of his subjects, as much as ever any king had, yet now, of a sudden, he had lost them. Christ, the Son of David, had many enemies, when a great multitude came to seize Him, when the crowd cried, Crucify him, Crucify him. Even good people must not think it strange, if the stream be against them, and grow more and more formidable.

2. That they were very malicious; they said of his soul, There is no help for him in God. I. e. (1.) They put a spiteful, invidious construction on his troubles, as Job's friends did on his; concluding that, because his servants and subjects forsook him thus, God had deserted him, and he was therefore to be looked on as a hypocrite, and a wicked man. (2.) They blasphemously reflected on God, as unable to relieve him. It is strange, so great unbelief should be found in any, especially in many, in Israel. (3.) They endeavored to shake his confidence in God, and drive him to despair of relief from Him. 'They have said it to my soul;' so it may be read; compare 11: 1.—40: 10. This grieved him worst of all. The mere temptation was a buffeting to him. Note, A child of God startles at the very thought of despairing of help in God. David comes to God, and tells Him what his enemies said of him, as Hezekiah spread Rabshakeh's blasphemous letter before the Lord. To this complaint he adds Selah, which occurs about 70 times in the book of Ps. Some refer it to the music with which, in David's time, the Pss were sung; others to the sense, and that it is a note commanding a solemn pause. Selah, Mark

NOTES.

Ps. III. Title. These titles are found in the Heb. though, it is said, several are wanting in some MSS. They seem however, in general, to belong to the Ps. to which they are prefixed, and to be of the same authority with them. In this and other instances, they are useful in fixing the interpretation: but often their meaning is to us doubtful or difficult. SCOTT.

'It is hardly to be supposed David penned this Ps. in his flight, as he went up Mt. Olivet, though it is not improbable the leading sentiments of it may have formed the substance of his prayer, as he came to the top of the mount. . . . It is an effusion every way worthy of the heart and pen of David; instinct with piety towards God, and the loftiest magnanimity towards his enemies. Compare it with the vindictive ebullition which the great dramatic poet puts into the mouth of Lear, under somewhat similar circumstances; and how does the meek and lamb-like gentleness of the one contrast with the fell and fiery malignity of the other!

A psalm.] 'A three-fold designation is given, in the original, to the sacred songs contained in this book, psalm, hymn and song, canticle, or ode; all are mentioned, Eph. 5:19. The word rendered psalm, signifies in its root, to cut off, to prune, and may indicate the character of metrical language in Heb. poetry, as cut into short sentences, and pruned of every redundance of expression; whereas prose composition is loose, free and irregular, like a wild tree luxuriating on every side in its leaves and branches. Some have supposed the cutting implied in the term, had reference rather to sounds of the voice, or instrument with which the psalm was played or sung; but this is supported by no adequate authority. The peculiarity on which the word is founded, doubtless pertains to the structure of the v. and not to the methods of its recitation, or cantillation.

Of David.] 'Or, TO David; the former indicates David to be the author; the latter, that he only received it, as an amanuensis, from the Holy Spirit, which was an opinion of some of the older commentators. See Acts 4:24, 25. The reader must be left to choose between the two.' BUSH.

Increased.] 'The parallel history, 2 Sam. 15:12. throws light on this expression.' ID.

Verse 2.

'Selah,' occurs three times in this Ps. frequently in others, and also in the prophecy of Habakkuk; its meaning is not fully ascertained: some entirely omit it: but this may be thought taking an unwarrantable liberty with Scripture. The Sept. seem to have understood it to be merely a musical term, a change of song, or melody In general, however, it appears to have been used, as a call on him who read or sang, to pause and reflect; as something peculiarly important or surprising had been mentioned. SCOTT.—Of my soul.] 'To my soul, with which agrees the rendering of the Sept. as if the address were made directly and personally to David.—No help.] 'The original is peculiarly significant, intimating the entire, utter and absolute hopelessness of David's condition. The same peculiarity of phrase is to be noted, Ps. 44:27. 92:16.'—Selah.] 'The result of all our investigations in respect to this word affords nothing conclusive.' BUSH.—'That this word [selah] is used nowhere but in this book of Pss. and in Habakkuk, makes it probable that it was a musical note.' POOLE.—'Let a man peruse all the places where this word [selah] occurs, and he will be put to it, perchance, to find, in the importance of the passages, any good reason for the use of it in those passages, and not elsewhere. I think it safest to let it pass as a musical note.' Assemb. Ann.—'The Chald. sometimes tr. it by a word which signifies—for ever.' Dr. A. Clarke. ED.

Verse 3.

My glory.] 'Or, honor, a word which in the original conveys the idea of weightiness, an import alluded to, 2 Cor. 4:17.'—Lifter up, &c.]

crown his own interest both in the world, and in the hearts of his people.

V. 4—8. David here reflects on the benefit he had derived from trusting in God, and looks forward with pleasing expectations of a very bright and happy issue to the dark dispensation he was now under.

I. See with what comfort he looks back on the communion he had had with God, and the communications of his favor, either in some former troubles he had been in, and, through God's goodness, got through, or, in this, hitherto.

He now remembered, with pleasure,

1. That in all his troubles, difficulties and dangers, he had always been enabled to lift up his heart and voice to God, v. 4. Care and grief do us good and no hurt, when they set us a praying, as those in earnest. And though God understands the language of the heart, when the voice is not heard, 1 Sam. 1: 13. and values not the hypocritical prayers of those who cause their voice to be heard on high, Isa. 58: 4. yet when the earnestness of the voice comes from the fervency of the heart, it shall be noticed.

2. That he had always found God ready to answer his prayers; He heard me out of his holy hill, from heaven, and from the ark on mt. Zion, whence He used to answer those that sought Him. David had ordered Zadok to carry back the ark into the city, when flying from Absalom, 2 Sam. 15: 25. knowing that, notwithstanding the distance of place, he could by faith receive answers of peace; nothing can fix a gulf between God's favor to us, and our faith in Him. The ark of the covenant was in mt. Zion, and all the answers to our prayers come from the promises of that covenant; Christ was set King upon the holy hill of Zion, 2: 6. and it is through Him, whom the Father hears always, that our prayers are heard.

3. That he had always been very safe, and very easy, under the divine protection, v. 5. (1.) This is applicable to the common mercies of every night, which we ought to give thanks for alone, and with our families, every morning. Many have not where to lay their head, but we have laid us down in peace. Many lie down, and cannot sleep, but we lie down, and sleep in safety, though incapable of doing any thing then for our own preservation. Many lie down, and sleep, and never wake again, but we lie down, and sleep, and awake again to the light and comfort of another day; and whence is it, but because the Lord has sustained us with sleep as with food? (2.) It seems here to be meant of the wonderful quietness and calmness of David's spirit, in the midst of his dangers. Having by prayer committed himself and his cause to God, and being sure of his protection, his heart was fixed, and he was easy. The undutifulness of his son, the disloyalty of his subjects, the treachery of many of his friends, the hazard of his person, the fatigues of his march, and the uncertainty of the event, never deprived him of an hour's sleep, nor gave any disturbance to his repose; for the Lord, by his grace and the consolations of his Spirit, powerfully sustained him, and made him easy. It is a great mercy, when in trouble, to have our minds stayed on God, so as never either to eat or sleep with trembling and astonishment. (3.) Some of the ancients apply it to the resurrection of Christ; the Lord sustained Him, that He should not see corruption.

4. That God had often broken the power, and restrained the malice, of his enemies, v. 7. Saul and the Philistines, who were sometimes ready to swallow him up, could not effect what they designed. The teeth that are gnashed or sharpened against God's people, shall be broken. When, at any time, the power of the church's enemies seems threatening, it is good to remember how often God has broken it; and we are sure his arm is not shortened.

II. See with what confidence he looks forward to the dangers he had yet in prospect.

1. His fears were all stilled and silenced, v. 6. With what a holy bravery does he bid defiance to the impotent menaces and attempts of his enemies! No man seemed less safe, yet no man was more secure. When, in his flight from Absalom, he bade Zadok carry back the ark, he spake doubtfully of the issue of his present troubles, and concluded, that, or, 'Stop there, and consider a little.' As here, they say, There is no help for him in God, Selah. 'Take time for such a thought as this, Get thee behind me, Satan; The Lord rebuke thee! Away with such a vile suggestion!'

II. With a profession of his dependence on God, v. 3. An active believer, the more he is beaten off from God, either by providential rebukes, or the reproaches of enemies, the closer will he cleave to Him; so David here. See what God is to his people, what He will be, what they have found Him, what David found in Him. 1. Safety. 'Thou art a Shield for me, a Shield about me,' so some, 'to secure me on all sides, since my enemies surrounded me.' 2. Honor; Thou art my Glory. Those whom God owns for his, are not only safe and easy, but really have true honor, far above what the great ones of the earth are proud of. David was now in disgrace, but he will not think the worse of himself, while he has God for his Glory, Isa. 60: 19. 'Thou art my Glory; thy glory I reckon mine;' (so some;) 'this is what I aim at, whatever my lot is, and whatever becomes of my honor—that I may be to my God for a name and a praise.' 3. Joy and deliverance; 'Thou art the Lifter up of my head; out of my troubles, to restore me to my dignity again, in due time; under my troubles, so that I shall not droop nor be discouraged.' If, in the worst of times, God's people can lift up their heads with joy, knowing that all shall work for good to them, they will own, it is God that gives them both cause and hearts to rejoice.

In singing this, and praying it over, we should possess ourselves with an apprehension of the danger we are in from the multitude and malice of our spiritual enemies, who seek the ruin of our souls by driving us from God, and we should concern ourselves in the distresses and dangers of the church of God, which is every where spoken against, nay, fought against; but, in reference to both, we should encourage ourselves in our God who owns and protects, and will, in due time,

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

All true Christians should avow their confidence in God, and be open and avowed, as well as fervent, in their prayers unto Him. Thus they will enjoy safety and inward peace, in the midst of enemies and the alarms of war: for the Lord will hear and sustain them; and what are ten thousands of armed foes encamped against those whom the Omnipotent protecteth? (2 Chr. 32: 8. Rom. 8:28—31.)—Past experience should encourage the hope of future answers to our prayers; we may even rejoice in being the objects of the enmity of ungodly men; and should desire that they may be deprived of their power to do mischief, but not that any further harm may befall them: and every temporal deliverance should be received as an earnest of eternal salvation.—But we shall cease to wonder at the troubles of the king of Israel, and almost to think of our own light afflictions, if we duly look unto Jesus, and contrast his glory and his grace, with the contempt and cruelty with which He was treated. Having yielded to death, He sanctified the grave, and became the First-fruits of the resurrection; his head was then lifted up above his enemies; and thus He has opened the kingdom of heaven to all believers.

like an humble penitent, Here I am, let Him do to me what seemeth Him good, 2 Sam. 15: 26. But now, like a strong believer, he speaks confidently, and has no fear concerning the event. Note, A cheerful resignation to God is the way to obtain a cheerful satisfaction and confidence in God.

2. His prayers were quickened and encouraged, v. 7. He believed God was his Savior, yet prays; nay, he therefore prays, Arise, O Lord, save me, O my God. Promises of salvation do not supersede, but engage, our petitions for it. He will for this be inquired of.

3. His faith became triumphant. He began the psalm with complaints of the strength and malice of his enemies; but concludes it with exultation in the power and grace of his God, and now sees more with him than against him, v. 8. Two great truths he here builds his confidence on, and fetches comfort from. (1.) The Lord has power to save, be the danger ever so great; it is his prerogative, his pleasure, his property, his promise to those that are his, whose salvation is not of themselves, but of the Lord. (2.) His blessing is on his people; He has, in his Word, pronounced a blessing on them; and we are bound to believe, that that blessing does accordingly rest on them, though there are not the visible effects of it.

In singing this, and praying it over, we must own the satisfaction we have had in depending on God, and committing ourselves to Him, and encourage ourselves, and one another, to continue still hoping, and quietly waiting for, the salvation of the Lord.

Ps. IV. Many of David's Pss. are doctrinal and practical, as well as devotional: the greatest part of this Ps. is so. The title does not tell us it was penned on any particular occasion, nor are we to think all the Pss. occasional, but many general, to instruct the people, who attended in the courts of his house, assist their devotions, and direct their conversations: such a one I take this psalm to be.

V. 1—5. For an account of the modelling of the several classes of singers, each with a chief, and the share each bore in the work, see 1 Chr. 25: &c. Some prophesied according to the order of the king, v. 2. Others with the harp, to give thanks, and to praise the Lord, v. 3. Others lifted up the horn, v. 5. But all were for song in the house of the Lord, (v. 6.) and instructed in the songs of the Lord, v. 7. Neginoth signifies Stringed instruments, Hab. 3: 19. played on with the hand; with music of that kind the choristers were to sing this Ps.: and it should seem that then they only sung, not the people; but the N. T. appoints all Christians to sing, (Eph. 5: 19. Col. 3: 16.) from whom it is expected that they do it decently, if not skilfully; therefore there is not now so much occasion for musical instruments as then; the melody is to be made in the heart. In these vs. David addresses himself,

1. To God, v. 1. 'Lord, have mercy upon me, and hear me.' The experience we have had of God's goodness in enlarging us when in distress, is not only a great encouragement to our faith and hope for the future, but a good plea with God in prayer; 'Thou hast; wilt Thou not? For Thou art God, and changest not; thy work is perfect.'

II. To men, for their conviction and conversion.

1. He endeavors to convince them of the folly of their impiety, v. 2. 'O ye sons of men,' of great men, so some; understanding it of the partisans of Saul or Absalom: Or, it may be taken more generally; God, by the psalmist, here reasons with sinners to bring them to repentance. (1.) 'You debase yourselves, for you are sons of men;' and the word signifies man as a noble creature. Let the sons of men consider and show themselves men. (2.) 'You dishonor your Maker, and turn his glory into shame.' They may well be taken as God's own words, charging sinners with the wrong they do Him in his honor: or, if David's words, glory may be understood of God, whom he called his Glory, 3: 3. Idolaters are charged with changing the glory of God into shame, Rom. 1: 23. All wilful sinners do so, by disobeying the commands of his law, despising the offers of his grace, and giving that affection and service to the creature, which are due to God only. (3.) 'You cheat yourselves, you love vanity, and seek after leasing, or lying, or that which is a lie. You are yourselves vain and lying, and you love to be so.' Or, 'You set your hearts on that which will prove, at last, but vanity and a lie: the world, and the delights of sense; for these will deceive, and so ruin you. How long will you do this? Will you never be wise for yourselves, never consider your duty and interest? When shall it once be?' God thinks the time long that sinners persist in dishonoring Him, and in deceiving and ruining themselves.

2. He shows them the peculiar favor God has for good people, v. 3. This comes in here, (1.) As a reason why they should not oppose or persecute him that is godly, or think to run him down. It is generally supposed David speaks of his own designation to the throne; he is the godly man, whom the Lord has set apart for that honor, and who does not usurp it, or assume it to himself God has, in like manner, set apart the Lord Jesus for Himself; and all attempts against Him will certainly be baffled. Or, (2.) As a reason why they should themselves be good, and walk no longer in the counsel of the ungodly; 'You have hitherto sought vanity; be truly religious, and you will be truly happy, here and for ever; for,' [1.] 'God will secure to Himself his interest in you.' The Lord has set apart every particular godly man, for Himself, in his eternal choice, in his effectual calling, in the special disposals of his providence, and operations of his grace; they are purified unto Him a peculiar people. Let godly people know it, and let them never alienate themselves from Him to whom they are thus appropriated; let wicked people know it, and take heed how they hurt those whom God protects. [2.] 'God will secure to you an interest in Himself;' this David speaks with application; The Lord will hear when I call unto Him. We should think ourselves happy, if we had the ear of an earthly prince; and is it not worth while, on any terms, especially such easy ones, to gain the ear of the King of kings? Let us know

Ps. IV. 'Th] Heb. interpreters, unanimously, and most of our own, make this Ps. synchronical with Ps. 3. and refer it to the time of Absalom's usurpation. Verse 2.

My glory.] David might have considered his throne as a special honor to him, seeing he was called to it by the immediate choice of God, and as a type of the Messiah: but the Lord Himself, and his relation to Him, were indeed 'his Glory.' (3:3—5.) ID.

Verses 3—5.

The piety of David evinced, that he was the object of the Lord's special choice and favor; who, having advanced him to the throne, as 'the man after his own heart,' would certainly establish his kingdom. His prayers would therefore surely be heard, and that would involve the ruin of all his enemies. Of this he solemnly reminded them, and exhorted them to take heed what they did; to repent of their sins, to examine their own hearts, to hearken to the voice of conscience, to court retirement, to pause and reflect on their conduct; to bring the appointed sacrifices, with repentance, faith, and piety; and thus to cast themselves on the mercy of God, and trust in Him for forgiveness and salvation.—Godly. (3) Also, merciful, beneficent, upright, holy. 18:26. 86:2. 145:17.—Stand in awe. (4) From a word sign. says Robertson, To be put into vehement commotion. ID.

I. In singing these vs. we must preach to ourselves the doctrine of the provoking nature of sin, the lying vanity of the world, and the unspeakable happiness of God's people; and we must press on ourselves the duties of fearing God, conversing with our own hearts, and offering spiritual sacrifices; in praying over these vs. we must beg of God grace thus to think, and thus to do.

V. 6—8. We have here,

1. The foolish wish of worldly people. What good they meant, is intimated, v. 7. All they desired was plenty of the wealth of this world, that they might enjoy abundance of the delights of sense. Thus far they are right, to desire good, and be solicitous about it; but here three things are amiss, 1. They do not apply themselves to God, who alone can make us happy; so they expose themselves to be ill-advised, and show they would rather be beholden to any than to God, for they would willingly live without Him. 2. They inquire for good that may be seen, seeming, sensible good; not the good things out of sight, which are objects of faith only: as we must be taught to worship an unseen God, so to seek an unseen good, 2 Cor. 4:18. 3. They inquire for any good, not for the chief good; all they want is outward, present, partial good, good meat, good drink, a good trade, and a good estate. Any good will serve the turn of most men, but a gracious soul will not be put off so.

II. The wise choice godly people make. David, and the pious few that adhered to him, dissented from that wish, and joined in this prayer, Lord, lift Thou up the light of thy countenance upon us. God had set him apart for Himself by distinguishing favors, therefore he sets himself apart by a distinguishing character. 'Any good will not serve my turn; the wealth of the world will never make a portion for my soul, therefore I cannot take up with it.' He and his friends agree in their choice of God's favor as their felicity; that is it which, in their account, is better than life and all the comforts of life. That is it which,

1. They most earnestly desire and seek after: this is the breathing of their souls. Good people, as they are distinguished by their practices, so by their prayers, not their length and language, but their faith and fervency; 'Lord, let us have thy favor, and let us know that we have it, and we desire no more; that is enough to make us happy.' Observe, Though David speaks of himself only, in vs. 7, 8. he speaks, in this prayer, for others also, 'upon us,' as Christ taught us to pray, 'Our Father.' All the saints come to the throne of grace on the same errand, and in this they are one, they all desire God's favor as their chief good.

2. In which, above any thing, they rejoice, v. 7. When God puts grace, He puts gladness in the heart; nor is any joy comparable to that which gracious souls have in the communications of the divine favor. 'Thou hast given;' so the word is. True joy is God's gift, not as the world giveth, John 14: 27. The saints have no reason to envy carnal worldlings their mirth and joy, but should pity them rather, for they may know better, and will not.

3. Which they entirely confide in, and in that confidence are always easy, v. 8. He had laid him down, and slept, 3: 5. so he will still. If he have the light of God's countenance, (1.) He can enjoy himself. His soul returns to God, and reposes itself in Him as its Rest, so he lays him down, and sleeps in peace. (2.) He fears no disturbance from enemies, sleeps quiet, and is very secure, because God Himself has undertaken to keep him safe. When he comes to die, he will then, with good old Simeon, depart in peace, assured God will receive his soul, to be safe with Himself, and that his body also shall be made to dwell in safety in the grave. (3.) He commits all his affairs to God, and contentedly leaves the issue of them with Him, as the husbandman the seed he has sown, Mark 4: 26, 27. So a good man, having, by faith and prayer, cast his care on God, sleeps and rests night and day, and is very easy, leaving it to his God to perform all things for him, and prepared to welcome his holy will.

In singing these vs. and praying over them, let us, with a holy contempt of the wealth and pleasure of this world, as insufficient to make us happy, earnestly seek the favor of God, and pleasingly solace ourselves in that favor; and, with a holy this, and forsake lying vanities for our own mercies.

3. He warns them against sin, and exhorts them both to frighten and to reason themselves out of it, v. 4. 'Stand in awe and sin not;' 'Be angry and sin not,' so the LXX, and some think the apostle takes that exhortation from him, Eph. 4: 26. 'commune with your own hearts. Be converted; and, in order thereunto, consider and fear.' Note, One good remedy against sin is to stand in awe. 'Be moved,' so some, in opposition to carelessness and carnal security. 'Always keep up a holy reverence of the glory and majesty of God, and a holy dread of his wrath and curse, and dare not to provoke Him.' One good mean of preserving a holy awe, is, to be frequent and serious in communing with our own hearts. A thinking man is in a fair way to be a wise and a good man. 'Commune with your hearts; examine them by serious self-reflection; employ them in solemn, pious meditations; consider your ways, and observe the directions here given, in order to the doing of this work well and to good purpose.' (1.) 'Choose a solitary time; do it when awake on your beds; before you go to sleep at night,' as some of the heathen moralists have directed; 'examine your consciences with respect to what you have done that day, particularly what you have done amiss, that you may repent of it. When you awake in the night, meditate on God, and the things that belong to your peace.' David himself practised what he here counsels others to do, 63: 6. On a sick-bed particularly we should consider our ways, and commune with our own hearts about them. (2.) 'Compose yourselves into a serious frame; Be still. When you have asked conscience a question, be silent, and wait for an answer.'

4. He counsels them to make conscience of their duty, v. 5. We must not only cease to do evil, but learn to do well. They that were disaffected to David and his government, would soon come to a better temper, and return to their allegiance, if they would but worship God aright: and those that know the concerns that lie between them and God, will be glad of the Mediator, the Son of David. It is required here from every one of us, (1.) That we serve Him; Offer ourselves first, and our best sacrifices: they must be sacrifices of righteousness; all the fruits of the reigning love of God and our neighbor, and all the instances of a religious conversation, which are better than all burnt-offerings and sacrifices. The sacrifices of the unrighteous are an abomination, Isa. 1: 11, &c. (2.) That we confide in Him. 'First offer the sacrifices of righteousness, then you are welcome to trust in the Lord.'

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The servants of God, when distressed, call upon Him with confidence; and neither have nor desire any other plea, than his free mercy. [Note, Job 22:2.]—In proportion as we are conscious of devotedness to God, we have evidence that we are chosen and 'set apart by Him,' to show forth his praises and enjoy his love. Instead then of reviling our slanderers, we should warn them and expostulate with them, and invite them to seek a share in our happiness.—In every thing we ought to use means, and attend to the ordinances and commandments of God; but after all we must place our whole dependence on his mercy and grace.—Let worldly men know, that the true Christian has found that good, which they are in vain inquiring after: whilst he enjoys peace and communion with God, he envies not their wealth or indulgence. But, as salvation is in Christ alone, where will they appear, who despise his personal and mediatorial glory, refuse to have Him to reign over them, and revile Him in his disciples? SCOTT.

Verse 6.

Who will, &c.] The uncertainty of men concerning the nature of happiness, in what it consists, and where it is to be found, is strikingly shown in the numerous and discordant opinions of the more philosophical heathens about the CHIEF GOOD. SCOTT.—Many.] 'Either, 1. Of his own followers, who are weary of waiting on God and ready to despair. Or rather, 2. Of his enemies, even of the people who were either engaged against him, or at least unconcerned for him, and sought their own ease and advantage.' POOLE.—'Not, as many think, David's enemies; as if they would see some indication of his overthrow; but his friends, who, now that he was a fugitive, despaired of his affairs.' ROSENM.—'David's visible strength and military preparation were so small, comparatively with those of his enemies, that they that looked on, were ready to despair of victory; . . . so David here opposes to those fearful objectors the favor of God, as a banner or ensign that hath a whole army belonging to it, i. e. all security attending it.' HAMMOND.—'The word any is a supplement, and weakens the force of the question. It is simply, "who will show us good."' MORISON.—Good.] 'Worldly good, as appears by the opposition of the light of God's countenance to it in the next words, and by the explication of it of corn and wine in the next v.' POOLE.—Light of thy countenance.] 'I have no doubt allusion is made to the bright symbol of Jehovah's presence, which stood on the mercy-seat between the cherubim of glory.' MORISON.—Roberts notes such expressions as common still in the E. to signify the countenance and favor of a great man; the hiding of whose face, or turning it away, greatly chagrins a dependent or applicant. PSALM V.

David prays, and purposes to persist in prayer, 1—3. He shows that God abhors the wicked, 4—6. He professes hope in God's mercy; and entreats his guidance, because of the malice of his enemies, 7—9. He predicts that the wicked will be destroyed, and the righteous made prosperous and joyful, 10—12.

indifferency about the issue of all our wordly concerns, let us commit ourselves and all our affairs to the conduct and custody of the Divine Providence, and be satisfied that all shall be made to work for good to us, if we keep ourselves in the love of God.

Ps. V. This Ps. is a prayer, at a time when the psalmist was in distress from the malice of his enemies; many such times passed over David, nay, there was scarcely any time of his life to which this Ps. may not be accommodated; for in this he was a type of Christ, continually beset with enemies; and his powerful and prevalent appeals to God, when so beset, pointed at Christ's dependence on his Father, and triumphs over the powers of darkness, in the midst of his sufferings. It is all of great use to direct us in prayer.

V. 1—6. Nehiloth is a word nowhere else used. It is conjectured, (and it is but a conjecture,) that it signifies wind-instruments, with which this psalm was sung, as Neginoth was supposed to signify the stringed-instruments. In these vs. David had an eye to God,

I. As a prayer-hearing God; such He has always been, and He is still as ready to hear prayer as ever. Observe how David here styles Him, Lord, v. 1, 3. Jehovah, a self-existent, self-sufficient Being, my King and my God. v. 2. The most commanding, encouraging principle of prayer, and the most powerful, prevailing plea in prayer is, that He is our King and our God, whom we lie under peculiar obligations to, and whom we have peculiar expectations from.

1. What David here prays for, may encourage our faith and hopes, in all our addresses to God. If we pray fervently, and in faith, we have reason to hope, (1.) That God will take cognizance of our case, our representation of it, and our requests upon it; for so he prays here; Give ear to my words, O Lord. (2.) That He will not slight it, or turn it off with a cursory answer; for so he prays, Consider my meditation. David's prayers were not his words only, but his meditations; meditation and prayer should go together, 19: 14. It is when we thus consider our prayers, and then only, that we may expect God will consider them, and take that to his heart which comes from ours. (3.) That He will, in due time, return a gracious answer of peace: for so he prays, v. 2. Hearken to the voice of my cry. His prayer was a cry, which denotes fervency, and importunity; such effectual, fervent prayers of a righteous man avail much.

2. David here promises four things, as the condition on his part to be fulfilled, that he might obtain this gracious acceptance: this may guide and govern us in addresses to God, that we may present them aright; for we ask, and have not, if we ask amiss. (1.) That he will make conscience of prayer, and a business of it; unto Thee will I pray. God's assurances of his readiness to hear prayer, should confirm our resolution to live and die praying. (2.) He will pray in the morning; morning-prayer is especially our duty; we are then fittest for prayer, when in the most fresh, and lively, and composed frame, clear of the slumbers of the night, revived by them, and not yet filled with the business of the day. We have then most need of prayer, considering the dangers and temptations of the day to which we are exposed, and against which we are concerned, by faith and prayer, to fetch in fresh supplies of grace. (3.) He will have his eye single, and his heart intent, in the duty; I will direct my prayer, as a marksman directs his arrow; with such a fixedness and steadiness of mind: Or, as we direct a letter to a friend at such a place. All our prayers must be directed to God, through our Lord Jesus Christ; and then, when God and his honor and glory are our highest aim, they will not miscarry. (4.) He will patiently wait an answer of peace, will look up, 85: 8. Hab. 2: 1. We must look up, or look out, as he that has shot an arrow looks to see how near it has come to the mark. We lose much of the comfort of our prayers, for want of observing their returns. Thus praying, thus waiting, as the lame man, Acts 3: 4. we may expect God will hear and consider our words.

II. As a sin-hating God, v. 4—6. David notices this, 1. As a warning to himself, and all other praying people, to remember that, as the God with whom we have to do is gracious and merciful, so He is pure and holy, 66: 18. 2. As an encouragement to his prayers against his enemies; as wicked, and therefore enemies to God, and such as He had no pleasure in. See here,

(1.) The holiness of God's nature; when he says, Thou art not a God that has pleasure in wickedness, he means, 'Thou art a God that hates it, as directly contrary to thine infinite purity and rectitude, and holy will.' Dr. Hammond thinks this refers to that law of Moses, which would not permit strangers, who persisted in their idolatry, to dwell in the land of Israel.

(2.) The justice of his government; The foolish shall not stand in his sight, shall not be smiled upon by Him, nor admitted to attend on Him, nor be acquitted in the judgment of the great day. The workers of iniquity are very foolish. Wicked people hate God, justly therefore may they be said to be hated of Him, and it will be their endless misery and ruin.

Two sorts of sinners are here marked for destruction. [1.] The lying, and deceitful; on which is laid particular emphasis, Rev. 21: 8. All liars, and ch. 22: 15. Whosoever loves and makes a lie; nothing is more contrary than this, and therefore nothing more hateful, to the God of truth. [2.] The cruel; for inhumanity is no less contrary, no less hateful, to the God of mercy, whom mercy pleases. Liars and murderers are in a particular manner said to resemble the devil, and to be his children, therefore it may well be expected God should abhor them. These were the characters of David's enemies; and such as these are still the enemies of Christ and his church; the worse they are, the surer we may be of their ruin in due time.

In singing these vs. and praying them over, we must engage and stir up ourselves to the duty of prayer, and encourage ourselves in it, because we shall not seek the Lord in vain; and must express our detestation of sin, and our awful expectation of that day of Christ's appearing, which will be the day of the perdition of ungodly men.

V. 7—12. In these vs. David gives three characters; of himself, of his enemies, and of all the people of God; and subjoins a prayer to each.

I. Of himself, v. 7, 8. 1. Sinners go away from

Ps. V. 'The ancient Hebrew interpreters make this a Ps. of David against Doeg and Ahithophel. Some refer it to the time of Saul, but others, and most, to that of Absalom's sedition; and then they consider it as levelled at the leaders under him.' ROSENM.

Title.] Some suppose 'Nehiloth' implies, that the Ps. was sung in parts. SCOTT. 'Nehiloth. An eminent musical instrument; so lexicographers. According to one derivation, it may have resembled, in its sound, the murmurs of a stream, or the hum of bees; or, according to another, it may have been a hollow wind-instrument, as a pipe, or flute or, timbrel. And it indicates succession, i. e. in the performance of the parts. Hence the LXX. render it an inheritor, and so the Vulg. Arab. and Æthiopic, all which must be conceived to have rendered it intelligibly. To this agree also the ancient translators. But more probably, as Kimchi on Nichiloth, Ps. III. it is the name of a tune, derived from some word signifying heritage, or the like.' HAMMOND.

It is not evident, whether this Ps. was composed during Absalom's rebellion, or while David was persecuted by Saul: but the latter seems most probable.—The word rendered 'meditation,' appears to denote those inward thoughts, desires, fears, or sorrows, which break forth in earnest prayers, or are relieved by complaining unto God, and by pouring out the heart before him. God, but he is steadfastly resolved to keep close to God and to his worship. God's holiness and justice are so far from being a terror, to drive the upright in heart from God, that they rather invite them to cleave to Him. David was much in secret worship, prayed often alone, (v. 2, 3.) yet was very constant and devout in attendance on the sanctuary. The duties of the closet are designed to prepare us for, not excuse us from, public ordinances. He worshipped God reverently, and with a due sense of the infinite distance between God and man; 'In thy fear will I worship,' Heb. 12: 28. He would take his encouragement, in worship, from God Himself only; from his infinite mercy, and not in any merit or righteousness of his own: the mercy of God should ever be the foundation both of our hopes, and of our joy, in every thing wherein we have to do with Him: From the instituted medium of worship, here called the temple of his holiness, as a type of Christ, the great and only Mediator, who sanctifies the service, as the temple sanctified the gold, and to whom we must have an eye in all our devotions, as they then had to the temple. 2. He earnestly prays God, by his grace, to guide and preserve him always in the way of his duty, v. 8. Because of mine enemies, Heb. 'Because of those which observe me, which watch for my halting, and seek occasion against me.' See here, (1.) The good use David made of the malice of his enemies against him, to be the more cautious to avoid sin and all appearances of it, and the more solicitous to be always found in the good way of God and duty. Thus, by wisdom and grace, good may come out of evil. (2.) The right course David took to baffle those who sought occasion against him; committing himself to the divine guidance, both by providence and by grace, so that his enemies, like Daniel's, might find no occasion against him. The way of our duty is here called God's way and his righteousness, because He prescribes to us by his just and holy laws, which if we sincerely set before us as our rule, we may in faith beg of God to direct us in all particular cases. How this prayer of David's was answered to him, see 1 Sam. 18: 14, 15.

II. Of his enemies, v. 9, 10. 1. If his account of them be true, as, no doubt, it is, they had a very bad character. He had spoken, v. 6. of God's hating the bloody and deceitful man; 'Now, Lord,' says he, 'that is the character of my enemies: they are deceitful; there is no trusting them, for there is no faithfulness in their mouth.' 'They flatter with their tongues, to cover their malice, and to gain their point the more securely. They are likewise bloody, for their throat is an open sepulchre, cruel as the grave, gaping to devour and to swallow up; insatiable as the grave, which never says, 'It is enough,' Prov. 30: 15, 16. This is quoted, Rom. 3: 13. to show the general corruption of mankind, for they are all naturally prone to malice, Tit. 3: 3. The grave is opened for them all, and yet they are as open graves to one another. 2. If his prayer against them be heard, as, no doubt, it is, they are in a bad condition. He prays God to destroy them, according to what he had said, v. 6. to cast them out of his protection and favor, out of his heritage, out of the land of the living. Their sins deserve destruction Persecuting God's servants, fills the measure as soon as any thing, 1 Thess. 2: 15, 16. Nay, they may be easily made to fall by their own counsels; that which they do, to secure themselves, and do mischief to others, by the over-ruling providence of God, may be made the means of their destruction, 7: 15.—9: 15. He pleads, 'They have rebelled against thee: had they been only mine enemies, I could safely have forgiven them; but they are rebels against God, his crown and dignity; therefore I plainly foresee their ruin.' His prayer for their destruction comes not from a spirit of revenge, but from a spirit of prophecy, by which he foretold, That all who rebel against God will certainly be destroyed by their own counsels. If it is a righteous thing with God to recompense tribulation to them that trouble his people, as we are told it is, 2 Thess. 1: 6. we pray it may be done, whenever we pray, Father, thy will be done.

III. Of the people of God. Observe,

1. They are described as the righteous; (v. 12.) for they trust in God, are well assured of his power and all-sufficiency, venture their all on his promise, and are confident of his protection in the way of their duty; and they love his name, are well-pleased with all that by which God has made Himself known, and take delight in their acquaintance with Him. This is true and pure religion, to live a life of complacency in God, and dependence on Him.

2. His prayer for them; 'Let them rejoice; let them have cause, and hearts to rejoice; Let them be joyful in Thee, in thy favor, in thy salvation; not in any creature. Let them rejoice because Thou coverest them, or overshadowest them, dwellest among them.' Perhaps it is an allusion to the pillar of cloud and fire. Let us learn of David to pray, not for ourselves only, but for others; let all that are entitled to God's promises, share in our prayers; grace be with all that love Christ in sincerity. This is to concur with God.

3. His comfort concerning them, v. 12. Therefore he takes them into his prayers, because they are God's peculiar people; therefore he doubts not but his prayers shall be heard, and they shall al-

(Rom. 3:9—20.)—If the Israelites, with all their advantages, manifested such hateful dispositions, in opposing 'the man after God's own heart,' and afterwards in their conduct towards their promised Messiah; it is plain that the whole race must be corrupt and alienated from God; that nothing except an internal renovation by the Spirit of God can make them holy; and that they can never find acceptance with God, on the ground of their own obedience to his righteous laws; but must be saved mercifully, if at all.—Some consider the open sepulchre as an emblem of rapacity and sensuality. (Prov. 30:15, 16.) SCOTT. 'As a part of this is cited, Rom. 3:13. to prove the depravity of mankind [in general], it is plain the description was designed for others besides the enemies of the literal David.' Horne.—Flatter.] 'I doubt whether flattery be the thing meant. Is it not rather the plausibility and ensnaring eloquence, with which libertines, in all ages, idolaters of old and philosophical atheists of modern days, have contrived to set a fair appearance on mischievous maxims and pernicious practices?' HORSLEY, in Doyly and Mant.—Sepulchre.] An exact metaphor, notes, Gen. 23:9, &c. ED.

Verses 10, 11.

These vs. might be rendered as follows: 'Deal with them as guilty, O God! Let them fall by their own counsels. Cast them out in the multitude of their transgressions; for they have rebelled against Thee. But all those who put their trust in Thee shall rejoice, they shall shout for joy for ever, because Thou defendest them. They that love thy name shall be joyful in Thee.'—The future tense is indeed often used, for the imperative, or the optative mood, in the Heb. which has not precision as to tenses and moods. But where the literal rendering contains simply a prediction, and changing the future for the imperative, or optative, implies an imprecation, or a wish; the literal version is frequently preferable. Yet it cannot be denied, that the form of imprecation is often used; implying that the impenitent enemies of God and Christ will perish, with the approbation of all holy creatures; and that the very prayers of believers for themselves and the church, will be answered in the destruction of their enemies. ways rejoice. They are happy in the assurance of God's blessing; safe under the protection of his favor, with that thou wilt crown him, so some read it. A shield, in war, guards only on one side, but the favor of God is to the saints a defence on every side; like the hedge about Job, round about, so that, while they keep themselves under the divine protection, they are entirely safe, and ought to be entirely satisfied.

In singing these vs. and praying them over, we must by faith put ourselves under God's guidance and care, and then please ourselves with his mercy and grace, and with the prospect of God's triumphs, at last, over all his enemies, and his people's triumphs in Him and in his salvation.

Ps. VI. David was a weeping prophet as well as Jeremiah, and this Ps. is one of his lamentations: either it was penned in a time, or, at least, calculated for a time, of great trouble, both outward and inward. The method is very observable, and what we shall often meet with. He begins with doleful complaints, but ends with joyful praises; like Hannah, who went to prayer with a sorrowful spirit, but, when she had prayed, went her way, and her countenance was no more sad. This Ps. is like the book of Job.

V. 1—7. These vs. speak the language of a heart truly humbled under humbling providences. Observe here,

I. The representation David makes to God of his grievances; he pours out his complaint before Him: whither else should a child go with his complaints, but to his father? 1. He complains of bodily pain and sickness, v. 2. His bones and his flesh, like Job's, were touched. Let this help to reconcile us to pain and sickness, that it has been the lot of some of the best saints, and that their example directs and encourages to show before God our trouble in that case, who is for the body, and takes cognizance of its ailments. 2. He complains of inward trouble; sickness brought his sin to his remembrance, and, as a token of God's displeasure, it was the vexation of his soul: this completed David's complicated trouble, that it was continued a great while, here intimated in that expostulation, v. 3. Thou, O Lord, how long? The living God is the only Physician both of body and mind.

II. The impression his troubles made on him, v. 6, 7. David had more courage and consideration, than to mourn thus for any outward affliction; but, when sin sits heavy on his conscience, and God withdraws from him, then he mourns in secret, and even his soul refuses to be comforted This kept his eyes not only waking, but weeping. Note, 1. The best men have often been men of sorrows; our Lord Jesus Himself was so: our way lies through a vale of tears, and we must accommodate ourselves to the temper of the climate. 2. It well becomes the greatest spirits to be tender, and to relent, under the tokens of God's displeasure. David could face any threatening enemy, with undaunted bravery, yet melts into tears at the remembrance of sin. 3. True penitents weep in their retirements. The Pharisees disguised their faces, that they might appear unto men to mourn; but David mourns in the night on his bed, communing with his own heart, when no eye witnesses his grief, but the eye of Him who is all eye. Peter went out, covered his face, and wept. 4. Sorrow for sin ought to be great sorrow; so David's was. 5. The triumphs of wicked men, in the sorrows of the saints, add much to their

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

It is our privilege, that we may come before God as often, and ask as much, as we will: and it must be our sin and folly, if we do not avail ourselves of his condescension and bounty. We should take care, that He may hear our voice every morning, 'who arose a great while before day, and departed into a solitary place, and there prayed;' lest we should yield to sloth, or admit carnal excuses for our negligence. (Luke 6:12. P. O. 1—19.) —We none of us could come before God, if it were not for his abounding mercy: humility and reverence then become us in all our worship.—We need not wonder at the cruelty, treachery, hypocrisy, or flattery of our enemies, when we consider how David, or how Christ was treated: but we should remember, that we are by nature as depraved as our opposers; that we may renewedly repent of the sinful thoughts, words, and actions of our past lives; that we may still watch over our own hearts, and against all polluting or dissembling conversation; and that we may bless God for restraining or converting grace, and for Jesus Christ and his salvation.—Joy is the privilege of the righteous, their duty, and their strength; and they should be exhorted, to 'rejoice in the Lord always.' SCOTT.

from a root signifying to protect. See Poole's Syn. &c. The phrase of the psalmist, it is believed, is generally referred to holding a shield over the head of one, as the foot-soldiers formerly did in besieging a city. Schleusner, (whom see,) refers the phrase here, 'to the round form of the shields, which formerly were used to protect persons sitting under (sedentes sub) them.' A cut is given from the ancient Egyptian monuments, of a kind of shield used in sieges, (note, 2 K. 19 32.) which may be said literally to protect, crown, and surround, like a sepulchre, too,) the person beneath it. Possibly this is alluded to, as it must have been in use among the Hebrews: note, 2 Chr. 26:10. The cut is from the Ramesseion. ED.

In the grave.] The word sheol, Sept. hades, is often translated hell, and frequently denotes the place of separate spirits, happy or unhappy, according to the context: yet it sometimes must be understood of the grave, and that appears to be the sense here. grief. David's eye waxed old, because of his enemies, who rejoiced in his afflictions, and put bad constructions on his tears. In this great sorrow, David was a type of Christ, who often wept, and who cried out, My soul is exceedingly sorrowful, Heb. 5: 7.

III. The petitions he offers up to God, in this sorrowful and distressed state. 1. What he dreads as the greatest evil, is, the anger of God; therefore he prays, v. 1. O Lord, rebuke me not in thine anger, though I have deserved it, neither chasten me in thy hot displeasure. He does not pray, 'Lord, rebuke me not; Lord, chasten me not; the affliction of his body will be tolerable, if he have but comfort in his soul. Herein David was a type of Christ, whose sorest complaint, in his sufferings, was, of the trouble of his soul, and suspension of his Father's smiles. Let us thus deprecate the wrath of God more than any outward trouble whatsoever, and always take heed of treasuring up wrath against a day of affliction. 2. What he desires as the greatest good, and which would be to him the restoration of all good, is, the favor and grace of God. He prays God to pity him, and look on him with compassion; to pardon his sins; to be at peace with him; and especially to preserve the inward man, and the interests of that, whatever becomes of the body; 'O Lord, deliver my soul from sinning, from sinking, from perishing for ever.' It is an unspeakable privilege, that we have a God to go to in our afflictions, and it is our duty to go to Him, and thus to wrestle with Him, and we shall not seek in vain.

IV. The pleas with which he enforces his petitions; not to move God, but himself. He pleads his own misery, and its long continuance; he pleads God's mercy; whence we take some of our best encouragements in prayer; Save me, for thy mercies' sake. He pleads God's glory, v. 5. 'For in death there is no remembrance of Thee. Not but that separate souls live and act, and the souls of the faithful joyfully remember God, and give thanks to Him. But in the second death, there is no pleasing remembrance of God; and even the death of the body puts an end to our opportunity and capacity of glorifying God in this world, and serving the interests of his kingdom among men. Some have maintained, that the joys of the saints in heaven are more desirable, infinitely more so, than the comforts of saints on earth; yet the services of saints on earth, especially such eminent ones as David was, are more laudable, and redound more to the glory of the divine grace, than the services of the saints in heaven, who are not employed in maintaining the war against sin and Satan, nor in edifying the bod of Christ. To depart and be with Christ, is most happy for the saints themselves; but for them to abide in the flesh, is more profitable for the church. This, David had an eye to, when he pleaded thus, In the grave, who shall give Thee thanks? 30:9.—88: 10.—115: 17. Is. 38: 18. And this, Christ had an eye to, when He said, I pray not that Thou shouldest take them out of the world.

We should sing these verses with a deep sense of the terrors of God's wrath, which we should therefore dread and deprecate above any thing; and with thankfulness, if this be not our condition, and compassion to persons thus afflicted: if thus troubled, let it comfort us, that our case is not without precedent, nor, if we humble ourselves and pray, as David did, shall it be long without redress.

V. 8—10. What a sudden change is here for the better! He that was groaning, and weeping, and giving up all for gone, v. 6, 7. here looks, and speaks, very pleasantly. Having made his requests known to God, and lodged his case with Him, he confides that the issue will be good, and his sorrow turned into joy.

1. He distinguishes himself from the wicked and ungodly, and fortifies himself against their insults, v. 8. Now his cloud of melancholy was blown over, he is assured his soul shall not be gathered with sinners, for they are not his people. The workers of iniquity had teased him, taunted him, and asked him, 'Where was thy God?' triumphing in his despondency and despair; but now God was about to return, had comforted his spirit, and would shortly complete his deliverance. Perhaps they had tempted him to do as they did, quit religion, and betake himself to the pleasures of sin. But now, he says, 'Depart from me, I will never hearken to your counsel, but I will bless God and live.' God's mercies to us, should strengthen our resolution never to have any thing more to do with sin and sinners. David, as a king, takes occasion to renew his purpose of using his power to suppress sin, and reform manners, 75: 4.—101: 3. Our Lord Jesus seems to borrow these words, when, having all judgment committed to Him, He shall say, Depart from Me, all ye workers of iniquity, Luke 13: 27. and so teaches us to say now, 119: 115.

2. He assures himself God was, and would be, propitious to him, notwithstanding present intimations of wrath. He speaks of it as a thing done, and repeats it with an air of triumph, 'The Lord hath heard;' by the workings of God's grace on his heart, he knew his prayer was graciously accepted, therefore did not doubt it would, in due time, be effectually answered. Thence he infers the like favorable audience of all his other prayers; for God gives, and does not upbraid with former grants.

3. He either prays for the conversion, or predicts the destruction, of his enemies and persecutors, v. 10. It may very well be taken as a prayer for their conversion; if they be not converted, it is a prediction of their confusion and ruin. They shall be ashamed and sore-vexed, (so it may be read,) and that justly; they rejoiced that David was vexed, v. 2, 3. therefore, as usual, it turns on themselves. They that will not give glory to God, shall have everlasting shame.

In singing this, and praying over it, we must give glory to God, as ready to hear prayer, own his goodness in hearing our prayers, and encourage ourselves to wait on, and trust in Him, in the greatest difficulties.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Infidels, profligates, and hypocrites, and ungodly men of every description, have always more noticed David's sins, than his mourning for them: for the former serve for an objection to the truths which they hate, and an excuse for the sins they love; but they are not disposed to imitate him in the latter.—Great tenderness of conscience, and a disposition to mourn for sin with brokenness of heart, distinguish the believer from all other men. The true penitent desires to live on earth to remember and give thanks to his God; and he seeks the deliverance of his soul from hell, and the resurrection of the body from the grave, for the same purpose. To enjoy the favor, and celebrate the praises, of his God and Savior, form that happiness on earth and in heaven, which he desires; but he cannot endure the thought of ceasing for ever to love and praise Him. His sorrow for sin is inward, and flows most in retirement: groans and tears express the compunction of his heart: and when his crimes have dishonored God, and caused his enemies to exult and triumph, and returning comforts are withheld: his spirits are exhausted, his eye is dimmed, and he seems to wax old before his time. But such mourning will terminate in rejoicing: the Lord will not number the weeping penitent with 'the workers of iniquity;' for he will separate from them, and rebuke and warn them. His very tears have a prevailing voice with God, who has heard, and will hear his prayers: and all they, who rejoice in the falls and sorrows of the Lord's devoted servants, will be 'put to shame, vexed, and perish suddenly,' unless they repent.—Sinners of every rank have sorrowed and wept for their transgressions; but Jesus alone was a sinless sufferer, and through his sufferings, and in no other way, can the penitent find mercy. At length HE will bid the impenitent workers of iniquity to depart from Him; and then will all his enemies be confounded, vexed, and perish with an everlasting destruction. SCOTT.

Verses 8—10.

Many mournful Psalms end thus triumphantly, for the encouragement of other mourners to hope and pray. (13:5, 6. 30:9—12.)—The old version thus renders the last verse: 'All my enemies shall be confounded and sore vexed; they shall be turned back, and put to shame suddenly.' (Note, 5:10, 11.) SCOTT.

PSALM VII.

David, protesting his innocence of the crimes charged on him, entreats God to protect him from his enemies, and to plead his cause for the sake of the people, 1—9. He expresses his confidence in God, predicts the destruction of persecutors, and determines to praise the Lord, 10—17.

a Hab. 3:1.
* Or, business.

Ps. VII. It appears by the title, that this Ps. was penned with reference to the malicious imputations David was unjustly laid under by some of his enemies.

V. 1—9. Shiggaion is a song or psalm; the word is used so only here and Hab. 3: 1. A wandering song, so some: the matter and composition of the several parts being different, but artificially put together. A charming song, so others; very delightful. Cush the Benjamite, i. e. Saul, whose barbarous usage of David bespoke him rather a Cushite, or Ethiopian, than a true born Israelite. Or, more likely, some kinsman of Saul, named Cush, an inveterate enemy to David; one of those men of Belial, whom David complains of, 1 Sam. 26: 19. that made mischief between him and Saul. Injuries from men should drive us (as David) to God; nay, He sings to the Lord, his spirit was not ruffled, nor cast down, but composed, cheerful, in tune for sacred songs. Let injuries, instead of provoking our passions, kindle and excite our devotions. In these verses,

I. He flies to God for succor and shelter, v. 1.

II. He solemnly protests his innocency, as to those things whereof he was accused, and by a dreadful imprecation appeals to God, the Searcher of hearts, concerning it, v. 3—5. Happy indeed are we, when our hearts can disprove calumnies to our own satisfaction. David had no court on earth to appeal to; his prince was his sworn enemy; but he had the court of heaven, and a righteous Judge there, whom he could call his God. See,

1. The indictment he pleads not guilty to, a traitorous design against Saul's crown and life. This he utterly denies, v. 3. He never rewarded evil to Saul, when at peace with him, nor to any other, v. 4. Nay, as some think it should be rendered, he never rendered evil for evil.

2. The evidence he produces of his innocency: it is hard to prove a negative, yet of this negative David could produce very good proof, v. 4. Beyond contradiction, he had no design against Saul's life—when, once and again, Saul lay at his mercy, and those about him would soon have despatched him, but David generously and conscientiously prevented it, 1 Sam. 24: 4. 26: 12. Saul himself owned these to be undeniable proofs of David's integrity and well-affectedness to him. If we render good for evil, and deny ourselves the gratifications of our passion, it may turn to us for a testimony, more than we think of, another day.

3. What doom he would submit to, if guilty, v. 5. It is natural to us to wish well to ourselves; therefore, a curse to ourselves, if we swear falsely, has been thought as awful a form of swearing as any other. With such an oath, or imprecation, David, on this important occasion, ratifies the protestation of his innocency, which yet will not justify the like for every light and trivial cause.

III. Having this testimony of his conscience to his innocency, he humbly prays to God to appear for him against his persecutors, and backs every petition with a proper plea, v. 6, 7, 8.

God's appearing on David's behalf, and fulfilling his promise to him, would be such an instance of his righteousness, goodness, and faithfulness, as would greatly enlarge the hearts of all his faithful worshippers, and fill their mouths with praise. If David come into power, as God had promised him, he will take care to bring people to church, and the ark shall not be neglected, as in the days of Saul, 1 Chr. 13: 3.

NOTES.

Ps. VII. Many conjectures have been formed concerning Cush; but at last we only know, that he was of the same tribe as Saul, and most likely one of his relations and courtiers, who brought some false accusation against David. (1 Sam. 22:7, 8. 26:17—19.) SCOTT.—'This Ps. will better answer to Saul's unjust persecution and David's innocence, than to any other subject in David's history.' Dr. A. CLARKE.—'There might have been many reasons for speaking of Saul in enigmatical terms; and there are not wanting numerous instances in Scripture, in which the mystic style of address is applied both to persons and things. In Jer. 25:26. and 51:41. Babylon is called Sheshach; and in the Apocalypse, the mystic Rome is called Egypt, and Sodom, and Babylon MORISON.—Horsley thinks the subject of the Ps. to be, 'the Messiah's appeal to God against the false accusations of his enemies,' and says, 'the predictions it contains of the final conversion of the world, and of the future judgment, are clear and explicit.' ED.

Verses 1, 2.

The Psalmist had many persecutors; but probably the one, whom he distinguishes from the rest, was Saul. (1 Sam. 22:9—19. 23:26—28.) SCOTT.

(2.) Lion.] 'This word seems to answer to Saul. The lion is king of the forest, fierce and powerful; so was Saul in his kingdom.' Dr. A. CLARKE.—His rough generosity, caprice, and blind fury, contrasted with his helpless dependence on the wisdom, moderation, and opinion of men of better intellect, and of less 'feeble temper,' show Saul to have had much more of the mere animal than the man. ED.

Verse 3.

This.] 'What Cush and others falsely lay to my charge, as if I had designed the crown, or Saul's death.' POOLE.

Verse 4.

Yea, I have delivered, &c.] 'The original for delivered, is ambiguous, often rendered to take, lead, or snatch, out, and so deliver; but it primarily signifies to take off, to despoil. Thus the sense is perspicuous; and in this notion of despoiling an enemy, it seems to refer to David's so dealing with Saul, as he did to his skirt in the cave, and his spear in the camp.' HAMMOND.

Verses 6, 7.

David was assured that the Lord intended to cut off Saul. (1 Sam. 15:26—29. 24:8—15. 25:23—31. 26:8—12.) This was 'the judgment He had commanded,' and for which David prayed, not only on his own account, but for the sake of the people. Saul's tyranny, and neglect of his duty as king of Israel, had crushed and scattered the Israelites: and his persecution and impiety had driven them from the ordinances and worship of God, and seduced them into many crimes. (M. R.—75:2—10. 141:6—10. Jer. 12:1—4.) SCOTT.

(7.) 'Some think, David here mainly refers to the effect of the full vindication of his character on the minds of the people; but it appears far more probable, that he spake of the grateful feelings with which they would compass God's altar, when his worship should be established by David in Zion. He beseeches Jehovah, for the sake of his people, to "return on high;" i. e. either to assume a posture of kingly majesty in order to humble the pride of Saul, or to hasten the time when He should return to the throne of his sanctuary in Jerusalem, when the interests of religion would be effectually revived, when the righteousness of his case would be fully vindicated. Horsley's idea is not very probable, though it is ingenious, "that God would bring on the last age, that He would bring the Gentiles to the knowledge of Himself, and reassume the immediate government of all nations, which He had so visibly exercised in the first ages, before the heathen were cut off for their idolatry.' MORISON.

Verses 8—11.

(17:1—3.) David referred to God the cause between him and his persecutors, desiring to be judged, in this respect, according to his righteousness and integrity, which were known to God. (26:1. 2 Sam. 22:21—28.)—'How few among Christians seriously and deliberately consider, whether the sentence of that day' (the day of judgment) 'is likely to be in their favor! yet how many, with the utmost composure and self-complacency, repeat continually the words of this Ps. as well as those in the Te Deum, "We believe that Thou shalt come to be our Judge!"' Bp. Horne. SCOTT.

(8.) 'The confident assertion of his own righteousness and integrity, can belong to no character but Jesus Christ Himself.' HORSLEY.

10 * My defence is of God, [h] which saveth the upright in heart.

11 † God judgeth the righteous, and God is angry with the wicked every day.

12 If [i] he turn not, [k] he will whet his sword; he hath bent his bow, and made it ready.

13 He hath also prepared for him the instruments of death; [l] he ordaineth his arrows against the [m] persecutors.

14 Behold, [n] he travaileth with iniquity, and hath conceived mischief, and brought forth falsehood.

15 He ‡ made a pit, and digged it, [o] and is fallen into the ditch which he made.

16 [p] His mischief shall return upon his own head, and his violent dealings shall come down upon his own pate.

17 I will praise the LORD [q] according to his righteousness: and will sing praise to the name of the LORD [r] most high.

He prays, in general, for the conversion of sinners, and the establishment of saints, v. 9. two things every one of us must desire, and may hope for.

As far as we have the testimony of an unbiassed conscience for us, that in any instance we are wronged and injuriously reflected on, we may, in singing these vs. lodge our appeal with the righteous God, and be assured that He will own our righteous cause, and in the last day, at furthest, bring forth our integrity as the light.

V. 10—17. David, having lodged his appeal with God, in the former part of the Ps. now, as it were, takes out judgment on the appeal, by assurance from the Word of God, of the happiness and safety of the righteous, and the certain destruction of the wicked that continue impenitent. Two things David builds this confidence upon. 1. The particular favor God has for all that are sincere; He saves the upright in heart. 2. The general respect He has for justice and equity; God judgeth the righteous; He owns every righteous cause, and will maintain it in every righteous man, and will protect him. God is a righteous Judge, so some read it, who not only doeth righteousness Himself, but will take care that righteousness be done by men, and will punish all unrighteousness. 3. He reads the doom of the wicked here, for their good, if possible; or, however, that he might not be afraid of them. He goes into the sanctuary of God, and there understands, That they are children of wrath, therefore not to be envied; if suffered to prosper, it is in wrath; if they pray, their very prayers are an abomination. The wrath of God abides on them, John 3: 36. and continual additions are made to it. All the children of wrath, too, are sons of perdition, marked out for ruin. See their destruction:

(1.) God will destroy them; the destruction they are reserved for is, destruction from the Almighty, which ought to be a terror to every one of us, for it comes from the wrath of God, v. 13, 14. It is here intimated, that the destruction of sinners may be prevented by their conversion; or that, if it be not thus prevented, it will be prepared for them by the justice of God. And if God will slay, He will not want instruments of death; here is a variety of instruments, a sword which wounds and kills at hand, a bow and arrows which wound and kill at a distance. These instruments of death are all said to be made ready; God has them always at hand; judgments are prepared for scorners; Tophet is prepared of old. Yet, He gives sinners timely warning, and space to repent and prevent their ruin. He is slow to punish, and long-suffering to us-ward, not willing that any should perish. But the longer the destruction is delayed, the sorer will it be, and the heavier will it fall, and lie for ever, if the delay be not improved by repentance; while God is waiting, the sword is in the whetting, and the bow in the drawing. The destruction of impenitent sinners, though it come slowly, yet comes surely; for it is ordained, they are of old ordained to it. Persecutors especially are set up as the fairest marks of divine wrath

(2.) They will destroy themselves, v. 14—16. The sinner is here described as taking great pains to ruin himself, v. 14—16. He contrives, plots, and is in pain to be delivered of, malicious projects against the people of God. But in this he cheats himself, for he cannot compass what he intended; nor, if he gain his point, will he gain the satisfaction he promised himself; he brings forth wind, Isa. 26: 18. stubble, Isa. 23: 11. death, James 1: 15. i. e. falsehood. His are as the pains of a laboring man, that works hard to dig a pit, and then falls into it, and perishes in it. This is true, in a sense, of all sinners; they prepare destruction for themselves, by preparing themselves for destruction; loading themselves with guilt, and submitting themselves to their corruptions. It is often remarkably true of those who contrive mischief against the people of God, or against their neighbors; for, by the righteous hand of God, what they designed for the shame and destruction of others, proves to be their own confusion. There is no juster law than, That the author of a murderous contrivance should perish by it. Some apply it to Saul, who fell on his sword.

In singing this Ps. we must do as David here does, v. 17. praise the Lord according to his righteousness; give Him the glory of that gracious pro-

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The servants of God must expect the persecution of the tongue, as a preparation for further injuries; and to the ingenuous mind it often appears very formidable. But no slanderers or persecuting tyrants can do real harm to those who trust in God. 'Happy he who can reflect, that he has been a benefactor to his persecutors!' Bp. Horne.—While we patiently bear the injuries to which we are exposed, we should be much affected and grieved, when we behold 'one sinner destroying much good:' and we ought to pray, that the Lord would convert or destroy all those, who scatter and oppress his people; and effectually interpose to encourage their faith and obedience, and to stop the growth of impiety and infidelity.—The Lord is every day provoked by the wicked; and while He waits to receive the submissions, and pardon the sins, of those who repent and turn to Him, He is preparing to execute judgment on all the impenitent. Under all our trials let us look unto the Savior. He alone was perfect in righteousness; yet none was ever reviled, slandered, and hated as He was. He lived and died, doing good to his enemies, and praying for them: but after his exaltation, the welfare of his church [of the universe] required that judgment should be executed on such as continued impenitent. The Jews first felt the weight of his indignation, and at the same time great multitudes of Gentile converts compassed Him about. Wherever anti-christian corrupters or persecutors have been from time to time destroyed, the church has been replenished with numerous real converts to the faith; and when these enemies of the truth shall finally come to an end, the whole earth will be filled with truth and righteousness. SCOTT

The words in italics are not in the original. Ainsworth tr. "God is a just judge, and God angrily threateneth every day." Correspondent is the reading of Coverdale's Bible, and King Edward's, of 1549. Others, apparently with much color of argument, adopt a different view. Horsley reads it, "God is a righteous Judge, although He is not angry every day." Vulg. "God is a righteous Judge, strong and patient: will He be angry every day?" Sept. "God is a righteous Judge, strong and long-suffering; not bringing forth his anger every day." The Syr. "God is the Judge of the righteous; He is not angry every day." The text at large, as is intimated by the Vulg. the Sept. and some other ancient versions, conveys a strong intimation of the long-suffering of God, whose hatred of sin is unchangeable, but whose anger against transgressors is marked by infinite patience, and does not burst forth in vengeance every day.' MORISON.—'Considering the entire design of this and the following vs. this [the sense given by the Sept. the Vulg. and the Syr. as above] may well pass for a perspicuous paraphrase, and not any contradiction to the rational, though it agree not to the literal notion of it.' HAMMOND.—'Not a few render it, "God is a just Judge, a God indignant, exercising severity, every day." 'The Chal. "God is just, but is moved with anger towards the wicked every day," i. e. He is always angry with the wicked.'—'The words "strong and long-suffering," which occur in the Sept. from which they are retained also in the Vulg. Drusius justly observes, are a mere gloss.' ROSENM. tection under which He takes his afflicted people, and of that just vengeance with which He will pursue those who afflict them.

Ps. VIII. This Ps. is a solemn meditation on, and adoration of, the glory and greatness of God, of which we are all concerned to think highly and honorably. It begins and ends with the same acknowledgment of the transcendent excellency of God's name. It is proposed for proof, v. 1. That God's name is excellent in all the earth! And then it is repeated, as proved, in the last v. For the proof of God's glory, he gives instances of his goodness to man; for God's goodness is his glory. When observing the glory of God in the kingdom of nature and providence, we should be led by that, and through that, to the contemplation of his glory in the kingdom of grace.

V. 1—2. Hammond grounds a conjecture on the title of this Ps. concerning the occasion of penning it. Gittith, he renders Gittite, i. e. Goliah the Gittite, whom David vanquished and slew, 1 Sam. 17: The conjecture would be probable enough, but that we find two other Pss. with the same title, 81 and 84.

I. How plainly God displays his glory Himself, v. 1. David addresses himself to God with all humility and reverence, as the Lord, and his people's Lord; O Lord, our Lord. If we believe that God is the Lord, we must avouch and acknowledge Him to be ours: and we shall never think we can praise Him with affection enough, if we consider,

1. How bright God's glory shines even in this lower world; How excellent is his name in all the earth! The works of creation and providence evince and proclaim to all the world, that there is an infinite Being, the Fountain of all being, power, and perfection, the sovereign Ruler, powerful Protector, and bountiful Benefactor, of all the creatures, Rom. 1: 20. But this looks farther, to the Gospel of Christ, by which the name of God, as notified by divine revelation, which, before, was great in Israel only, came to be so in all the earth, the utmost ends of which have thus been made to see God's great salvation, Mark 16: 15, 16.

2. How much brighter it shines in the upper world; Thou hast set thy glory above the heavens. God is infinitely more glorious and excellent than the noblest and brightest of creatures. We on earth only hear his excellent name, and praise that, the angels and blessed spirits above see his glory, and praise that, yet He is exalted far above even their blessing and praise. In the exaltation of the Lord Jesus to the right hand of God, who is the Brightness of his Father's glory, and the express Image of his person, God set his glory above the heavens, far above all principalities and powers.

II. How powerfully He discovers it by the weakest of his creatures, v. 2. 1. In the kingdom of nature, the care God takes of little children, ought to be acknowledged by every one of us, to the glory of God, as a great instance of his power and goodness; and the more sensibly, because we have all had the benefit of it, for to this we owe it, that we died not from the womb, that the knees then prevented us, and the breasts. 2. In the kingdom of providence, God uses men to promote his glory, some that know Him, and others that do not, Isa. 45: 4. nay, sometimes He is pleased to serve his own purposes by the ministry of such as are still, in wisdom and strength, little better than babes and sucklings. 3. In the kingdom of grace, the kingdom of the Messiah; the apostles were looked upon but as babes, Acts 4: 13. mean and despicable, yet by the foolishness of their preaching, the devil's kingdom was to be overthrown. The Gospel is called the arm of the Lord, and the rod of his strength; but it was ordained to work wonders, not out of the mouth of philosophers or orators, politicians or statesmen, but of a company of poor fishermen, who lay under the greatest external disadvantages; yea, we hear children crying, Hosanna to the Son of David, when the chief priests and Pharisees owned Him not, but despised and rejected Him; to that therefore our Savior applies this, Matt. 21: 16. and by it stilled the enemy. Sometimes the grace of God appears wonderfully in young children, and He teaches them knowledge, and makes them to understand doctrine, who are but newly weaned, Isa. 28: 9. Sometimes the power of God brings to pass great things in his church by very weak and unlikely instruments; 1 Cor. 1: 27, 28. This He does, because of his enemies, that He may silence them, and put them to shame, and so be justly avenged on the avengers; see Acts 4: 14.—6: 10. The devil is the great enemy and avenger, and by the preaching of the gospel he was, in a great measure, stilled, his oracles silenced, the advocates of his cause confounded, and unclean spirits themselves not suffered to speak.

In singing this, let us give God the glory of his great name, and of the great things He has done by the power of his Gospel, in the chariot of which the exalted Redeemer rides forth, conquering and to conquer, and ought to be attended, not only with our praises and good wishes, [but with our best

NOTES.

Ps. VIII. Title. 'Gittith' perhaps is the name of some tune, which David had learned when in Gath, or from the Gittites, and to which this and two other Pss. were set. (M. R.) SCOTT. Gittith.] 'In Jer. 13: 15. the word, slightly varied, is rendered wine-press. So the Sept. the Vulg. and the Ethiopic. It is very probable, this and the other Pss. which bear this title, (81 and 84) were composed about the time of the feast of the tabernacles, when, having completed their vintage, the Jews were accustomed, with every demonstration of joy, to cast their grapes into the wine-press, and thus mature for use the abundance of the year. Thus explained, the title may contain a twofold allusion, the one retrospective to the creation, the time of which the vintage is supposed to be the anniversary; and the other prophetic, looking towards Him who "trod the wine-press" of his Father's wrath "alone, when of the people there was none with Him." To this latter opinion agree most of the ancient Christian writers, and it certainly is not without support in the analogies of Scripture, and in the distinct references of the Ps. itself.' MORISON.—Rosenm. quotes Rudinger as saying, that 'this Ps. in itself contains nothing of prophecy, or concerning Christ, or his kingdom.'—Dr. J. P. Smith, though not 'fully convinced' of the application of the whole psalm as a 'direct prophecy' of Christ, yet says of it, 'as cited in the Epistle to the Hebrews,' that 'it conveys,' as appears to him, 'this sentiment: that the honors here declared to have been conferred on the human race by the Creator, had never, either generally or in a single instance, been actually verified, till the man Christ Jesus was exalted above all principality and authority, and might, and dominion, and every name that is named, not only in this world, but also in that which is to come, and hath put all things under his feet.'—Poole thinks the application of the Ps. may be allowed both to man in general and to the man Christ Jesus in particular, inasmuch as 'the scope of it seems plainly to be, to display and celebrate the great love and kindness of God towards mankind, not only in creation, but especially in his redemption by Jesus Christ.' 'So Christ,' he says, 'is the principal subject of the Ps.' ED.

Verse 2.

The new born infant is such a display of God's power, skill, and goodness, as unanswerably confutes the cavils of atheism.—The Sept. render the clause, here translated, 'ordained strength,' 'perfected praise;' and the Evangelist, recording our Lord's words, gives them according to that version. (Note, Matt. 21: 14—16.) SCOTT. 'The import of these words is plainly, that the praises of the Messiah, celebrated in the church by his children, have in them a strength and power which nothing can withstand: they can abash infidelity, when at its greatest height, and strike hell itself dumb.' Bp. HORNE. Dr. A. Clarke, considers that, literally, the manner in which the mouths of new-born infants produce, by instinct, a vacuum, so that the external air presses into them the milk, is an argument of God's being, providence and goodness, sufficient to confound every infidel and atheist in the universe. Verse 3.

The Psalmist, instead of being tempted to worship the heavenly host, contemplated the magnificent scene, and the immensity of the creation, till he was filled with adoring admiration of the Creator's incomprehensible majesty, which naturally suggested the subsequent reflections. Verses 3, 4.

'A very natural and sublime interpretation of these words might remain, were even their prophetic sense entirely excluded; but they may, and doubtless ought to be understood with reference to the wondrous union of afflicted and prostrated human nature to the Deity, in the glorious person of Immanuel, God with us. If any difficulty arises in considering this v. (4.) as uttered by the adorable Messiah, let it be remembered that He assumed human nature entirely for our sakes, and that it did not cease to be our nature, even when He wore it, and spoke the language peculiar to it.' MORISON. When he fully uses his powers to observe the works of God, it must and should be the chief source of happiness to a human being, that, in the overpowering immensity of God's universe, an atom, apparently so utterly insignificant as himself, should have an Almighty Being, to be accountable to, who, in his omniscient goodness, will take account of him. V. 3—9. David here goes on to magnify the honor of God, by recounting the honors He has put upon man, especially the man Christ Jesus. See here,

I. How the psalmist's consideration of the lustre and influence of the heavenly bodies, leads him to admire the condescending favor of God to man, v. 3. But why not notice the sun? Probably because it was in the night he entertained and instructed himself with this meditation, when only the moon and the stars were to be seen; which, though they are not so serviceable to man as the sun, yet are no less demonstrations of the wisdom, power, and goodness, of the Creator. Observe, It is our duty to consider the heavens. The beasts look downward to the earth, but man is made erect to look upward toward heaven; that thus he may be directed to set his affections on things above; for what we see has not its due influence upon us, unless we consider it. The heavens are, in a peculiar manner, God's heavens, 115: 16. they are the place of the residence of his glory, and we are taught to call Him Our Father in heaven. They are therefore his, because the work of his fingers; He made them easily, with a word, with very great curiosity and fineness, like a nice piece of work which the artist makes with his fingers. God ordained them; and the ordinances of heaven can never be altered. When we consider how the glory of God shines in the upper world, we may well wonder He should take cognizance of such a mean creature as man, and humble Himself to behold the things done on this earth, see 113: 5, 6. 'Lord, what is man, that his comfort and convenience should be so much consulted in the making of the lights of heaven, and directing their motions!'

II. How he expresses this admiration, v. 4. 'Lord, what is man! Enosh, sinful, weak, miserable man, a creature so forgetful of Thee, and his duty to Thee! that Thou takest cognizance of him, of his actions and affairs; that, in the making of the world, Thou hadst a respect to him! [Note, below.] What is the son of man, that thou visitest him; not only feedest, clothest, protectest, but visitest him, art pleased to converse with him, and concern Thyself for him! What is man, so mean a creature, that he should be thus honored, so sinful a creature, that he should be thus countenanced and favored!' Now this refers,

1. To mankind in general. Though man is a worm, and the son of man is a worm, Job 25: 6. yet God respects him, and shows him abundance of kindness. (1.) Man is, above all the creatures in this lower world, the favorite and darling of Providence; very honorable in rank, but a little lower than the angels, v. 5. lower indeed, because allied to the earth, yet but a little lower than they, as next in order to them; and but for a little while lower; the children of the resurrection shall be angels' peers, Luke 20: 36. and no longer lower than they. (2.) He is endued with noble faculties and capacities; Thou hast crowned him with glory and honor; He that gave him his being, having made him wiser than the beasts of the earth, and the fowls of heaven, made him fit to rule them, and it is fit they should be ruled by him. Man's reason is his crown of glory; let him not profane that crown by disturbing the use of it, nor forfeit it by acting contrary to its dictates. (3.) He is invested with a sovereign dominion over the inferior creatures, under God, and is constituted their lord, v. 6. His charter, by which he holds this royalty, bears equal date with his creation, Gen. 1: 28. and was renewed after the flood, Gen. 9: 2. God has put all things under man's feet, that he might serve himself, not only of the labor, but of the productions and lives, of the inferior creatures. He specifies some of the inferior animals, v 7, 8. Jam. 3: 7. Every kind of beasts, and birds, and things in the sea, is tamed, and has been tamed, man has likewise liberty to use them as he has occasion; Rise, Peter, kill and eat, Acts 10: 13. Every time we partake of fish or of fowl, we realize this dominion which man has over the works of God's hands; and it is a reason for our subjection to God, our chief Lord, and to his dominion over us.

2. But this refers, in a particular manner, to Jesus Christ; of Him we are taught to expound it, Heb. 2: 6—8. And it is certain the greatest favor ever bestowed on man, and the greatest honor ever put on the human nature, were exemplified in the incarnation and exaltation of the Lord Jesus. Some apply visitest, to Christ's sufferings for us, for it is said, Heb. 2: 9. For the suffering of death, a visitation in wrath, He was crowned with glory and honor. God visited Him with a rod and with stripes, that we by them might be healed. He was, for a little while, so the apostle interprets it, made lower than the angels, when He took on Him the form of a servant, and made Himself of no reputation. In this nature, God the Father exalted Him, because He had humbled Himself; crowned Him with glory and honor, the glory He had with Him before the worlds were; set Him at his own right hand; constituted Him not only the Head of the church, but Head over all things to the church. All the creatures are put under his feet; and, even in the days of his flesh, He gave some specimens of his power over them, as when He commanded the winds and the seas, and appointed a fish to pay his tribute.

With good reason, therefore, does the psalmist conclude as he began, Lord, how excellent is thy name in all the earth, which has been honored with the presence of the Redeemer, and is still enlightened by his gospel, and governed by his wisdom and power! In singing this, and praying it over, though we must not forget to acknowledge, with suitable affections, God's common favors to mankind, particularly in the serviceableness of his creatures to us, yet we must especially set ourselves to give glory to our Lord Jesus, by confessing that He is Lord, submitting to Him as our Lord, and waiting till we see all things put under Him.

Ps. IX. V. 1—10. The title gives a very uncertain sound concerning the occasion of this Ps. Muth-labben, some refer to the death of Goliath, others of Nabal, others of Absalom; I think

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

No words can express the glorious excellency of JEHOVAH, our Ruler and Lord; nor can Cherubim or Seraphim reach his worthiness by their most exalted adorations: yet every creature speaks the Creator's praise to the mind of the devout believer; whose pious contemplations render his solitary walks unspeakably pleasant and profitable.—But in the person of Emmanuel, every other instance of divine condescension is eclipsed, and our most exalted previous conceptions of the divine love are far exceeded, and the powers of our minds are almost overwhelmed. His love, his humiliation in assuming our nature, his atoning sufferings unto death, his subsequent glory, and his dominion over all creatures, which shall endure till all enemies are put under his feet, can never sufficiently be admired and adored.—Thus our nature, in the second Adam, is infinitely more honored and exalted, than it could have been in the first Adam. Thus also the true dignity of human nature, even the worth of a rational, immortal soul, though ruined by sin, yet capable of recovery and eternal felicity, is clearly shown. SCOTT.

at the head of this lower world, in a state of honor and dominion. (Gen. 1:26,27.) After the fall, it was still more wonderful that his children should be permitted to retain any authority over, or derive any benefit from, the different orders of creatures. SCOTT.

Than the angels. (5) Elohim is generally translated God, or gods: yet the apostle quotes the LXX, who render it angels; which shows the latitude with which the term is used. (82:6,7. John 10:32—39.) But when the true God is meant, it is, though plural, always joined with the singular verb; and the name JEHOVAH is never given to any but to the true God: and, when applied to Christ, it shows who He is, even 'the true God and eternal Life.' SCOTT.

it signifies only some tune, or musical instrument, to which this Ps. was intended to be sung; and that the enemies he is here triumphing in the defeat of, are the Philistines, and other neighboring nations that opposed his settlement, 2 Sam. 6: 8. In these verses,

1. David excites and engages himself to praise God for the great things He had of late done for him and his government, v. 1, 2. Note, 1. God expects suitable returns of praise from those for whom He has done marvellous works. 2. If we would praise God acceptably, we must praise Him in sincerity, with our whole heart. 3. When we give thanks for some one particular mercy, we should take occasion thence to remember former mercies. 4. Holy joy is the life of thankful praise, as thankful praise is the language of holy joy. 5. Whatever occurs to make us glad, our joy must pass through it, and terminate in God only; I will be glad and rejoice in Thee, not in the gift so much as in the Giver. 6. Joy and praise are properly expressed by singing psalms. 7. When God has showed Himself to be above the proud enemies of the church, we must take occasion thence to give glory to Him as the Most High. 8. The triumphs of the Redeemer ought to be the triumphs of the redeemed; see Rev. 12: 10.—19: 5.—15: 3, 4.

2. He acknowledges God's almighty power, v. 3. That is easily done, which a man does with his very presence; with that alone, God confounds his enemies. This was fulfilled, when our Lord Jesus, with one word, I am He, made his enemies to fall back at his presence; He could, at the same time, have made them perish. When the church's enemies are put to confusion, we must ascribe it to God's presence, give Him all the glory.

3. He gives to God the glory of his righteousness, in appearing on his behalf, v. 4. Observe, God sits in the throne of judgment; to Him it belongs to decide controversies, to determine appeals, to right the injured, and to punish the injurious; for He has said, Vengeance is mine. If there seem some irregularity in the present decisions of Providence, yet these, instead of shaking our belief of God's justice may serve to strengthen our belief of the judgment to come, which will set all to rights. [Notes, Job 34. 36.] Whoever disown and desert a just and injured cause, we may be sure the righteous God will maintain it, and plead it with jealousy.

4. He records, with joy, the triumphs of the God of heaven over all the powers of hell, and attends those triumphs with his praises, v. 5. God had checked them; 'Thou hast rebuked the heathen;' He had cut them off; 'Thou hast destroyed the wicked.' He had buried them in oblivion and perpetual infamy; had put out their name for ever, that they should never be remembered with any respect.

5. He exults over the enemy God thus appears against, v. 6. Thou hast destroyed cities. Either, 'Thou, O enemy,' or, 'Thou, O God.' Either way, the psalmist will have the enemy to know, 1. That their destruction, that of the malicious and vexatious neighbors of Israel, as the Philistines, Moabites, Ammonites, Edomites, and Syrians, is just, Isa. 33: 1. 2. That it is total and final, such a destruction as should make a perpetual end of them, so that the very memorial of their cities should perish with them. Such desolations do the righteous judgments of God make, that great and populous cities have been reduced to such ruins, that those who have sought them could not find where they stood.

6. He comforts himself, and others, in God, pleases himself with thoughts,

1. Of his eternity, and unchanging being, felicity, power, and perfection; our enemies may put an end to our liberties, our privileges, our lives, but our God is still the same, (v. 7.) unshaken, undisturbed, 29: 10. 93: 2. 2. Of his sovereignty both in government and judgment. 3. Of his justice and righteousness in all the administrations of his government: in both worlds, so that there shall not be the least color of exception against it. 4. Of that peculiar favor God bears to his own people, and the special protection He takes them under, v. 9. He will be a refuge for the oppressed; perhaps God may not immediately appear for his people as their Deliverer and Avenger; but, in the midst of their distresses, they may by faith fly to Him, and depend on his power and promise, so that no real hurt shall be done them. 5. Of that sweet satisfaction and repose be the meaning, it is very obscurely expressed: and, as Zion was not the place of Israel's assembling for public worship, till David had for some time been king over all Israel, the Ps. must have been composed long after Goliath's death. (11—14.) Others therefore suppose 'Muthlabben' to mean, the death of his son, and refer the occasion of the Ps. to the death of Absalom.—The Psalmist might have some reference to the various deliverances of his past life; but he was also led, while praising God for them, to speak, as the type of Christ, concerning his conflicts and victories, and those of his church; and to celebrate her triumphs over every heathen and anti-christian persecutor, while he included also the trials and deliverances of every believer. SCOTT. 'We have no idea that any of these Heb. terms refer to hymn tunes. The Hebrews had no musical characters, nor any metrical tunes, like modern psalmody. Their hymns were all chanted.' COTT. BIB. Morison, takes Henry's view of the title, and says it is sustained 'by many ancient Jewish authorities.' ED.

Verses 1—3.

The Psalmist determined, on occasion of some recent deliverance, to 'praise JEHOVAH with his whole heart.' (27 :1—3. 2 Sam. 22 :37—42.)—This admits of the most obvious application to the works of God for his church, and for every believer; and, no doubt, was intended by the Holy Spirit, to be thus used in our worship and meditations. (M. R. e.) SCOTT.

Verses 4—6.

God had pleaded David's righteous cause against the wicked persecution of Saul, and had advanced him to the throne of all Israel, with the destruction of almost the whole family of Saul. He had given his king the victory over the surrounding heathen nations, who perished in great numbers, and had finally lost the reputation of their former successes. So that every enemy which had before destroyed the cities of Israel, was deprived perpetually of power to continue these desolations; and most of them soon became so insignificant, that the memorial of them, and of their former greatness, perished with them.—Thus v. 6. must be understood, if we adhere to the translation in the text; but the marg. r. here seems the proper sense.—Thus likewise the renowned monarchies, that successively made havoc on earth, and oppressed Israel, are now destroyed and almost forgotten; the first opposers of Christ and Christianity have shared the same fate; and all these divine interpositions are earnests of the final ruin of all the enemies of the cause of Christ. (Dan. 2:38—45.) SCOTT.

(6.) 'In that lofty spirit of prediction which runs through the entire book of Ps. we may conceive David as stretching his prophetic eye over the wide field of the Church's history, and anticipating those extraordinary revolutions by which Nineveh, Babylon, Persia, Greece, and Rome were, each in turn, hurled from their lofty seats, and left the sad monuments of providential vengeance, the awful wrecks of pride, ambition and inveterate idolatry.' MORISON.

Verses 7—12.

The reflection on the transient glory of earthly kingdoms, and illustrious conquerors, led the Psalmist to reflect on the eternity of JEHOVAH, and of his universal kingdom.—It was only as dwelling in Zion, on the mercy-seat, above the ark of the covenant, through the sacrifices and ordinances which typified the promised Savior, that God could be sought by sinful men with acceptance; therefore his people should abound in praising Him, as the God of salvation; and making known his works, that others might learn to seek and serve Him. (M R. c.—Is. 26:20,21.) SCOTT.

(12.) '"To make inquisition" is not to inquire after blood spilled, but to sit as inquisitor or judge on all capital crimes, where the blood of the offender is due to justice. "These," refers to the "humble" or afflicted, at the end of the verse.' MUDGE, in Doyly and Mant.

of mind they have, that make God their Refuge, v. 10. The grace of God is the same in all the saints, and his favor the same towards all. Note, The better God is known, the more He is trusted. Those who know Him to be the Father of spirits, and an everlasting Father, will trust him with their souls, at all times, even to the end. The more God is trusted, the more He is sought unto: and the more constant will be our care, to approve ourselves to Him in our whole conversation. God never did, nor will, disown or desert any that duly seek to, and trust in Him.

V. 11—20. In these verses,

1. David, having praised God himself, calls on and invites others to praise Him likewise, v. 11. In all our praises, we should have an eye to God as dwelling in Zion, in a special manner present in the assemblies of his people, as their Protector and Patron. David would have us notice here the justice of God in avenging the blood of his people Israel on the Philistines, and their other wicked neighbors, who had, in making war on them, used them barbarously, and given them no quarter, v. 12. Deut. 32: 43. He will avenge the blood of his servants. Note, There is a day coming, when God will make inquisition for blood, when He will discover what has been shed secretly, and avenge what has been shed unjustly; see Isa. 26: 21. Jer. 51: 35. In that day, it will appear how precious the blood of God's people is to Him, 72: 14. when it must all be accounted for.

2. David, having praised God for former mercies and deliverances, earnestly prays God still to appear for him, (v. 13, 14.) in which, he is not particular, lest he should seem to prescribe to God; but modestly refers himself to the wisdom and will of God. 'Lord, save me; not that I may have the comfort and credit of it, but that thou mayest have the glory, that I may show forth all thy praise, and that publicly, in the gates of the daughter of Zion.'

3. By faith he foresees and foretells the certain ruin of all wicked people, both in this world and in that to come. In these and all judgments, the wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men. The psalmist, therefore, adds here a note extraordinary, commanding special regard, Higgaion; it is a thing to be carefully observed and meditated upon. What we see of present judgments, is a what we believe of the judgment to come, ought to be the subject of our frequent and serious meditations. Note, Forgetfulness of God is the cause of all the wickedness of the wicked. There are nations that forget God, many great and many mighty nations. Temporal ruin, and hell at the last, will be the portion of such, a state of everlasting misery and torment; Sheol, a pit of destruction, in which they and all their comforts will be for ever lost and buried.

4. David encourages the people of God to wait for his salvation, though it should be long deferred, v. 18. We may build on it as undoubtedly true, that God's people, God's elect, shall not always

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

All our mercies should be acknowledged before God, in fervent praises; for the whole glory of every success or deliverance belongs to Him.—He who advanced David, and maintained his righteous cause; who exalted the Savior 'to his own right hand in heavenly places,' will help the Christian also in all his conflicts and temptations, and support and comfort him in all his troubles, till he is finally delivered from the body of sin; and till 'Satan is bruised under his feet,' and death itself is 'swallowed up in victory.'—The eternal God has already prepared his throne for judgment: He will certainly execute judgment in righteousness and in faithfulness; and then every iniquitous sentence will be reversed, and every oppressor punished.—The Lord never did, and never will, forsake or reject any, who seek his favor according to his Word. He is 'in Christ reconciling the world unto Himself;' He may be found on a mercy-seat: let saints then sing praises to Him, and call on sinners to come and trust in Him. —Satan, who hates us, will stir up opposition, and excite our depravity by his suggestions: but the Lord, who has lifted us up from the gates of death and hell, considers all our conflicts and temptations, and will give us merciful deliverances.—Often it has seemed, as if man would prevail against the cause of God; but the church has prayed, her Advocate has pleaded, and the arm of the Lord has been extended; some of her enemies have been judged and have perished; many have been intimidated, and others humbled in cordial submission; so that the cause of God yet maintains its ground. Still we have abundant reason to unite in the prayer, 'Arise, O Lord, let not Satan or man prevail to confine thy church within such narrow limits, to corrupt it by so many heresies and scandals, or to distract it with so many divisions and disputes. put those in fear and to shame, who arrogate more to themselves, than can belong to fallible, sinful, mortal man; humble and convert every opposer, and destroy every system of superstition and delusion; that all may gladly welcome the Savior, and become his willing subjects. Higgaion. Selah. Amen.' SCOTT.

Verses 13. 14.

David, after all his triumphs, still had enemies, conflicts, and trials: the church, though victorious over all former opposers, is still 'militant here on earth:' and the believer, though rescued from 'the gates of death' and hell, and enabled to bless God for many deliverances, must still encounter troubles and temptations, and mingle prayers with his thanksgivings. The expression, 'the daughter of Zion,' seems to denote the inhabitants of Zion, with all those who came to worship at the sanctuary, (which was placed there when this Ps. was written,) considered as one collective body, the visible church, the type of the true church, which God our Savior has espoused to Himself, and which, in the true mount Zion, the heavenly Jerusalem, shall show forth all the praises of Him, who has lifted her up from the gates of death, and raised her to that glorious felicity.—The contrast between 'the gates of death,' and 'the gates of the daughter of Zion,' is remarkable. SCOTT.

(14.) T. H. Horne says, gates of the daughter of Zion is symbolical, and denotes 'the ordinances of Jehovah, by which the soul is helped forward in the way of salvation.' ED.

Verse 16.

'There is nothing that a wicked man does, that is not against his own interest.' DR. A. CLARKE.

Verse 17.

(Rom. 1:28—32.)—The future condemnation of the wicked seems to be intended; for as all men go down to the grave, the word, rendered hell, must in this connection have a more awful meaning. (16:8—11. Rev. 20:11—15.) SCOTT.

Verses 18—20.

Many princes have claimed and received divine honors: the arrogant titles of infallibility and of his holiness, which one chief antichrist has assumed, are well known: and the proud and impious conduct of multitudes too evidently proves, not only that they forget God, but that they forget themselves to be men; sinful, weak, and dying creatures, who will soon be called to give an account of themselves to God.—David therefore prayed, that these haughty enemies of the Lord and his people, might be so terrified, as to recollect their own weakness, and submit to omnipotence. The LXX. translate the first clause, 'Place a lawgiver over them;' and the original word, by varying a vowel point, means a Teacher; and in this sense the prayer is for their instruction and conversion. SCOTT.

(18.) Hell.] 'The old English word hell was most probably derived from the Saxon verb helan, to hide; or, hell, a cavern. The Heb. sheol signifies, according to Cocceius, "the place and state of those who are out of the way, and to be sought for." This is nearly the meaning of the Greek word hades. After all that can be said, it is the context must determine the particular application of the word. Sometimes it denotes merely the dead, as in Gen. 38:35; and sometimes it signifies the place of torment, as in the text.' MORISON.—Man of the earth.] Morison understands by earth, 'the land of Israel,' and by man, 'the nation of Israel.' Boothroyd adds, that 'man is often said to be made of dust, to denote his frailty; but such a construction, as is here, nowhere else occurs;' and he conceives 'the common version cannot be correct.' ED.

5. He concludes with prayer, that God would humble the pride, break the power, and blast the projects, of all the wicked enemies of his church, v. 19. It is very desirable, much for the glory of God, and the peace and welfare of the universe, that men should know and consider themselves to be but men, depending creatures, mutable, mortal, and accountable.

In singing this, we must give to God the glory of his justice, in pleading his people's cause against his and their enemies, and encourage ourselves to wait for the year of the redeemed, and the year of recompenses for the controversy of Zion, even the final destruction of all anti-christian powers and factions, to which many of the ancients apply this psalm.

Ps. X. V. 1—11. The Sept. joins this Ps. with Ps. 9. and makes them but one; but the Heb. makes it a distinct Ps.; the scope and style are certainly different. David, in these verses, discovers,

I. A very great affection to God and his favor; for, in the time of trouble, that which he complains of most feelingly, is, God's withdrawing his gracious presence, v. 1. Note, God's withdrawings are very grievous to his people at any time, but especially in times of trouble. It is our own fault, if we think God is afar off; it is because we judge by outward appearance, we stand afar off from God by our unbelief, and then complain God stands afar off from us.

II. A very great indignation against sin, the sins that made the time perilous, 2 Tim. 3: 1. He beholds the transgressors, and is grieved, is amazed, and brings to his Heavenly Father their evil report, as one that laid to heart that which is offensive to God, and all good men, and earnestly desired a reformation of manners. Passionate and satirical invectives against bad men do more hurt than good; if we will speak of their badness, let it be to God in prayer, for He alone can make them better. This long representation of the wickedness of the wicked, is here summed up in the first words of it, v. 2. where two things are laid to their charge, pride and persecution; the former the cause of the latter. The psalmist, having begun this description, presently inserts a short prayer in a parenthesis, an advantage, and no prejudice, to the sense, v. 2. These two heads are here enlarged upon.

1. They are very proud, and extremely conceited; justly, therefore, did he wonder God did not speedily appear against them, for He hates pride, and resists the proud. Men will not seek after God, because they think they have no need of Him, their own hands are sufficient for them; they think it a thing below them to be religious, because religious people are few, and despised, and the restraints of religion will be a disparagement. Tell one of God's authority over him, he turns it off with this, that he never saw God, (v. 5.) and therefore does not know that there is a God; tell him of God's judgments, which will be executed on those that go on still in their trespasses, and he will not be convinced that there is any reality in them; they are far above out of his sight, therefore he thinks they are mere bugbears. He proudly despises all his enemies, whom God is preparing to be a scourge and ruin to him. But

David's name is not prefixed to this Ps.; yet it probably was composed by him, with reference to the persecution, he and the church of God suffered during the reign of Saul: but it is applicable to similar cases in every age. SCOTT.

Verses 2—11.

Several of the Pss. seem intentionally to have been written in general terms, that they might serve to direct the devotions of the church in persecution, and those of every believer, in his personal troubles and afflictions.—Pride and ambition caused Saul to envy and hate David, as one who had eclipsed his glory, and who was appointed by God to the kingdom, as 'the man after his own heart;' therefore he persecuted him. (1 Sam. 18:6—11. 20:31.)—The Jewish priests, scribes, and rulers hated Christ and his apostles, because their ignorance and hypocrisy were exposed, and their authority endangered, by his clear and convincing instructions, his answers to their objections, and his holy example: and the same general principle has made way for the persecution of the humble and zealous servants of God in all ages. But the Psalmist predicted, (for the original is in the future tense, 'They shall be taken, &c.') that his enemies would ruin themselves, instead of him. —Saul at length avowed and boasted of his desire of murdering David, which at first he concealed: and he 'blessed the covetous,' who courted favor by betraying him. But God abhorred such men; as indeed they resembled Judas who sold his Lord.—Saul, with evident haughtiness, refused to submit to the decree of God made known by Samuel, or to seek his favor; and in his subsequent conduct, he acted as an infidel or an atheist. He became grievously cruel and oppressive in his government, especially when he murdered the priests. (1 Sam. 22: 14—19.) God's judgments were out of his sight: he believed nothing about them; and, growing more presumptuous by impunity, he scorned all those as enemies, who opposed his rage. His conversation became a mixture of profaneness, perjury, violent imprecations, and deceit; and he was continually avowing his base and mischievous purposes. (1 Sam. 20:30—33.) Personally, and by his agents, he watched for David in every place where he was likely to surprise him; being bent on murdering a poor fugitive who had never injured him, as much as a hungry lion is on seizing his prey. Nay, he even seemed to pay court, and humble himself, to David and others, as well as to stoop to the meanest practices, that he might get him within his reach, and murder him by one of his captains. This deliberate plan of virulent opposition to one whom God had expressly marked out as the object of his special favor, could be the result of nothing but contempt of God, and practical atheism. as it is impolitic to despise an enemy, so it is impious to despise any instrument of God's wrath. He proudly sets trouble at defiance, and is confident of the continuance of his own prosperity; v. 6. Isa. 47: 7. Rev. 18: 7. Those are nearest ruin, who thus set it farthest from them.

2. They are persecutors, cruel persecutors: where there is a heart full of malice, there is commonly a mouth full of curses, v. 7. they are very false and treacherous. Mischief designed, is hid under the tongue, not to be discerned, for his mouth is full of deceit and vanity; he has learned of the devil to deceive, and so to destroy; with this his hatred is covered, Prov. 26: 26. He cares not what lies he tells, nor what oaths he breaks, nor what arts of dissimulation he uses to compass his ends. Such are cunning and crafty in carrying on their designs. He sits in the lurking places, lest the discovery of his designs should be the breaking of them. Perhaps it refers particularly to robbers and highwaymen, who lie in wait for honest travellers, to make a prey of them and what they have, very cruelly. Their malice is against the innocent, who never provoked them; the poor, who cannot resist; and over whom it will be no glory to triumph. He will be the destroyer of those whose guardian he ought to be. What they aim at is, to get the poor into their power, not to strip only, but to murder them; they hunt for the precious life. The devil, whose agent the wicked is, is compared to a roaring lion, that seeks not what, but whom, he may devour. Base and hypocritical, v. 10. He crouches, and humbles himself, as beasts of prey to get their prey within their reach. This intimates, that the sordid spirits of persecutors and oppressors will stoop to any thing, though ever so mean, to compass their wicked designs; witness the scandalous practices of Saul, when he hunted David. It intimates likewise, that they cover their malicious designs with the pretence of meekness and humility, and kindness to those to whom they design mischief. They are impious and atheistical, v. 11. When conscience rebuked such an one for his wickedness, threatened him with its consequences, and asked, how he would answer it to the righteous Judge, he turned it off with this, God has forsaken the earth, Ezek. 8: 12.—9: 9. a blasphemous reproach on God's omniscience and providence, on his holiness and the rectitude of his nature, on his justice and the equity of his government; as if, though He did see and dislike their wickedness, He would never reckon with the wicked, either because He could not punish, or durst not, or was not inclined.

In singing this, and praying it over, we should have our hearts much affected with a holy indignation at the wickedness of the oppressors, a tender compassion for the oppressed, and a pious zeal for the glory and honor of God, with a firm belief that He will, in due time, right the injured.

V. 12—18. David here, on the foregoing representation of the inhumanity and impiety of the oppressors, grounds an address to God: wherein observe,

I. He prays that God would Himself appear, v. 12. 'Arise, O Lord; O God, lift up thine hand; manifest thy presence and providence, to the confusion of those who say Thou hidest thy face; for the maintaining of thine own cause, and to give a fatal blow to these oppressors; let thine everlasting arm be made bare for thy people.' 'Their oppressors, in their presumption, say Thou hast forgotten them; and they, in their despair, are ready to say the same; Lord, make it to appear that both are mistaken.' 'Appear against their persecutors,' v. 15. to disable them from farther mischief; and to deal with them for the mischief they have done.

II. What he pleads, to encourage his own faith in these petitions.

1. The great affronts these proud oppressors put on God Himself, v. 13. The psalmist here speaks with astonishment, (1.) At the wickedness of the wicked; it is a great trouble to good men, to think what contempt is cast on the holy God by sinners, on his precepts, his promises, his threatenings, his favors, his judgments. Wherefore do the wicked thus contemn God? It is because they do not know Him. (2.) At the patience and forbearance of God toward them; 'Why are they suffered?' It is because the day of reckoning is yet to come, when the measure of their iniquity is full.

2. The notice God took of the impiety and iniquity of these oppressors, v. 14.

3. The dependence of the oppressed on Him; The poor commits himself unto Thee, each of them does so, I among the rest. They leave themselves with Thee, (so some,) 'not prescribing, but subscribing, to thy wisdom and will. They thus honor Thee, as much as their oppressors dishonor Thee. They are thy willing subjects, and put themselves under thy protection; therefore protect them.'

4. The relation God is pleased to stand in to us As King for ever and ever, v. 16. A king administers justice, and protects. To whom should the injured subjects appeal, but to the sovereign? As the Helper of the fatherless, v. 14. of those who have no one else to help, and many to injure them. He has appointed kings to defend the poor and fatherless, 82: 3. therefore much more will He do it Himself; He has taken it among the titles of his honor, to be a Father to the fatherless, 68: 5. a Helper of the helpless.

5. The experience God's church and people had had of God's readiness to appear for them. He had dispersed and extirpated their enemies, v. 16. probably the Canaanites are referred to. He had heard and answered their prayers, v. 17. 'Lord, thou hast many a time heard the desire of the humble, and never saidst to a distressed supplicant, Seek in vain.' Why may not we hope for the continuance and repetition of the wonders, the favors, our fathers told us of?'

6. Their expectations from God, pursuant to their experience of Him; 'Thou hast heard, therefore Thou wilt cause thine ear to hear, as 6: 9. Thou art the same, thy power, and promise, and relation to thy people; and the work and workings of thy grace in them; why may we not hope that He who has been, will still be, will ever be, a God hearing prayer?' But observe, (1.) In what method God hears prayer. He first prepares the heart of his people, and then gives them an answer of peace; nor may we expect his gracious answer, but in this way; so that God's working upon us, is the best earnest of his working for us. The preparation of the heart is from the Lord, and we must seek unto Him for it, Prov. 16: 1. and take that as a leading favor. (2.) What He will do, in answer to prayer, v. 18. He will plead the cause of the persecuted; judge for the fatherless and oppressed, clear up their innocency, restore their comforts, and recompense all their loss and damage. He will put an end to the fury of the persecutors. See how light the psalmist now

Verses 17, 18.

The encouragement to be derived from the readiness, which God had ever shown, to answer the prayers of the humble; the reason of this condescension to them in particular, because their prayers sprang from hearts prepared by his special grace; (Rom. 8:24—27. Jam. 5:16—18. Jude 20, 21.) the pleasure, so to speak, which He took in listening to them; and the deliverances in consequence granted to his church by crushing worldly oppressors; are circumstances replete with instruction and encouragement. makes of the power of that proud persecutor, and how slightly he speaks of him, now that he had been considering God's sovereignty. He is but a man of the earth, a man out of the earth, so the word is; therefore mean, weak, and hastening to the earth again. Why then should we be afraid of his fury? He is but man that shall die, a son of man that shall be as grass. When God speaks the word, Satan shall by his instruments no more deceive, (Rev. 20: 3.) no more oppress.

In singing these vs. we must commit religion's just, but injured, cause to God, as heartily concerned for its honor and interests, believing He will, in due time, plead it with jealousy.

Ps. XI. This Ps. is supposed to have been penned, when David began to feel the resentments of Saul's envy, and had had the javelin thrown at him once and again. He was then advised to run his country; 'No,' says he, 'I trust in God, and therefore will keep my ground.' In time of public fears, when the insults of the church's enemies are daring and threatening, it will be profitable to meditate on this Ps. Here is,

V. 1—3. 1. David's fixed resolution to make God his confidence, v. 1. It is the character of the saints, who have taken God for their God, that they make Him only their Hope: therefore, when second causes frown, yet their hopes do not fail them, because the First Cause is ever the same. The psalmist, before he gives an account of the temptation he was in to distrust God, records his resolution to trust in Him, as what he was resolved to live and die by.

2. His resentment of a temptation to the contrary; 'How say ye to my soul, which has thus returned to God as its Rest, and reposes in Him, Flee as a bird to your mountain? to be safe there, out of the reach of the fowler.' This may be taken, either,

(1.) As the serious advice of his timorous friends; so many understand it, and with great probability. Some, when they saw how much Saul was exasperated against him, and how maliciously he sought his life, pressed him by all means to flee, and not to depend too much on his anointing. What grieved him in this, was, not that to flee now would savor of cowardice, and ill become a soldier, but that it would savor of unbelief, and ill become a saint, who had so often said, In the Lord put I my trust. Taking it thus, the two following vs. contain the reason with which these faint-hearted friends of David backed this advice. They would have him flee, because he could be no longer safe or useful where he was. 'Observe,' say they, 'how Saul and his instruments aim at thy life, and the uprightness of thine heart will not be thy security.' 'Alas, it is to no purpose to attempt the saving of a kingdom so wretchedly shattered by Saul's mal-administration, (75: 3. 82: 5.); whatever the righteous can do, signifies nothing.' Many are hindered from doing the service they might do to the public, in difficult times, by a despair of success.

(2.) It may be taken as a taunt of his enemies, upbraiding him with the professions he used to make of confidence in God, and scornfully bidding him try what stead that would stand him in now. The confidence and comfort the saints have in God, when all the hopes and joys in the creature fail them, are a riddle to a carnal world, and ridiculed accordingly.

Taking it thus, the two following vs. are David's answer to this sarcasm; in which he complains of the malice of those who did thus abuse him, v. 2. and resists the temptation with a gracious abhorrence, v. 3. He looks upon this suggestion, as striking at the foundations which every Israelite builds upon. The principles of religion are the foundations on which the faith and hope of the righteous are built. These we are concerned, in interest, as well as duty, to hold fast against all temptations to infidelity; for if these be destroyed, if we let these go, What can the righteous do? Good people would be undone, if they had not a God to go to, a God to trust to, and a future bliss to hope for.

V. 4—7. David's enemies' attempt to discourage his confidence in God, only made him cleave so much the closer to his first principles; hence we are here called to consider,

1. That there is a God, a God in heaven. Let not the enemies of the saints insult over them, as if they [had no resort.] Or, He is in his holy temple, i. e. in his church; a God in covenant and communion with his people, through a Mediator, of whom the temple was a type. God is nigh us, in his Word; his Spirit is in his saints, those living temples, and the Lord is that Spirit.

2. That this God governs the world; the Lord has not only his residence, but his throne, in heaven, and he has set the dominion thereof in the earth; for, having prepared his throne in the heavens, his kingdom ruleth over all. Hence the heavens are said to rule, Dan. 4: 26. Let us by faith see God on his throne, his throne of government, giving law, motion, and aim to all the creatures; his throne of judgment, rendering to every man according to his works; his throne of grace, to which his people may come boldly for mercy and grace; we shall then see no reason to be discouraged by the pride and power of oppressors, or any afflictions of the righteous.

3. God is said to try with his eyes, and his eyelids, because He knows men, not as earthly princes, by report and representation, but by his own

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

It is a sad mark of a reprobate mind, when men glory in those desires, principles, and practices, which are really shameful. (Phil. 3: 17—19.)—Nothing is more hateful to God, more contrary to true religion, or more prolific of other crimes, than covetousness. Yet many who are severe against sins of inferior malignity, favor and speak well of the covetous; too often, it is to be feared, from covetousness in themselves. But persecutors are most liable to this; for the tools which they employ, are generally those who sell their souls, and would, if they had the opportunity, sell Christ Himself, 'for filthy lucre.' (Matt. 26: 14—16, 57—62. Acts 6: 9—14. 1 Tim. 6: 6—10.)—Pride, however, is especially the image of Satan, and the root of apostasy. From this source, no doubt, originates a great part of that enmity and contempt, which infidels express against the inoffensive disciples of Christ. Full of self-conceit, they affect to be thought wiser, and are ambitious of being greater, than other men. They consider Christianity and its zealous friends as standing in the way [of these lusts]; and in opposing them, they bring ruin on themselves.—Indeed, all our deliberate sins spring from unbelief, forgetfulness, or contempt of God; and our hearts are prone to atheism itself. From heaven alone will all sin and temptation be excluded: no Canaanite shall find entrance there; no lust shall then remain in the heart of any inhabitant; no imperfection will be known; but all shall be complete in love, purity, and joy. PSALM XII.

David, lamenting the decay of godliness, and the prevalency of deceit, craves help from God, 1, 2. He predicts the destruction of flatterers, proud boasters, and oppressors, 3—5. He comforts himself in assurance of divine protection, grounded on the faithful promises of God, notwithstanding the triumph of the wicked, 6—8.

strict inspection, which cannot err, or be imposed on. This may comfort us when deceived in men, even in men we think we have tried.

4. That, if He afflict good people, it is for their trial, and therefore for their good, v. 5. The Lord tries all men, that He may do them justice; but the righteous, that He may do them good in their latter end. Let not that therefore shake our foundations, or discourage our hope and trust.

5. That, however persecutors and oppressors may prosper and prevail awhile, they now lie under, and will for ever perish under, the wrath of God. He that hates nothing He has made, yet hates those who have ill-made themselves. Hammond offers another reading of this v. The Lord trieth the righteous and the wicked; (distinguishes infallibly between them, which is more than we can do;) and he that loveth violence hateth his own soul, i. e. persecutors bring certain ruin on themselves, Prov. 8: 36. as follows here. Their punishment will be inevitable and very terrible, v. 6. Here is a double metaphor, to denote the unavoidableness of the punishment. It shall be rained from heaven, Job 20: 23. against which there is no fence, and from which no escape; see Josh. 10: 11. 1 Sam. 2: 10. It shall surprise them, as a sudden shower sometimes surprises the traveller in a summer's day. It shall be as snares on them, to hold them fast, and keep them prisoners, till the day of reckoning comes. It is fire and brimstone, and a horrible tempest, which plainly alludes to the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, and very fitly, for that destruction was intended for a figure of the vengeance of eternal fire, Jude 7. What a horrible tempest are the wicked hurried away in, at death! What a lake of fire and brimstone must they make their bed in for ever, in the congregation of the dead and damned! That is it that is here meant, and shall be the portion of their cup, the cup of trembling, which shall be put into their hands, which they must drink the dregs of, 75: 8. Every man has the portion of his cup assigned him. They who choose the Lord for their Portion, shall have what they choose, and be for ever happy in their choice, 16: 5. but they who reject his grace, shall be made to drink the cup of his fury, Jer. 25: 15. Isa. 51: 17. Hab. 2: 16.

6. That, though honest, good people may be run down, and trampled on, yet God does and will own, and favor them; and that is reason why God will severely reckon with persecutors and oppressors, because those whom they oppress and persecute are dear to Him; so that, whosoever toucheth them, toucheth the apple of his eye, v. 7. He loves them, and the work of his own grace in them. Himself a righteous God, He loves righteousness wherever He finds it. He, like a tender Father, looks upon them with pleasure, and they, like dutiful children, are pleased and abundantly satisfied with his smiles.

In singing this Ps. we must encourage and engage ourselves to trust in God at all times, depend on Him to protect our innocence, and make us happy, dread his frowns as worse than death, and desire his favor as better than life.

Ps. XII. It is supposed David penned this Ps. in Saul's reign, when there was a general decay of honesty and piety both in court and country, which he here complains of to God, and very feelingly, for he himself suffered by the treachery of his false friends, and the insolence of his sworn enemies: it is certainly calculated for a bad reign; and perhaps David, in spirit, foresaw that some of his successors would bring things to as bad a pass as is here described.

V. 1—8. This psalm furnishes us with good thoughts for bad times, in which, though the prudent will keep silent, (Am. 5: 13.) because a man may be made an offender for a word, yet a man may comfort himself with such suitable meditations and prayers.

I. Let us see here, what makes the times bad, and when they may be said to be so. The children of this world, will tell you scarcity of money, decay of trade, and the desolations of war; but the Scripture lays the badness of the times on causes of another nature, 2 Tim. 3: 1. Perilous times shall come, for iniquity shall abound; and that is what David here complains of. The times are bad, 1. When there is a general decay of piety and honesty among men, v. 1. Observe how the godly and the faithful are here put together. As there is no true policy, so there is no true piety, without honesty. Godly men are faithful; their word is as confirming as their oath, as binding as their bond; they make conscience of being true both to God and man. They are here said to cease and fail, either by death, or by desertion, or by both: so that there were few or no good people: perhaps he means among Saul's courtiers; or, there were few in comparison; a general decay of religion and virtue. 2. When dissimulation and flattery have corrupted and debauched all conversation, v. 2. when men are generally so profligate, that they make no conscience of a lie, so spiteful as to design the worst of mischiefs, and yet so base as to cover the design with the most specious and plausible pretences, and professions of friendship, as Joab to Abner and Amasa in David's own time, smile in your face, and cut your throat. This is the devil's image complete, a complication of malice and falsehood. The times are bad indeed, when there is no sincerity to be met with, and an honest man knows not whom to believe, nor whom to trust, nor dares confide in a friend, in a guide, Mic. 7: 5, 6. Jer. 9: 4, 5. Wo to those who help to make the times thus perilous. 3. When the enemies of God, and religion, and religious people, are impudent and daring, and threaten to run down all that is just and sacred; when proud sinners are arrived at such a pitch of impiety as to say, 'With our tongue

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The servant of God, though tempted to desert his post, should abide in his place and at his work, though it expose him to many dangers and difficulties: and the honor of God, the interests of his people, and regard to consistency of character, require eminent persons to expose themselves more, in times of persecution, than their inferiors are called to do. Let it not be thought, that, in times of prevailing iniquity, when all regard to the laws of God and man is discarded, the righteous can do no good. 'All is not over, while there is a man left to reprove error, and bear testimony to the truth; and a man, who does it with becoming spirit, may stop a prince, or senate, when in full career, and recover the day.'—'No place on earth is out of the reach of care and trouble. Temptations are every where; and so is the grace of God.' Bp. Horne.—The upright and zealous servants of God are indeed peculiarly exposed to the malice of wicked persecutors, who commonly have power on their side; but what has he to fear, who has a righteous cause, a rejoicing conscience, an almighty Friend, and a faithful promise on his side? The Arabs call it Samoom. —The wind of the plague, so the Syr.—Jahn says it blows in Persia, Babylonia, Arabia, and the deserts of Egypt, in June as well as in July and August; and in Nubia, in March, April, Sept. Oct. and Nov.—The indications of its approach are distant clouds, slightly tinged with red, in appearance like the rainbow; also a rushing noise; though of the last circumstance some make no mention: note, Job 37:9. CONCLUDING NOTE. 'In v. 1. David expostulates with those who advise him to flee; vs. 2 and 3. give the reasons of his friend's advice; vs. 4, 5, 6, 7, reply to them.' Green. 'The dialogue form of the Ps gives it great spirit and beauty.' DODD.

PSALM XIII.

David mournfully complains, that God delays to comfort and deliver him; and prays for help, that his enemy might not insult over him, 1—4. Trusting in the mercy of God, he expects to rejoice, and to sing his praises, 5, 6.

To the  chief Musician, A Psalm of David.

1 [a] HOW long wilt thou [b] forget me, O LORD? for ever? [c] how will we prevail against the cause of virtue, our lips are our own, and we may say what we will; who is lord over us, either to restrain us, or to call us to an account?' v. 4. This bespeaks a proud conceit of themselves, and an insolent contempt of God's dominion, as if he had no propriety in them. Our lips are our own—an unjust pretension, for who made man's mouth, in whose hand is his breath, and whose is the air he breathes? Their language would intimate, He has no authority either to command, or to judge them; Who is Lord over us? Like Pharaoh, Ex. 5: 2. This is as absurd and unreasonable as the former, for He, in whom we live, and move, and have our being, must needs be, by an indisputable title, Lord over us. 4. When the poor and needy are oppressed, and abused, and puffed at: this is implied, v. 5. where God Himself takes notice of the oppression of the poor, and the sighing of the needy; see 10: 5. 5. When wickedness abounds, and goes barefaced, under the protection and countenance of those in authority, v. 7. When the vilest men are exalted to places of trust and power, who, instead of putting the laws in execution against vice and injustice, and punishing the wicked according to their merits, patronise, protect, [and share with them,] and support their reputation, by their own example; then the wicked walk on every side, they swarm in all places, and go up and down seeking to deceive, debauch, and destroy, neither afraid nor ashamed to discover themselves; there is none to check or control them. Bad men are base men, the vilest of men, and they are so, though ever so highly exalted in this world. Antiochus the illustrious, the Scripture calls a vile person, Dan. 11: 21. But it is bad with a state, when such are preferred; no marvel if wickedness then grows impudent and insolent. When the wicked bear rule, the people mourn.

II. Let us now see what good things we are here furnished with for such bad times; and what times we may yet be reserved for, we cannot tell. 1. We have a God to go to, from whom we may ask and expect the redress of all our grievances. This he begins with, v. 1. 2. God will certainly reckon with false and proud men, will punish and restrain their insolence. Some translate it as a prayer, 'May God cut off those false and spiteful lips;' Let lying lips be put to silence. 3. God will, in due time, deliver his oppressed people, and shelter them from the malicious designs of their persecutors, v. 5. Now will I arise, saith the Lord. This promise of God, is an answer to David's petition, v. 1. When oppressors are in the height of their pride and insolence, and the oppressed in the depth of their distress and despondency, then is God's time to appear for them, as for Israel, when they were most dejected, and Pharaoh most elevated. Note, There is a time fixed for the rescue of oppressed innocency; so that, on the whole, it shall lose nothing by sufferings. 4. Though men are false, God is faithful; though they are not to be trusted, God is: his are pure words, v. 6. not only all true, but all pure. It denotes the sincerity of God's Word; its preciousness, and the many proofs that have been given of its power and truth; it has been often tried, all the saints in all ages have trusted it, and have all set to their seal that God's Word is true. Probably, this refers especially to these promises of succoring and relieving the poor and oppressed. The less confidence is to be put in men's words, let us with the more assurance trust in God's Word. 5. God must secure his chosen remnant to Himself, how bad soever the times, v. 7. This intimates, that, as long as the world stands, there will be a generation of proud and wicked men in it, who will threaten by their wretched arts to ruin religion. But God will keep his own people from this generation; from being debauched by them and drawn away from God; from being destroyed and rooted out by them. In the worst of times, God has his remnant, and in every age will reserve to Himself a holy seed, and preserve that to his heavenly kingdom.

In singing this Ps. and praying it over, we must bewail the general corruption of manners, thank God things are not worse, but pray and hope they will be better in God's time.

Ps. XIII. V. 1—6. This Ps. is the deserted soul's case and cure. Whether it was penned on any particular occasion, does not appear. David, in affliction, is here pouring out his soul before God; his address is short, but the method is very observable, and of use for direction and encouragement.

I. His troubles extort complaints, v. 1, 2. and 102: title. It is some ease to a troubled spirit, to give vent to its griefs, especially at the throne of grace, where we are sure to find One who is afflicted in the afflictions of his people, and troubled with the feeling of their infirmities; thither we have boldness of access by faith, and there we have freedom of speech. David complains,

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The decrease of piety, and the prevalence of iniquity, form the worst times, in the judgment of the spiritually-minded.—When apostasies, superstitions, and damnable heresies corrupt the church, or when persecutions waste it, and when infidels and profligates triumph; then the believer thinks the times very bad, however otherwise peaceful and prosperous. But by these very things He will be excited to call upon God, who can and will deliver, when human help is vain.—Honesty and sincerity will not long survive piety in any place. But He who made man's mouth, will cut off the flatterer as well as the slanderer, and the proud infidel as well as the covetous oppressor. He will also rise to revive his church. He hath promised, and his Word is more pure and precious than the finest silver. Let us rest upon it, and comfort our souls with it; though we cannot but grieve to see the degeneracy of the times, and the abounding of iniquity and infidelity. SCOTT.

practised without fear or shame.—Dissimulation, flattery, profane and arrogant boastings, treachery, and calumny, were the general recommendations of the superior people in Israel, to the favor of their king and his courtiers; and the infection spread rapidly among all orders of men. Forgetful of God, to whom they were indebted for the gift of speech, and for what purpose it was given, and of their accountableness to Him, they considered their tongues as their own, to be employed as they pleased; and they thought to carry all before them, by their wit, eloquence, flatteries, or calumnies. When such vile men as Doeg and his party, (the dregs of the human race,) were advanced to great authority, the wicked were emboldened to show themselves, and encouraged openly to avow their corrupt principles, and practise every kind of iniquity. 1. Of God's unkindness; so he construed it, and it was his infirmity. He thought God had forgotten him, his promises to him, his covenant with him, his former loving-kindness He had showed him, which he took to be an earnest of farther mercy. Thus Zion said, My God has forgotten me; Israel said, My way is hid from the Lord. Not that any good man can doubt the omniscience, goodness, and faithfulness, of God; but it is a peevish expression of prevailing fear, which yet, when it arises from a high esteem and earnest desire of God's favor, though it be indecent and culpable, shall be passed by and pardoned, for the second thought will retract it, and repent of it. God hid his face from him, so that he wanted that inward comfort in God which he used to have, and herein was a type of Christ on the cross, crying out, My God, why hast thou forsaken Me? God sometimes hides his face from his own children, and leaves them in the dark concerning their interest in Him: and this they lay to heart more than any outward trouble whatsoever.

2. He was racked with care: anxious cares are heavy burdens, with which good people often load themselves more than they need. He was overwhelmed with sorrow, had a constant disposition to it, so it preyed on his spirits; not only in the night, when he was silent and solitary, but by day too, when lighter griefs are diverted and dissipated by conversation and business; nay, every day. The bread of sorrows is sometimes the saint's daily bread; our Master Himself was a Man of sorrows.

3. His enemies' insolence. Saul, his great enemy, and others.

He expostulates with God hereupon; 'How long?' Long afflictions try our patience, and often tire it: and a common temptation it is then to think it will last always; despondency then turns into despair, and persons long without joy, begin, at last, to be without hope.

II. His complaints stir up his prayers, v. 3, 4. We should never allow ourselves to make any complaints, but what are fit to be offered up to God, and what drive us to our knees. Observe here,

1. His petitions; Consider my case, hear my complaints, and lighten mine eyes. What revives the drooping spirits, is said to enlighten the eyes, 1 Sam. 14: 27. Ezra 9: 8.

2. His pleas. He mentions his relation to God and interest in Him; O Lord my God; and insists on the greatness of the peril, which called for speedy relief and succor. If his eyes were not enlightened quickly, he concludes he must perish. Nothing is more killing to a soul than the want of God's favor, nothing more reviving than the return of it. His enemies, too, would triumph.

III. His prayers are soon turned into praises, v. 5, 6. What a surprising change in a few lines! See the power of faith, the power of prayer, and how good it is to draw near to God. If we bring our cares and griefs to the throne of grace, and leave them there, we may go away like Hannah, and our countenance will be no more sad. Observe the method of his comfort.

1. God's mercy supports his faith. 'In former distresses, his mercy has in due time relieved me, and my confidence in it has in the mean time supported me. Even in the depth of this distress, I trusted in the mercy of God; and that was as an anchor in a storm.' And still 'I do trust in thy mercy;' so some. This he pleads with God, knowing what pleasure He takes in those that hope in his mercy.

2. His faith in God's mercy filled his heart with joy in his salvation; joy and peace come by believing, Rom. 15: 13. 1 Pet. 1: 8. Having put his trust in the mercy of God, he is fully assured of salvation, and that his heart, now daily grieving, should rejoice in that salvation. Though weeping endure long, joy will return.

3. His joy in God's salvation would fill his mouth with songs of praise, v. 6. But he speaks of it as a thing past; He has dealt bountifully with me; because by faith he had received the earnest of it, and was confident of it, as if done already.

In singing this Ps. and praying it over, if we have not the same complaints David had, we must thank God we have not, dread and deprecate his withdrawings, sympathize with the troubled in mind, and encourage ourselves in our most holy faith and joy.

Ps. XIV. V. 1—3. It does not appear on what occasion this Ps. was penned, nor whether on any particular occasion. Some say, when Saul persecuted David; others, when Absalom rebelled. But they are mere conjectures, which have not certainty enough to warrant us to expound the Ps. by them. The apostle, in quoting part of it, Rom. 3: 10, &c. to prove that Jews and Gentiles are all under sin, v. 9. and that all the world is guilty before God, v. 19. leads us to understand it, in general, as a description of the depravity of the human nature, and the deplorable corruption of a great part of mankind, even of the world that lies in wickedness, 1 John 5: 19. But as in those Pss. designed to discover our remedy in Christ, there is commonly an allusion to David, yea, and some passages to be understood primarily of him, as in 2: 16: 22: and others; so in this, designed to discover our wound by sin, there is an allusion to David's enemies and persecutors, and other oppressors of good men at that time, to whom some passages have immediate reference. In all the

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The most eminent believers are sometimes left to great discouragement, either for the chastisement of their sins, or the trial of their faith. At such times, their fervent expostulations with God will very frequently be tinged with unbelieving fears. They inwardly take counsel about ascertaining the state of their souls, discovering the cause of their troubles, or devising how to obtain deliverance; but all seems in vain: every day appears an age, while continual sorrow oppresses their hearts; and they are ready to trouble themselves with the idea, how Satan and their other enemies are triumphing in their fallen state. All this however is intended for their humiliation; that they may search out and repent of their sins, renounce every false confidence and worldly idol, and be made more fervent in prayer. And it may be of use to the tempted and discouraged believer to recollect, that the Savior, soon after his doleful complaint, 'My God, my God, why hast Thou forsaken me?' subjoined, 'It is finished;' and, 'Father, into thy hand I commend my spirit:' and that the depth of his humiliation immediately preceded the dawn of his glorious exaltation. (Matt. 27: 46, 50. John 19: 28—30.) SCOTT.

'was before his great sin, and so he was full of confidence; but that of Absalom after it, which made him cry out in this doleful manner.' Patrick.—Whatever enemy the Psalmist especially meant, Satan, our common enemy, was not forgotten. SCOTT.

(2.) Shall I have counsel in my soul.] 'Seems to express the condition of a mind distressed with its own reflections. Boothr. tr. "How long shall I be distressed in mind?" Evidently, the act of a painful rumination is here described.' MORISON.

(3.) 'Give me wisdom to find out proper measures for my safety, and cheer my spirits; lest I die with grief, or my enemy destroy me.' Dr. WELLS, in D'Oyly and Mant.

Verses 5, 6.

David here owns his unworthiness, as well as misery: but as salvation originated from God's rich mercy to sinners; and as he was conscious his whole dependence was placed on that mercy, and not in any claim on divine justice; he took courage from this consideration, and rising above his distresses, became confident he should soon rejoice in God. SCOTT.

(6.) Hath dealt bountifully.] The verb is more frequently rendered reward or recompense, but a gracious recompense is intended, when good received from God is spoken of; and this is 'dealing bountifully. (62:12.) ID.

Pss., from the 31 to this, except the 8th, David had been complaining of those that hated and persecuted, insulted and abused him; now here he traces all those bitter streams to the fountain, the general corruption of nature, and sees that not his enemies only, but all men, were thus corrupted. If we apply our hearts, as Solomon, to search out the wickedness of folly, even of foolishness and madness, these vs. will assist, and show us that sin is exceeding sinful. Sin is the disease of mankind, and appears here to be malignant and epidemical.

1. How malignant, v. 1. in two things,

(1.) The contempt it puts on the honor of God; something of practical atheism being at the bottom of all sin. We are sometimes tempted to think, 'Surely there never was so much atheism and profaneness as in our days;' but we see the former days were no better. Observe, The sinner here described; he is one that saith in his heart, There is no God: in his heart, it is not his judgment. He cannot satisfy himself there is none, but he wishes there were none, and pleases himself with the fancy, that it is possible there may be none; he cannot be sure, but is willing to think there is none. He dares not speak it out, less he be confuted, and so undeceived, but whispers it secretly in his heart, to silence his conscience, and embolden himself in evil. His character is that of a fool, simple, unwise; and this is an evidence of it: he is wicked and profane; and this is the cause of it. Note, Atheistical thoughts are very foolish, wicked thoughts, and at the bottom of a great deal of the wickedness in the world. The Word of God is a discerner of these thoughts, and puts a just brand on him that harbors them. Nabal is his name, and folly is with him; for he thinks against the clearest light, against his own knowledge and convictions, and the common sentiments of all the wise and sober part of mankind. No man will say, There is no God, till he is so hardened in sin, that it is become his interest that there should be none, to call him to an account.

(2.) The disgrace and debasement it puts on man's nature. Sinners are corrupt, quite degenerated from what man was in his innocent estate; They are become filthy, v. 3. putrid. All their faculties are so disordered, they are become odious to their Maker, and utterly incapable of answering the ends of their creation. They are corrupt indeed; they do God no service, bring Him no honor, nor do themselves any real kindness; their works are abominable, Jer. 44: 4. and, sooner or later, will be found to be hateful, 36: 2. making desolate, Matt. 24: 15. This follows on their saying, There is no God: for they that profess they know God, but in works deny Him, are abominable, and to every good work reprobate, Tit. 1: 16.

2. How epidemical; the disease has infected the whole race. To prove this, God Himself is here a Witness, an Eye-Witness, v. 2, 3. Observe, His inquiry and its result, v. 3. Upon search, the apostasy appeared universal. Till the free and mighty grace of God has wrought a change, whatever good is in any, or done by them, it is not of themselves, but God's work in them. When God had made the world, He looked upon his own work, and all was very good; but, some time after, he looked upon man's work, and, behold, all was very bad, Gen. 6: 5. every operation of the thought of man's heart was evil, only evil, and that continually. In singing this, let us lament the corruption of our own nature, and see our need of grace; and since what is born of the flesh is flesh, let us not marvel that we must be born again.

V. 4—7. In these vs. the psalmist endeavors,

1. To convince sinners of the evil and danger of their way, how secure soever they seem in it. Three things he shows them; (1.) Their wickedness; described in four instances. They are themselves workers of iniquity; they design it, practise it, and take as much pleasure in it as ever any man in his business; nay, it is their meat and drink to persecute, they eat up God's people; they do it easily, daily, securely, without either check, or remorse of conscience; as Joseph's brethren cast him into a pit, and then sat down to eat bread: such is their innate and inveterate enmity, and so heartily do they desire their ruin, because they really hate God. See Mic. 3: 2, 3. They call not upon the Lord. Note, Those that care not for God's people, for God's poor, care not for God Himself. The reason people run into all manner of wickedness, even the worst, is, they do not call on God for his grace. What good can be expected from those that live without prayer? They shame the counsel of the poor, and upbraid them with making God their Refuge, as David's enemies upbraided him, 11: 1. Note, Those are very wicked indeed, and have a great deal to answer for, who not only live without religion themselves, but say and do what they can to put others out of conceit with it, that are well-inclined. Those that banter religion and religious people, will find, to their cost, it is dangerous persecuting those that make God their Refuge. Be ye not mockers, lest your bands be made strong. (2.) Their folly; They have no knowledge; this is obvious. (3.) Their danger, v. 5. There were they in great fear; there, where they ate up God's people, their own consciences condemned what they did, and filled them with secret terrors. Many instances there have been of proud and cruel persecutors, who have been made like Pashur, Magor-missabibs—Terrors to themselves, and all about them. They that will not fear God, perhaps may be made to fear at the shaking of a leaf.

2. He endeavors to comfort the people of God, (1.) With what they have; they have God's presence, v. 5. He is in the generation of the righteous; they have his protection, v. 6. The Lord is their Refuge. (2.) With what they hope for; the salvation of Israel, v. 7. When David was driven out by Absalom and his rebellious accomplices, he comforted himself with an assurance, that God would in due time turn again his captivity, to the joy of all his good subjects. But surely this pleasing prospect looks farther; salvation from sin, own and of the Jewish interpreters refer it to the times of the Bab. captivity.—Whether this or Ps. 53. is repeated, and which of the two is genuine, or original, cannot be determined.' ROSENM.

Verse 1.

This Ps. is thought to have been written on Absalom's rebellion, and the people's defection from their aged and pious king; and the mention of Zion, as the place whence salvation was to come, (7) shows that it was composed some time after David came to the kingdom over all Israel. From the degeneracy of Israel shown in that instance, the Psalmist takes occasion to lament the entire depravity of human nature: and the Ps. is almost entirely the same as the 53d.—The word fool, in Scripture, denotes one who not only is destitute of true wisdom, but who hates it; the openly ungodly and wicked man. (M. R. a.) Persons of this description, 'like not to retain God in their knowledge,' and therefore 'say in their hearts, No God.'—This is the real history of the rise and progress of atheism, that deepest stigma of human nature. Man, having done abominable works, being conscious of guilt, and bent on further transgression, expects nothing but wrath from God, and so runs into atheism for a shelter from terror and alarm: unless idolatry, or some species of false religion, can be rendered equally efficacious in quieting the conscience, and giving encouragement in sin. And, as speculative atheism is the offspring of a depraved heart and vicious life, it also tends to increase wickedness: thus the fatal infection spreads, and produces degeneracy and profligacy. (Rom. 1:28—32.) SCOTT.—For ever.] 'Better, entirely—so Gesenius, after Luther and other German critics.' MORISON.

Verses 2, 3.

This must be understood of man left to himself, man as he is by nature, without regeneration. (Rom. 3:9—20.)—Between this v. and that which follows, three vs. are inserted in the version used in the Common Prayer Book, which are taken from some copies of the Sept.: for in other copies they are not found, any more than in the Heb. and Syr. The apostle in Rom. 3: has the same vs.; and it is evident he selected them from several parts of the O. T., especially from Pss. 5. 36. 140. and Is. 59: probably therefore some transcriber of the Sept. inserted those vs. from that remarkable passage of the apostle. SCOTT.

Verses 4—6.

Every kind of wickedness will, in the event, be found contrary to prudence and wise self-love. SCOTT.

Verse 7.

The more fully and deeply David experienced and witnessed the depravity of man, and the disposition of Israel to apostatise; the more fervently he longed and prayed for the salvation of Israel; by which it is reasonable to suppose, that he did not merely intend Israel's deliverance from bondage, or from subjection to foreign enemies or domestic usurpers: nor his own restoration to the throne, and return to the courts of God; but especially the promised kingdom and salvation of the Messiah. Salvation.] The Heb. nearly the same as JESUS. that great salvation which should be wrought out by the Redeemer, who was expected to come to Zion, to turn away ungodliness from Jacob. The triumphs of Zion's King will be the joys of Zion's children. The second coming of Christ, finally to extinguish the dominion of sin and Satan, will be the completing of this salvation, which is the hope, and will be the joy, of every Israelite indeed; with the assurance of that, we should, in singing this, comfort ourselves, and one another, with reference to the present sins of sinners, and sufferings of saints.

Ps. XV. V. 1—5. The scope of this short but excellent Ps. is, to show us the way to heaven, and to convince us, that, if we would be happy, we must be holy and honest. Christ, who is Himself the Way, and in whom we must walk as our Way, has also showed us the same way that is here prescribed, Matt. 19: 17. If thou wilt enter into life, keep the commandments. Here is,

I. A very serious and weighty question concerning the character of a citizen of Zion, v. 1. This supposes it is a great privilege to be a citizen of Zion, an unspeakable honor and advantage; that a remnant only are thus privileged; and they not by their birth and blood; but, according as their hearts and lives are. It concerns us all to put this question to ourselves, Lord, what shall I be, and do, that I may abide in thy tabernacle? Luke 18: 18. Acts 16: 30.

1. This inquiry is addressed to God Himself. Note, Those that would find the way to heaven, must look up to God, take direction from his Word, and beg direction from his Spirit. It is fit He Himself should give laws to his servants, appoint the conditions of his favors, tell who are his, and who not.

2. It is expressed in Old Testament language. By the tabernacle we may understand the church militant, typified by Moses' tabernacle, fitted to a wilderness-state, mean and movable. Who shall dwell in this tabernacle? Who shall be accounted a true, living member of God's church? We are concerned to inquire this, because many pretend to a place in this tabernacle, who really have no part nor lot in the matter. By the holy hill we may understand the church triumphant, alluding to mt. Zion, on which the temple was to be built by Solomon. It is the happiness of glorified saints, that they dwell there, they shall be for ever there. It concerns us to make this sure to ourselves, then rejoice in prospect of it.

II. A very plain and particular answer. Those that desire to know their duty, with a resolution to do it, will find the Scripture a very faithful director, and conscience a faithful monitor. Let us see then the particular character of a citizen of Zion.

1. He is sincere and entire in his religion; He walketh uprightly, according to the condition of the covenant, Gen. 17: 1. 'Walk before Me, and be thou perfect,' (it is the same word here,) 'then thou shalt find Me a God All-sufficient.' He is really what he professes to be, is sound at heart, and can approve himself to God, in his integrity, in all he does; his conversation is uniform, and he is of a piece with himself, and endeavors to stand complete in all the will of God. His eye perhaps is weak, but it is single; he has his spots indeed, but does not paint; an Israelite indeed, in whom is no guile, John 1: 47. 2 Cor. 1: 12. I know no religion, but sincerity.

2. He is conscientiously honest and just in all his dealings, faithful and fair to all with whom he has to do. He worketh righteousness; is just both to God and man; and, in speaking to both, he speaks that which is the truth in the heart; his prayers, professions, and promises to God, come not out of feigned lips, nor dares he tell a lie, or so much as equivocate, in his converse or commerce with men: he reckons that that cannot be a good bargain, nor a saving one, which is made with a lie, and that he who wrongs his neighbor, will prove, in the end, to have done the greatest injury to himself.

3. He does all the good he can to his neighbors; but is very careful to hurt no man. He is especially careful not to injure his neighbor in his good name, v. 8. though many who would not otherwise wrong their neighbors, make nothing of that; if any man, in this matter, bridles not his tongue, his religion is vain. He knows the worth of a good name, therefore he backbites not, defames no man, speaks evil of no man, makes not others' faults the subject of his common talk, much less of his sport and ridicule, nor speaks of them with pleasure, nor at all but for edification; he makes the best of every body, and the worst of nobody. He frowns on a backbiting tongue, and so silences it, Prov. 25: 23. If an ill-natured character of his neighbor be given him, or an ill-natured story be told him, he will disprove it, if he can; if not, it shall die with him, and go no farther. His charity will cover a multitude of sins.

4. He values men by their virtue and piety, not by their figure in the world, v. 5. (1.) Wicked people are vile people, worthless and good for nothing; so the word signifies; dross, chaff, salt that has lost its savor; they are vile in their choices, Jer. 2: 13. in their practices, Is. 32: 6. For this, wise and good men contemn them, not denying them civil honor and respect as men, as men in

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

If the thoughts of ungodly persons were detected and published, as they will be at the day of judgment, how vile would they appear! (1 Cor. 4: 3—5.)—Men differ in their peculiar propensities* and outward characters: but are all naturally carnal, alienated from God, destitute of true wisdom, incapable of things spiritually good, gone aside from the right way, and corrupt in their desires and imaginations: therefore all would have gone further, and sunk deeper in 'abominable works,' continually and eternally, if it had not been for the inestimable redemption of Jesus Christ. We should be thankful, if we have been restrained from the more destructive excesses, into which so many are hurried; but we ought not to rest in any thing short of union with Christ, and a new creation unto holiness by his Spirit. If we have experienced this blessed change, let us give the Lord all the glory; and let us pity and pray for our fellow sinners.—The enmity of the human heart against God appears, not only from man's proud aversion to call on his name, but from the delight, which in all ages men have taken, in persecuting his inoffensive people.—All our acquaintance with the depravity of human nature, should endear to us 'salvation out of Zion.' SCOTT.

* Rather, all have the same number of propensities, &c. but these differ in force in different individuals: and the influence of the selfish and animal appetites, &c. predominates in all men. Ed.

NOTES.

Ps. XV. 'The Ps. is highly important, as it shows the exalted character of that morality which was demanded of God's ancient people, and which the acknowledged principles of their faith were eminently fitted to promote.' MORISON.

Verse 1.

Probably as soon as the ark was stationed on Zion, the Psalmist addressed himself to God; desirous of being taught who would be the accepted and persevering worshipper at his tabernacle. (Heb. 12:22—25.) It is not inquired, what are the grounds of a sinner's acceptance with God: on this subject we are fully instructed in other parts of Scripture; but the question is virtually this: Who is he, that so worships God in this world, as to have a well grounded hope of eternal life hereafter? And the answer is evidently in perfect consistency with the N. T. and especially with John's first epistle, viz. 'They may be distinguished by their sanctification.' (1 John 2:3—6, 28—29. 3:4—10, 18—24. 5:1—5.) Thus believers are conformed in their measure to Christ, the perfect Exemplar: and the character, here given of them, forms a beautiful contrast to that of ungodly men, as delineated in the preceding Ps. (M. R.) SCOTT.

'The fruits meet for repentance;' 'the work of faith, and labor of love, and patience of hope,' 'the fruits of the Spirit,' and 'the things which accompany salvation,' are here compendiously enumerated, or rather pointed out, in some of the most striking and observable particulars. SCOTT.

Verse 4.

'The vile person' is an openly wicked and ungodly man, who renders himself base and contemptible by his crimes. (1 Sam. 25 23—31. Dan. 11: 21. M. R.)—The Sept. render the last clause, 'He that sweareth to his neighbor, and changeth not; which requires only a little alteration in the pointing. SCOTT.—'The original affords, unquestionably, the sense also of the former Eng. tr. ANN.—'He that will not be honest without an oath, will not with one.' Dr. A. CLARKE.

Verse 5.

The concluding clause of this v. in the original, is emphatical. 'He that doeth these things shall not be moved for ever,' i. e. to eternity SCOTT.—Usury.] 'The Heb. is derived from a word denoting the act authority and power perhaps, 1 Pet. 2: 17. Rom. 13: 7. but, in their judgment of them, agreeing with God's Word. So far from envying, they pity them, despising their gains, Isa. 33: 15. as turning to no account; their dainties, 141: 4. their pleasures, Heb. 11: 24, 25. as sapless and insipid. They despise their society; 119: 115. 2 K. 3: 14. their taunts and threats; the feeble efforts of their impotent malice, 2: 1, 4. and will shortly see their fall, 53: 6, 7. God despises them, and they are of his mind. (2.) He thinks the worse of no man's piety, for his poverty and meanness, but He knows them that fear the Lord. With him serious piety, wherever found, honors a man, and makes his face to shine, more than wealth, or wit, or a great name among men, does, or can. By this, we may judge of ourselves in some measure, What rules do we go by in judging of others?

5. He always prefers a good conscience before any secular interest or advantage whatsoever; v. 4. See how weak-sighted and short-sighted even wise and good men may be; they may swear to their own hurt, which they were not aware of when they took the oath: but see how strong the obligation of an oath is, that a man must rather suffer loss to himself and his family, than wrong his neighbor by breaking his oath. An oath is a sacred thing, which we must not think to play fast and loose with.

6. He will not increase his estate by any unjust practices, v. 5. (1.) Not by extortion; He putteth not out his money to usury, that he may live at ease on the labors of others, while in a capacity for improving it by his own industry. Not that it is any breach of the law of justice or charity, for the lender to share in the profit which the borrower makes of his money, any more than for the owner of the land to demand rent from the occupant, money being, by art and labor, as improvable as land: [and, when laws do not interfere, as much an article of merchandise.] But a citizen of Zion will freely lend to the poor, according to his ability, and not be rigorous and severe in recovering his right from persons reduced by Providence. (2.) Not by bribery.

III. The Ps. concludes with a ratification of this character of the citizen of Zion; He is like Zion-hill itself, which cannot be moved, but abides for ever; 125: 1. temptations shall not overcome him, troubles shall not overwhelm him, nothing shall rob him of his present peace, or his future bliss.

In singing this, we must teach and admonish ourselves, and one another, to answer the character here given of the citizen of Zion.

Ps. XVI. V. 1—7. This Ps. has something of David in it, but much more of Christ. It begins with such expressions of devotion as may be applied to Christ; but concludes with such confidence of a resurrection, so timely as to prevent corruption, as must be applied to Christ only, and not to David, as both Peter and Paul have observed, Acts 2: 24.—13: 36. David speaks of himself as a member of Christ, and so speaks the language of all good Christians; he speaks of himself as a type of Christ, and so it is the language of Christ Himself, to whom all the rest of the Ps. from v. 7. is expressly, and at large, applied, Acts 2: 25, &c.

Michtam, some translate golden; and so the Ps. is, very precious, more to be valued by us than gold; because it speaks so plainly of Christ, the true Treasure hid in the field of the O. T.

1. David here flies to God's protection with a cheerful, believing confidence in it, v. 1. 'Those that by faith commit themselves to the divine care, and submit themselves to the divine guidance, have reason to hope for the benefit of both. This is applicable to Christ, who prayed, Father, save Me from this hour, and trusted in God that He would deliver Him.

2. He recognises his solemn dedication of himself to God, as his God. v. 2. Note, It is the duty and interest of every one of us, to acknowledge the Lord for our Lord, to subject ourselves to Him, and then to stay ourselves upon Him. Adonai signifies my Stayer, the Strength of my heart. This must be done with our souls. Covenanting with God must be heart-work; all that is within us must be employed and engaged. Those who have avouched the Lord for their Lord, should be often putting themselves in mind of what they have done; stand to it, abide by it, take the comfort of it, and live up to it.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

We should all, with hearts devoutly lifted up to God in prayer, inquire who they are, that so 'walk with Him in his ordinances and commandments,' as to possess a well-grounded assurance of dwelling with Him in heaven for ever. If we would ascend after our risen Savior to that holy habitation, we must copy his example; for 'without holiness no man shall see the Lord.' This will both evidence our title to 'the inheritance of the saints in light,' and prepare us for it. If we be indeed born again, and led by the spirit of Christ, we shall bring forth 'the fruits of the Spirit, in all goodness, righteousness, and truth.' Unfeigned piety; constant and conscientious integrity in all our dealings; sincerity and fidelity in all our professions and engagements; and abhorrence of slander in all its hateful forms; a carefulness not to injure any man, in body or soul, in his connections, property, reputation, or peace; a mind deeply humbled before God in self-abasement for sin, yet superior to flattering or fawning on wicked men from selfish motives; and disposed to love and honor the image of God in the poorest and meanest of his people; a willingness to recede from every personal advantage, rather than seem to do evil; and, at the same time, a determination to adhere scrupulously to duty and conscience; a disposition to keep at the utmost distance from oppression and injustice, and to cultivate humanity and benevolence to the poor and afflicted; a union of all these tempers, and this habitual conduct, can spring only from repentance of sin, faith in the Savior, and love to his name and cause; and therefore they form an unequivocal proof of our acceptance in Him. 'He that doeth these things shall not be moved to eternity.'

NOTES.

Ps. XVI. 'A hymn prophetically descriptive of the Messiah; as expressing his abhorrence of the general idolatry of mankind, and his own zeal for the honor of Jehovah: with the full assurance of his being raised from the dead, before his body should be corrupted in the grave. That David did not here speak of himself, but of the Messiah, and of him only, is asserted, Acts 2:25—32. 13:35—37. And if this Ps. speaks in a literal sense concerning an actual and speedy resurrection; by that same literal sense David himself is necessarily excluded.' Kennicott, in Dr. J. P. SMITH. 'The entire Ps. is replete with interest, as applied to the Lord Jesus; in its different parts it is He that speaks by the mouth of David; and the difficulties involved in this principle of interpretation may be all obviated, by keeping constantly in view the distinction between the divine and human natures of the Messiah.'

MORISON.

Title.] Probably David began his meditation with reference to his own case: but he was carried out beyond himself to use expressions prophetical of the Messiah, and indeed he seems to have known, that the Holy Spirit intended much greater things than any of his personal concerns. In this view, it may be considered, as, throughout, the soliloquy of Christ. SCOTT. 'D'Herbelot observes of the works of seven of the most excellent Arabian poets, that they are called Al Modhahebat, i. e. golden, because written in letters of gold [note, Job 29.] on Egyptian paper.—Might not the six Pss. thus distinguished, viz. this and Pss. 55—60. be so called from their having been, on some occasion, written in letters of gold, and hung up in the sanctuary?' *Cot. Even the perfect righteousness of the Savior can add nothing to the essential glory and happiness of the Father; but it is the meritorious cause of the acceptance, and sanctification, and eternal felicity of his people, in whom alone of Adam's race He greatly delights. 3. He devotes himself to the honor of God, in the service of the saints, v. 2, 3. Observe, 1. Those that have taken the Lord for their Lord, must, like Him, be good, and do good; we do not expect happiness without goodness. 2. We cannot pretend to merit any thing; Our goodness extends not to God. The wisest, and best, and most useful men in the world, cannot be profitable to God, Job 22: 2.—35: 7. David owns it, 1 Chr. 29: 14. 3. If God be ours, we must, for his sake, extend our goodness to those that are his; for what is done to them, He is pleased to take as done to Himself, having constituted them his receivers. Note, There are saints on earth; and such we must all be, or we shall never be saints in heaven; such are renewed by the grace, and devoted to the glory of God: these are excellent, great, mighty, magnificent, yet some were so poor, they needed David's goodness. God makes them excellent by grace. The righteous is more excellent than his neighbor, and then he accounts them excellent. Their God is their Glory. All that have taken the Lord for their God, delight in his saints as excellent ones, because they bear his image, and because He loves them. David, though a king, was a companion of all that feared God, 119: 63. It is not enough to delight in the saints, but, as there is occasion, we must show them kindness, and abound in the labor of love to them. This is applicable to Christ. The salvation He wrought out for us was no gain to God; but the goodness and benefit of it extend to us men. For their sakes, says He, I sanctify Myself. Christ delights even in the saints on earth, notwithstanding their weaknesses and manifold infirmities, which is a good reason why we should.

4. He disclaims all false gods, and all communion with their worshippers, v. 4. Thus must we hate idols and idolatry with a perfect hatred. Some make this also applicable to Christ and his undertaking, showing the nature of his sacrifice: it was not the blood of bulls and goats, offered according to the law, (that was never named,) but his own; showing also the multiplied sorrows of the unbelieving Jews, who hastened after another king, Cæsar, and are still hastening after another Messiah in vain.

5. He repeats his solemn choice, v. 5. takes to himself the comfort of it, v. 6. and gives God the glory of it, v. 7. This is very much the language of a devout and pious soul in its gracious exercises. (1.) Choosing the Lord for its Portion and Happiness. 'Let me have the love and favor of God, and be accepted of Him; and I have enough, I need no more, I desire no more, to complete my felicity.' Would we do well and wisely for ourselves, we must take God, in Christ, to be the Portion of our inheritance in the other world; and the Portion of our cup, our nourishment and refreshment, in this. Those have not God for theirs, who do not reckon his comforts the most reviving cordials, and use them as sufficient to balance all grievances, to sweeten the most bitter cup. (2.) Confiding in Him to secure this portion; 'Thou maintainest my lot. The saints and their bliss are kept by the power of God. (3.) Rejoicing in this portion, and taking a complacency in it, v. 6. The lines are fallen to me in pleasant places; they have reason to say so, that have God for their Portion. What can they have better? Or desire more? Return unto thy Rest, O my soul, and look no further. Note, Gracious persons, though they still covet more of God, never covet more than God; but, being satisfied of his loving-kindness, are abundantly satisfied with it, envy not any their sensual pleasures and delights, but account themselves truly happy in what they have, and doubt not but to be completely happy in what they hope for. (4.) Thanking God for it, and for grace to make this wise and happy choice, v. 7. So ignorant and foolish are we, that, if left to ourselves, we choose our own delusions, and forsake our own mercies for lying vanities; therefore, if we have indeed taken God for our Portion, and preferred spiritual and eternal blessings before sensible and temporal, we must thankfully acknowledge the power and goodness of divine grace, directing and enabling us to that choice. (5.) Making a good use of it. God having given him counsel by his Word and Spirit, his own reins, his own thoughts, when silent and solitary, his own conscience, called the reins, Jer. 17: 10. not only reflected with comfort on his choice, but instructed or admonished him concerning the duties arising out of it; [note, Job 27: 6.] catechized him, and engaged and quickened him to live as one that had God for his Portion; by faith to live upon Him and to Him. Those who have God for their Portion, and who will be faithful to Him, must give their own consciences leave to deal thus faithfully and plainly.

All this may be applied to Christ; we may also apply it to ourselves, in singing it, renewing our choice of God as ours, with a holy complacency and satisfaction.

V. 8—11. All these vs. are quoted by Peter in his first sermon, after the pouring out of the Spirit on the day of Pentecost; and he tells us expressly, David in them speaks of Christ, and particularly of his resurrection. Something we may allow of the workings of David's own pious and devout affections, but in these holy elevations toward God and heaven he was carried, by the Spirit of prophecy, quite beyond the consideration of himself and his own case, to foretell the glory of the Messiah, in such expressions as were peculiar to that, and could not be understood of himself. The N. T. furnishes but from Thee." Another class, [with whom Morison concurs] consider the Messiah as asserting that the work in which He was engaged was one, the benefit of which did not extend to the Divine Father. So the Sept. "Of my goods thou hast no need." Also the Vulg. and Arab. Ainsw. reads: "My goodness not unto Thee; i. e. extendeth not or pertaineth not to Thee; or is not for Thee." Dr. A. Clarke, "My bounty is not to Thee." ' MORISON.—Pr. Stuart says, 'Most commentators incline to interpret "my goodness," as having respect to the goodness or happiness bestowed on the speaker; not of the good conduct or deeds he has exhibited.' ED.

It is the opinion of learned men, that this Ps. was composed when David lived among the Philistines; and when, perhaps, some of his associates were strongly tempted to join the idolatrous worship they witnessed. But he showed them, that this would certainly bring on them additional miseries, by the just judgment of God—adverting perhaps to Joshua's resolution. (Josh. 24:15.)—We do not read of 'drink-offerings of blood' in any other place. Either it was customary among the idolaters to taste the blood of the victims, (which were often human victims,) before it was poured out in honor of the idol; or they poured the blood, as the Israelites did wine, for a libation, on the sacrifice when burning on the altar: or else the wine, used in idolatrous sacrifices, was as abominable to God, as if the blood itself had been drunk; which, being the atonement for sin, was expressly prohibited to be tasted by the Israelites.—Even the sacrifices at the sanctuary of God at length became an abomination to those who rejected Christ; and to those who hastened after others professing to be the promised Messiah. In like manner the most splendid services of those, who approach God through other mediators than Jesus Christ, whether deceased men or angels, are, as idolatrous, an abomination to God. (Is. 66:3, 4. Col. 2:18, 19. Heb. 10 26, 27.) SCOTT.—Sorrows.] 'It is not a little remarkable, that the word rendered sorrows here, also signifies, as its primary meaning, idols; as if idolatry necessarily involved the misery of its votaries.'—Another god.] Or, "another Messiah," so some. See Dr. A. Clarke and Gill. 'Whether this be the true supplement or not, it conveys a sentiment the truth of which may be read with interest in the long, dark history of the Jewish nation.' MORISON. "Another way." Stuart. ED.—Drink-offerings.] 'The drink-offerings of the Jews were of wine only, Lev. 17:10—14. part of which was poured on the head of the victim; but the heathen offered "drink-offerings of blood, even of human blood, the blood of their enemies." In Dupuis' Journal in Ashantee, mention is made of a wretched tyrant, who delighted in drinking the blood of his enemies. In one instance, he had the body of an enemy bound, laid before him, "and pierced with hot irons; then gathering the blood as it flowed, in a vessel, he drank one half of it, and offered up the rest to his god." Verses 5, 6.

As Canaan was divided by lot and line, these metaphors are used to represent his joy in the favor of God. (78:55. 23:5, 6. Num. 26:53—56 Josh. 13:6.) But the Savior Himself has obtained the most goodly heritage; and his people are admitted to partake of it. (Matt. 25:19—23. Luke 19:11—27. Rev. 3:20—22.) SCOTT.

Verse 7.

The Psalmist's experience, and the immediate communications of wisdom and knowledge he received during his midnight reflections and devotions, concurred with outward instructions, in teaching him to act with prudence and caution, in his difficult circumstances. They likewise combined, in confirming him to choose God for his Portion. In the dark season of adversity and affliction, and when chastened with painful sickness, as well as in the silent hours of the night, heavenly wisdom was communicated to him.—The reins, or kidneys, were considered, by the Israelites, as especially affected by whatever caused uneasiness or satisfaction; nay, they are often spoken of as the seat of reflection and the secret purposes of the soul. David might perhaps have some regard to his own hope and experience, in these vs.: but doubtless Christ was specially intended. ID.

[i] at thy right hand there are [k] pleasures for evermore.

PSALM XVII.

David appeals to God for his integrity, 1—4. He prays to be upheld, and saved from his proud, malicious, and prosperous enemies, 5—14. He chooses the path of righteousness, and expects complete satisfaction when he shall awake in the likeness of God, 15.

Three things bore Him up, and carried Him on thus cheerfully. (1.) The respect He had to his Father's will and glory in what He did; I have set the Lord always before Me. He still had an eye to his Father's commandment, John 10: 18.—14: 31. (2.) His assurance of his Father's presence with Him in his sufferings; He is at my right hand; a present Help to Me, nigh at hand in the time of need. He is near that justifieth Me; Isa. 50: 8. 89: 21. When in his agony, an angel was sent from heaven, to strengthen Him, Luke 22: 43. To this the victories and triumphs of the cross were all owing; it was the Lord at his right hand, that struck through kings, 110: 5. Isa. 42: 1, 2. (3.) The prospect He had of a glorious issue of his sufferings. It was for the joy set before Him, that He endured the cross, Heb. 12: 2. He rested in hope, and that made his rest glorious, Isa. 11: 10. He knew He should be justified in the Spirit by his resurrection, and straightway glorified. See John 13: 31, 32.

3. That He should be brought through his sufferings, and brought from under the power of death by a glorious resurrection. His soul, his human spirit should not be long left, as other men's spirits are, in a state of separation from the body, but should, in a little time, return and be re-united to it, never to part again. Being God's Holy One in a peculiar manner, sanctified to the work of redemption, and perfectly free from sin, He should not see corruption, nor feel it. This implies, that He should not only be raised from the grave, but raised so soon, that his dead body should not so much as begin to corrupt, which, in the course of nature, it would have done, if it had not been raised the third day. Under the law, it was strictly ordered, that those parts of the sacrifices, which were not burnt on the altar, should by no means be kept till the third day, lest they should putrefy, Lev. 7: 15, 18. which perhaps pointed at Christ's rising the third day, that He might not see corruption—neither was a bone of Him broken.

4. That He should be abundantly recompensed for his sufferings, with the joy set before Him, v. 11. He was well assured He should not miss of his glory; in confidence of this, when He gave up the ghost, He said, Father, into thy hands I commit my spirit; and, a little before, Father, glorify Me with thine own Self. He should be received into the presence of God, to sit at his right hand this would be the acceptance of his service, and the recompense of it. Thus, as a reward for his sorrows, He should have a fulness of joy, and pleasures for evermore; not only the glory He had with God, as God, before all worlds, but the joy and pleasure of a Mediator, in seeing his seed, and the success and prosperity of his undertaking, Isa 53: 10, 11.

II. Christ being the Head of the body, the church, these vs. may, for the most part, be applied to all good Christians, who are guided and animated by the Spirit of Christ; and, in singing them, when we have first given glory to Christ, in whom, to our everlasting comfort, they have had their accomplishment, we may then encourage us with a key to let us into the mystery of these lines.

I. These vs. must certainly be applied to Christ; many of the O. T. prophets testified beforehand the sufferings of Christ, and the glory that should follow, 1 Pet. 1: 11. and that is the subject here. It is foretold, as He Himself showed of this, no doubt, among other prophecies in this psalm, Luke 24: 44, 46. that Christ should suffer, and rise from the dead, 1 Cor. 15: 3, 4.

1. That He should suffer and die. This is implied here, when He says, v. 8. I shall not be moved; He supposed He should be struck at, and He prayed the cup might pass from Him. When He says, 'My flesh shall rest,' it is implied, He must put off the body, and therefore must go through the pains of death. It is likewise plainly intimated, his soul must go into a state of separation from the body, and that his body, so deserted, would be in imminent danger of seeing corruption; that he should not only die, but be buried, and abide for some time under the power of death.

2. That He should be wonderfully borne up by the divine power, in suffering and dying: He should not be moved, nor driven off, from his undertaking, nor sink under the weight of it; He should not fail, nor be discouraged, Isa. 42: 4. but should proceed and persevere in it, till He could say, It is finished. And He was not moved, but set his face as a flint, Isa. 50: 7—9. Here am I, let these go their way. Nay, his heart should rejoice, and his glory be glad; He should go on with his undertaking, not only resolutely, but cheerfully, and with unspeakable pleasure and satisfaction; and so He did; witness that saying, Now I am no more in the world, but I come to thee; and that, The cup that my Father has given me, shall I not drink it? and many the like. By his glory is meant his tongue, as appears, Acts 2: 26. For our tongue is our glory, and never more so, than when employed in glorifying God.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Our Lord and Savior has shown us, by his example, how to overcome temptations, and how we may be preserved through trials: we must trust in God, and pour out our prayers before Him, as in Christ reconciled to every believer.—When from our heart we avouch the God of heaven for our Lord, we shall for his sake do good to his people. And, as our righteousness and salvation were the purchase of his blood, we should not be reluctant to deny ourselves, to labor, or to suffer for that purpose.—Not only they who seek after other gods, but those who worship other mediators, and invent other methods of salvation than that revealed in the Scripture, are hastening to multiply their own sorrows: God abhors their pompous and expensive superstitions and services; our great High Priest will not present such sacrifices, nor mention the names of such worshippers, in his continual intercession; and Christians should carefully avoid all fellowship with anti-christian delusions. (Rom. 8:28—39.)—He who has learned to set God before Him, to act as in his presence, and to rely on his watchful care and protection, may be sharply tried and tempted: but he cannot be moved; for the power, which upheld the Savior, is engaged on his side. SCOTT.

(10.) In hell.] Sheol. Acts 2:27—32.—Many learned men interpret the two clauses of this v. to mean exactly the same thing, referring both of them to the body of Christ, laid in the grave, and raised before it saw corruption: but, as the article concerning 'Christ's descending into hell,' in the very ancient form called the apostle's creed, though doubtless of something later date than the apostolical age, is grounded on this expression, and the application of it; it is evident, that the compilers of it supposed, that something further was intended than merely being buried. And the original, as well as the LXX. quoted in the Acts of the Apostles, favors the idea of a distinct meaning in each clause. Both the Heb. word sheol, and the Greek hades, by which it is constantly rendered, denote the state of man, when no longer seen on earth. 'When spoken of the body, the grave;—when of the soul, that state in which the soul is without the body, whether Paradise or Hell, properly so called.' Abp. Usher. The human nature of Christ consisted of body and soul: his soul was, during the space between his death and his resurrection, as certainly in the place of separate spirits, as his body was in the grave; but when He arose, they were both called forth and re-united. (Acts 2:25—32. 13:24—37.) These words are never used, but with respect to men between death and the resurrection; and never concerning angels, or the state of men after the resurrection: nor are they ever used, when the burial or grave of an individual is spoken of. But they are applied, both with respect to the grave and the place of separation, to good and to bad men in general, without much discrimination: and the representation given in the parable of the rich man and Lazarus, seems to place Lazarus as well as the rich man in hades; but in another division of it. (Luke 16:19—31.)—Thus the pagans placed their Elysium adjacent to Tartarus, as two parts in the same region of the dead. SCOTT.—My soul in hell.] 'Bp. Pearson says, "It appears, that the first intention of putting these words into the creed was only to express the burial of our Savior, or the descent of his body into the grave." It is most certain, however, that the phrase was afterwards explained, even by the Christian fathers, of Christ's descent into the place of punishment. See 1 Pet. 3:18, 19. "But that it was actually so, or that the apostle intended so much," the Bp. confesses is not manifest. See also Witsius, who contends, "that Christ descended into hell, the place of torment, is nowhere expressly affirmed in Scripture, nor in the most ancient creeds. The creeds which mentioned the descent, were generally silent with respect to the burial; nor was it without some mistake that both were afterwards joined together." Dr. Smith renders the first clause of this v. (10.) 'Thou wilt not leave my life in the grave," and Kennicott tr. "Thou wilt not abandon my life to the grave."' COTT. BIB.—'The entire context, and the par. pass. Acts 2:27. distinctly prove that hell here simply denotes the grave,—the place of the Redeemer's sepulture; and that my soul was intended to designate that life which actually expired on the cross. It is not denied, that the word rendered soul often denotes the spiritual part of man, as Deut. 26:16. Cant. 1:7. 1 Sam. 1:15. [note, Gen. 2:7.]; but in all such instances the context must determine.' MORISON.

(11.) Fulness.] 'The original denotes the perfection of that bliss which the human nature of the Savior realized when ushered into the divine presence.' ID.

and edify ourselves and one another with them. Hence,

1. Our wisdom and duty is to set the Lord always before us, and at our right hand, wherever we are; and, while we do thus, we shall not be moved either from duty or comfort. Acts 20: 24.

2. If our eyes be ever toward God, our hearts and tongues may ever rejoice in Him; it is our own fault if they do not. If the heart rejoice in God, out of the abundance of that let the mouth speak, to his glory, and the edification of others.

3. Dying Christians may cheerfully put off the body, in a believing expectation of a joyful resurrection; My flesh also shall rest in hope. Our bodies have little rest in this world, but in the grave they shall rest as in their beds, Isa. 57: 2. We have little to hope for from this life, but we shall rest in hope of a better life; we may put off the body in that hope. Death destroys the hope of man, Job 14: 19. but the good Christian has hope in his death, living hopes in dying moments, hopes that the body shall not be left for ever in the grave; Prov. 14: 32. Christ's resurrection is an earnest of ours, if we be his.

4. To die comfortably we must live piously. In this world, sorrow is our lot, but in heaven, joy; here all our joys are empty and defective, but there full; our pleasures here are transient, such is the nature of them, it is not fit they should last long; but those at God's right hand are pleasures for evermore; the [active] pleasures of immortal souls, in the immediate vision and fruition of an eternal God.

Ps. XVII. V. 1—7. David, being in great distress and danger by the malice of his enemies, in this Ps. addresses himself, for shelter, to God, his tried Refuge. Some make him, in this, a type of Christ, who was perfectly innocent, and yet was hated and persecuted; but, like David, committed Himself and his cause to Him that judgeth righteously. This Ps. is a prayer. David was now persecuted, probably, by Saul.

He addresses himself to God, both by way of appeal, Hear the right, O Lord; and, by way of petition, Give ear unto my prayer, v. 1, 6. God gives us leave thus to express our earnest desire of his gracious answers. He pleads, 1. His sincerity. Feigned prayers are fruitless; but if our hearts lead our prayers, God will meet them with his favor. 2. His habit of prayer. It was not his distress and danger now first brought him to his duty; 'I have called upon Thee formerly, v. 6. therefore, Lord, hear me now.' 3. His faith. Believing dependence on God is a good plea to enforce our desires toward Him. Let us now see,

I. What his appeal is; and,

1. The court where he makes it, viz. the court of heaven. 'Lord, I appeal from men to Thee.' This he did in a public remonstrance before Saul's face, 1 Sam. 24: 12. and he repeats it here in his private devotions. Note, (1.) The equity and extent of God's government and judgment are a support to injured innocency. (2.) Sincerity dreads no scrutiny, no, not that of God Himself, according to the tenor of the covenant of grace. Let thine eyes behold the things that are equal. God's omniscience is as much the joy of the upright, as it is the terror of the hypocrites; and is particularly comfortable to those who are falsely accused, and in any wise wronged.

2. The evidence by which he hopes to make good his appeal, viz. the trial God had made of him, v. 3. God's sentence is therefore right, because He always proceeds on his certain knowledge. He knew God had tried him, (1.) By his own conscience, which is God's deputy in the soul. The spirit of a man is the candle of the Lord. He had submitted to the search, and seriously reviewed the actions of his life, to discover what was amiss, but could find nothing of what his enemies charged him with. (2.) By providence; God had tried him by giving a fair opportunity, once and again, to kill Saul; by the malice of Saul, the treachery of his friends, and the many provocations given him; so that, if he had been the man he was represented to be, it would have appeared; but nothing was found against him.

For the further proof of his integrity, he himself notices two things, concerning which his conscience bare him record. [1.] He had fixed a resolution against all sins of the tongue; 'I am purposed and fully determined, in the strength of God's grace, that my mouth shall not transgress.' He does not say, 'I hope it will not,' or, 'I wish it may not,' but, 'I am fully purposed it shall not:' with this bridle he kept his mouth, 39: 1. Note, Constant resolution and watchfulness against sins of the tongue, will be a good evidence of our integrity; If any offend not in word, the same is a perfect man, Jam. 3:2. He does not say, 'My mouth never shall transgress,' for in many things we all offend, but, 'I purpose it shall not;' and He that searches the heart, knows whether the purpose be sincere. [2.] He had been as careful to refrain from sinful actions, v. 4. 'Concerning the common works of men, the actions and affairs of human life, I have, by the direction of thy Word, kept me from the paths of the destroyer.' Some understand it particularly, that he had not been himself a destroyer of Saul, when it lay in his power, nor permitted others to be so, 1 Sam. 26: 9. But it may be taken more generally; he kept himself from all evil works, and endeavored, according to the duty of his place, to keep others from them too. Note, The ways of sin are paths of the destroyer, (Abaddon, and Apollyon,) who ruins souls by decoying them into them. It concerns us all to keep out of these paths of destruction, and it is by the Word of God, as our guide and rule, that we must be kept from them, 119: 9. If we carefully avoid all the paths of sin, it will be very comfortable in the reflection, when in trouble. If we keep ourselves, that the wicked one touch us not with his temptations, 1 John 5: 18. we may hope he shall not be able to touch us with his terrors.

II. His petition.

Messiah, and the true Church, in which view, Jerome and many ancient fathers shared.' MORISON.

Title.] The inscription found at the beginning of many of these sacred hymns, viz. 'A psalm of David,' may literally be rendered 'A psalm to David;' thence some have been led to think he did not write all, or even most of them. But at the head of this Ps. the same mode of expression is used; and consequently if those Pss. were not composed by him, but only addressed to him, this Ps. would be entitled 'A prayer to David.' This shows that our version is so far right; that the translation is of the same import as the original, which means A Psalm, ascribed to David, as its author. SCOTT.—'Most interpreters think this Ps. was composed by David when beset with the snares of Saul and his courtiers; yet in itself it contains nothing that should lead us to think so; and it should seem it ought to be reckoned among the Pss. which complain of the oppressions of the people in general from their enemies, and direct to God for aid to withstand them.' ROSENM.

Verses 1—3.

We shall not fully enter into the spirit of this Ps. unless we place ourselves in the circumstances of David. The whole tenor of it shows, that he has recorded his earnest meditation and prayer, at the most interesting crisis, when Saul, instigated by groundless suspicions, and false accusations, and pursuing him as a traitor, had surrounded him with his troops, and must have seized on him, had not God most wonderfully interposed. Verses 4, 5.

'The works of men,' (of Adam, or of his descendants, as inheriting his fallen nature,) are those works to which they are propense; and among others, they have a strong propensity to 'render evil for evil:' but David had so studied the oracles of God, that by regarding his promises and precepts, he had resisted every temptation to this conduct.—The word, rendered 'destroyer,' signifies a robber or murderer. —In the present circumstances of human nature, the ways of godliness are become slippery paths, through the artifices of Satan, and the snares of the world, combining with 'the sin that dwelleth in us.'—In some of these things David may be considered as a type of Christ: He alone was universally and perfectly free from sin, and could say in the fullest sense, that a heart-searching God could find nothing wrong in Him. In answering such prayers, He acts according to his known character. (Rom. 15:5, 13. Notes, 2 Cor. 7:5—7. Heb. 13:20, 21. 1 Pet. 5:10, 11.) ID.

pleased to hold us, we go no further than He is pleased to lead us, bear us up, and carry us. David had been kept in the way of his duty hitherto, yet he does not think that his security for the future, therefore he prays, 'Lord, still hold me up.' Those that would proceed and persevere in the way of God, must, by faith and prayer, fetch in daily fresh supplies of grace and strength from Him. David was sensible his way was slippery, himself weak, and that there were those who watched for his halting, and would improve the least slip against him, therefore he prays to be kept.

2. For the tokens of God's favor, v. 7. He eyes God, as the Protector and Savior of his people; so he calls Him, and thence takes his encouragement in prayer. It is the character of God's people, that they trust in Him; He is pleased to make them confidants, for his secret is with the righteous. Those that trust in God, have many enemies that seek their ruin; but they have one Friend able against all. The margin reads it, O Thou that savest them which trust in Thee, from those that rise up against thy right hand. Those that are enemies to the saints, are rebels against God and his right hand, therefore, no doubt, He will, in due time, appear against them. See what he expects and desires from God; Show thy marvellous loving-kindness. The word signifies distinguishing, wonderful favors. God's loving-kindness is marvellous, for the freeness and fulness of it; in some instances, it appears, in a special manner, marvellous, 118: 23. and it will certainly appear so in the salvation of the saints, when Christ shall come to be glorified in the saints, and to be admired in all them that believe.

V. 8—15. In these vs. David prays, 1. That he himself might be protected, v. 8. in which is both a prediction of Christ in his humiliation, and a pattern to Christians. Those who put themselves under God's protection, may in faith implore the benefit of it. Nature has wonderfully fenced the eye, and teaches us to guard it. And if we keep God's law as the apple of our eye, Prov. 7: 2. we may expect God will so keep us; for it is said of his people, whoso touches them, touches the apple of his eye, Zech. 2: 8. The similitude of the hen gathering her young under her wings, Christ uses, Matt. 23: 37. 'Hide me under the shadow of thy wings, where I may be both safe and warm.' Or, perhaps, it rather alludes to the wings of the cherubim shadowing the mercy-seat; 'Let me be taken under the protection of that glorious grace which is peculiar to God's Israel.' What David here prays for, was performed to the Son of David, of whom it is said, Isa. 49: 2. that God hid Him in the shadow of his hand, hid Him as a polished shaft in his quiver. David further prays, 'Lord, keep me from the wicked, from men of the world;' 'from being, and doing, like them; and from being destroyed and run down by them.'

2. That all the designs of his enemies, to bring him either into sin or into trouble, might be defeated, v. 13. While Saul persecuted David, how often did he miss his prey, then when he thought he had him sure! And how were Christ's enemies disappointed by his resurrection, who thought they had gained their point when they had put Him to death!

Observe, To encourage his own faith in these petitions, He pleads,

1. The malice and wickedness of his enemies. (1.) 'They are very spiteful and malicious; deadly enemies, that thirst after my heart's blood;' enemies against the soul, so the word is. David's enemies did what they could to drive him to sin, and drive him away from God; they bade him go serve other gods, 1 Sam. 26: 19. therefore he had reason to pray against them. Note, Those are our worst enemies, and we ought so to account them, that are enemies to our souls. (2.) 'They are very secure and sensual, insolent and haughty, v. 10. wrap themselves in their own honor, power, and plenty, and then make light of God, and set his judgments at defiance, 73: 7. Job 15: 27. They wallow in pleasure, and promise themselves that to-morrow shall be as this day. Therefore with their mouth they speak proudly, glorying in themselves, blaspheming God, trampling on his people, and insulting them.' See Rev. 13: 5, 6. 'Lord, are not such men fit to be mortified and humbled, and made to know themselves? Will it not be for thy glory to look upon these proud men and abase them?' (3.) 'They are restless and unwearied in their attempts against me; they compass me about, v. 9. They have now in a manner gained their point, having surrounded us, they track us, follow us close, as the hound the hare; yet they pretend to look another way, and set their eyes bowing down to the earth, as if meditating, and thinking of something else;' or, as some, 'They are watchful and intent to do us mischief; and never slip an opportunity of compassing their design.' (4.) The ring-leader, Saul, is specially bloody and barbarous, politic, and projecting, v. 12. like a lion that lives by prey, and is therefore greedy of it. This is fitly applied to Saul, who sought David on the rocks of the wild goats, 1 Sam. 24: 2. and in the wilderness of Ziph, ch. 26: 2. where lions used to lurk for their prey.

2. The power God had over them: 'Lord, they are thy sword; and will any father suffer his sword to be drawn against his own children?' As this is a reason why we should patiently bear the injuries of men, that they are but instruments in God's hand; so it is an encouragement to us to hope both that their wrath shall praise Him, and that the remainder thereof He will restrain. 'They are thy hand, by which Thou dost chastise thy people, and make them feel thy displeasure.' He therefore expects deliverance from God's hand, because from God's hand came his trouble. There is no flying from God's hand, but by flying to it.

(10.) 'The difficulty will be removed, if we join mouth with what goes before it, rather than with what follows it. It is a poetical or proverbial expression for haughtiness or pride, caused by wealth or great prosperity. The Chal. well paraphrases thus: "Their wealth is multiplied: with their fat they have covered their mouth." Sebas. Castellio says: "Having stuffed their mouth with fat, they speak proudly." ' HAMMOND.—'What a fearful spectacle is a pampered worldling, swelling with rage and contempt against the servants of the Most High!' MORISON. Fat, and fat mouth, are orientalisms, still used to denote haughtiness and pride. See Bush, in loc. ED.

(11.) 'It is a well established fact, that expert huntsmen in the eastern countries are accustomed to regulate their movements by a minute reference to the track of the animals they are pursuing. In this way they determine the age and particular species of the animal; and also whether or not it has passed recently. The enemies of David traced his very footsteps.' MORISON. And see Roberts, who notes similar phrases as still used in the E. The lion, too, like the rest of the feline tribe, stoops with his eyes bowing down to the earth, as he watches the motions of the prey on which he is stealing. This manner may be noticed in the menageries. The bull bows his eyes and stoops, to rush headlong on his enemy. Perhaps the v. alludes to such habits. ED.

(12.) A young lion lurking, &c.] 'It is a well known fact, that while the parent lioness is in quest of food for her cubs, they are left in the deepest possible secrecy. This perhaps led to the mention of the young lion. Or it may refer to the lion in full vigor, when all his wonderful energies, and his subtlety, with every quality, are ready to be exerted, for the destruction of his unwary prey. The lion, it is said, being the terror of all his fellows of the forest, is often obliged to conceal himself with great care in order to catch his prey by surprise The lioness, when rearing her young, is more fierce than the lion.' MORISON.

Verses 13—15.

The Psalmist determined, whatever might be the event, to act as in the immediate presence of God.—The former clause of v. 15. is here interpreted of David's purpose, and only the latter of his prospect. Some explain both to mean his expectation of happiness in the eternal world; yet not excluding his hope of deliverance from his urgent dangers.—The Sept. render the last clause; 'I shall be satisfied in beholding thy glory.' SCOTT.

(13.) Thy sword.] 'If sword connect with wicked, our English renders it according to the sense; but none of the ancient interpreters so understood it. The Chal. have it, "Deliver me from the wicked, which ought to be slain by thy sword;" the Syr. "from the wicked, and the sword," meaning the sword of wickedness. It is not improbable sword should be considered the instrument here, and be joined with deliver me. This perfectly agrees with the context.' Hammond. 'Houbigant r. "Deliver my soul from the wicked one with thy sword;" which Horsley, Horne, Boothr. Dr. A. Clarke, Dathe, and Venema, approve.' MORISON.

It is very comfortable, when we are in fear of the power of man, to see it dependent on, and in subjection to, the power of God; see Isa. 10: 6, 7, 15.

3. Their outward prosperity, v. 14. 'Lord, appear against them. They are entirely devoted to the world, and care not for Thee or thy favor.' The things of the world are their consolation, Luke 6: 24. their good things, Luke 16: 25. their reward, Matt. 20: 13. 'Now, Lord, shall men of this character be supported and countenanced against those who honor Thee, by preferring thy favor before all the wealth in this world, and taking Thee for their portion?' 16: 5. They have abundance of the world. They have enlarged appetites, and a great deal wherewith to satisfy them. The things of this world are called treasures, because they are so accounted; otherwise, to a soul, and in comparison with eternal blessings, they are but trash. They are hid in the several parts of the creation, and hid in the sovereign disposals of Providence. They that fare deliciously every day, have their bellies, not their souls! filled with them. 1 Cor. 6: 13. But they are husks, ashes, wind; Isa. 55: 2. yet most men, having no care for their souls, but all for their bellies, take up with them. They have numerous families, and a great deal to leave to them; and this is their heaven, their bliss, their all. 'Lord,' said David, 'deliver me from them: let me not have my portion with them.'

4. He pleads his own dependence on God as his Portion and Happiness. 'They have their portion in this life, but as for me, v. 15. I am none of them, I have but little of the world. It is the vision and fruition of God I place my happiness in, that is it I hope for, and comfort myself with the hopes of, and thereby distinguish myself from those who have their portion in this life.' Beholding God's face with satisfaction, may be considered, (1.) As our duty and comfort in this world. Clothed with Christ's righteousness, we must by faith behold God's face, and set Him always before us; and, when we awake every morning, we must be satisfied with his likeness set before us in his Word, and with his likeness stamped on us by his renewing grace. (2.) As our recompense and happiness in the other world; with the prospect of that he concluded the foregoing Ps. and so this. That happiness will consist in three things: The immediate vision of God and his glory; I shall behold thy face; the knowledge of God will there be perfected, and the enlarged intellect filled with it. The participation of his likeness; our holiness will there be perfect, 1 John 3: 2. A complete and full satisfaction resulting from all this; I shall be satisfied, abundantly satisfied with it; even that satisfaction will not be perfect till we come to heaven.

Ps. XVIII. This Ps. we had before in the history of David, 2 Sam. 22. Here we have it altered a little, and fitted for the service of the church. It is David's thanksgiving for the many deliverances God had wrought for him; these he desired always to preserve fresh in his own memory, and to diffuse and entail the knowledge of. It is an admirable composition. The poetry is very fine, the images bold, the expressions lofty, and every word proper and significant; but the piety far exceeds the poetry. Holy faith, and love, and joy, and praise, and hope, are here lively, active and on the wing.

V. 1—19. The title gives us the occasion of this Ps.; we are told, also, that it was delivered To the chief musician, or precentor, in the temple songs. Note, The private compositions of good men, designed for their own use, may be serviceable to the public; examples sometimes teach better than rules. David is here called the servant of the Lord, because, with his sceptre, sword, and pen, he greatly promoted the interests of God's kingdom in Israel. It was more his honor, to be a servant of the Lord, than to be the king of a great kingdom; so he himself accounted it, 116. 16. O Lord, truly I am thy servant. In these vs

I. He triumphs in God and his relation to Him The first words of the Ps. I will love Thee, O Lord, my Strength, are here prefixed as the scope and contents of the whole. Love to God is the first and great commandment, because the principle of all acceptable praise and obedience; and this use we should make of all the mercies God bestows on us, our hearts should thereby be enlarged in love to Him. This He requires, and will accept; and we are very ungrateful if we grudge Him so poor a return. An interest in the person loved, is the lover's delight; this he touches on with much pleasure, v. 2. For there is that in God, which is suited to all the exigences and occasions of his people. 'He is my Rock, and

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Believers must follow their Savior, in the way by which He passed through this world to glory; and such men as were his enemies will be theirs also: but He was more hated, insulted, and cruelly entreated, than any of his followers ever were.—Unallowed evil, felt and mourned over, should in nowise weaken their confidence: but without conscious integrity in our conduct towards God and man, such appeals [as David here makes] would be the most impious presumption. The Lord sees us in secret, visits us in the night, and witnesses our conduct in our most secret retirement, when solitude tempts the hypocrite to sin, and when the imagination is apt to roam after forbidden objects: and if He find one indulged and allowed iniquity, He will abhor our feigned devotions. We should therefore purpose not to offend with our lips, or even in our hearts.—We cannot safely depend on our own watchfulness or resolutions, and former upright and consistent behavior.—The profane, the sensual, and the proud, are at all times enemies of the righteous; yet they are not always left to take an active part against them; and Satan is their most deadly foe: he is destitute of compassion, hardened in malice, and replete with subtlety; and concerning him we may pray in assured faith, 'Arise, O LORD, disappoint him, and cast him down; deliver my soul from this wicked one.' Ps. XVIII. 'It is very probable, David prepared this Ps. in the latter part of his life, when now peacefully settled on the throne, and his enemies all around effectually subdued.' Rosenm. Dr. A. Clarke, Gill, &c. 'From N. T. quotations it is perfectly obvious, that this Ps. breathes a prophetic spirit, and alludes to the Messiah; yet it is equally certain, that its primary reference is to the literal David.—Kennicott and Horne apply the whole to Christ.—From the frequent changes of person in it, it is thought by some to be responsive. Those who hold this opinion, consider David as speaking only in those parts where he addresses Jehovah in the second person.—It is impossible to enter on the investigation of this Ps. without feeling, that it is one of the most wonderful of compositions.' Morison.—'The strong current of commentators and critics apply it to Christ.' Verse 1.

The variations, between the copies, (here and in Sam.) seem principally poetical improvements of the style, as few of them materially alter the sense, and several evidently render the composition more elegant. Indeed, the whole Ps. seems one of the most finished poetical compositions, extant in any language.—The word here rendered, 'I will love Thee,' is peculiarly emphatical: 'I will love Thee with my inmost soul, and all its powers, and with the most fervent affections of my heart.'—'I will greatly desire and long after Thee. (63:1—4. 116:1.)—The experience, the aged Psalmist had acquired, of the Lord's faithfulness, power, and love, no doubt excited the lively exercises of admiring and adoring love, as well as gratitude.—Some think David spake in the person of the risen Redeemer, taking a retrospect of his sufferings and triumphs; and the words, in that view, convey a most interesting and animating reflection to the mind of the true Christian. Strength, and Fortress;' i. e. 'I have found Him so, and chosen Him to be so, disclaiming all others, and depending on Him alone to protect me.' Those that truly love God, may thus triumph in Him as theirs, and may with confidence call upon Him, v. 3. This further use we should make of our deliverances, we must not only love God better, but prayer also; call on Him as long as we live, especially in time of trouble, with an assurance, that so we shall be saved; for thus it is written, Whosoever shall call upon the name of the Lord shall be saved, Acts 2: 21.

II. He sets himself to magnify his deliverances, to be the more affected in returns of praise. It is good to observe all the circumstances of a mercy, which magnify the power of God and his goodness to us in it.

1. The more imminent and threatening the danger, the greater the mercy of the deliverance. David now remembered how the forces of his enemies poured in upon him, surrounded him, compassed him about, surprised him, and by that mean were very near seizing him, and when without were fightings, within were fears and sorrows, v. 4, 5. His spirit was overwhelmed, and he looked upon himself as a lost man; see 116: 3.

2. The more earnest we have been with God for deliverance, and the more direct answer it is to our prayers, the more we are obliged to be thankful, v. 6. If we pray as he, we shall speed as he.

3. The more wonderful God's appearances in a deliverance, the greater it is: such were the deliverances wrought for David, in which God's manifestation of his presence and glorious attributes is most magnificently described, v. 7, &c. Little appeared of man, but He appeared a God of almighty power, v. 7. as of old at Sinai. When the men of the earth were struck with fear, then the earth might be said to tremble; when the great men of the earth were put into confusion, then the hills moved. He showed his anger and displeasure against the enemies and persecutors of his people, v. 7, 8. His arrows were his lightnings, v. 14. He showed his readiness to plead his people's cause, and work deliverance for them, v. 10. No opposition, no obstruction, can be given to Him, who rides upon the wings of the wind, on the heavens, for the help of his people, and, in his excellency, on the skies. He showed his condescension, in taking cognizance of David's case, v. 9. did not send an angel, but came Himself, as one afflicted in the afflictions of his people. He wrapped Himself in darkness, yet commanded light to shine out of darkness for his people, (Is. 45: 15.) v. 11.

4. The greater the difficulties in the way of deliverance, the more glorious the deliverance. To rescue David, the waters were to be divided till the very channels were seen; the earth was to be cloven till the very foundations of it were discovered, v. 15—18.

5. What especially magnified the deliverance, was, his comfort was the fruit, God's favor the root and fountain of it, v. 19. 2 Sam. 15: 26. We owe our salvation, that great deliverance, to the delight God had in the Son of David.

In singing this, we must triumph in God, and ed in the past, and not in the future tense.—But perhaps the Psalmist meant to give the feelings and purpose of his heart, while struggling with his difficulties and overcoming them by faith, to which the event corresponded: for the words are plainly future; and a total disregard to the tense should not be supposed without evident necessity. (142: title. Is. 38:9—13. Jon. 2:1, 2.) SCOTT.

(2.) Buckler.] Heb. magen; so v. 30, 35. In 91:4. soherah is tr. 'buckler,' and tsinnah, 'shield:' target is the tr. of kidon, 1 Sam. 17:6. of tsinnah, 1 K. 10:16. Thus several different kinds of shield are mentioned in the SS. These are illustrated by the notes and cuts, Ps. 5:12. Job 15:26. 2 Chr. 25:14, 15. Ex. 17: 10. and 15:4. &c. To these a cut is here added (from 'Tomb 5,' or 'of the Harpers,' at Thebes,) of a royal Egyptian shield, of the largest size used. The jackalls and lions, as well as the partitionings and border, are bright yellow (gold?); the ground is azure (steel?). The quarterings of this curious and splendid buckler, whose bright colors were drawn doubtless long before David's time, remind us of modern heraldry. ED.

Verses 4, 5.

The word rendered 'sorrows,' in these vs. signifies cords, or pangs, especially those of women in travail; and it is translated pangs in the Sept. And as Luke, in recording the apostle Peter's sermon on the day of Pentecost, uses the same word concerning Christ, in respect of his resurrection, where it does not seem so apposite as cords or bonds would have been; it is supposed, that he refers to the Sept. vers. of this Ps. This is an additional proof, that it should be considered chiefly, as prophetical of his conflicts and triumphs. (Acts 2:22—24.) SCOTT.

(4.) Sorrows of death.] 'Some understand the cords or ropes by which dead bodies were lowered into the tomb; I think it is used to denote distress of mind, and figuratively to express evils of the most formidable kind, especially the machinations of a powerful, insulting and distressing foe. The Chal. interprets it of the wicked by whom David was surrounded. And if "cords of the grave," (so Street,) are referred to, I should think the winding of the body in linen, according to Jewish custom, the practice alluded to. See John 11:14,' [and note, Job 40:13.] MORISON.

(5.) Sorrows, (marg. cords) . . . snares.] 'Cords of hades, snares of death.' Boothr. 'Death seems thus personified, also, in 2 Sam. 22:6. Prov. 13:14. 14 27. Matt. 23:33. 'When people are in the article of death, they are said to be caught in the snare of Yama, "the catcher of the souls of men," a Hindoo deity bearing some resemblance to the Charon and Minos of the Egyptians and Greeks. This hideous monster has a large snare in his hand, and rides on a buffalo.' ROBERTS. See the cut, from an original drawing, for which, (with some 90 more, exhibiting the Hindoo gods,) the editor is indebted to the kindness of Rev. Dr. Poor, Am. Miss. at Ceylon. Siva promised Markanda that he should live till 16 yrs. of age; Yama throws his snare upon him, and he flies to, and clasps, for protection, a disgusting image of Siva, who defends him with his trident. The mark of Siva (note, Deut. 32: 5.) is seen on Markanda's forehead. ED.

Verse 6.

This v. also is future in the original. (Note, 2, 3.) It varies from the parallel verse in Sam. by using two nearly synonymous words, for 'called' and 'cried,' while in the other copy the latter is merely a repetition of the former. SCOTT.

Verse 7.

The words 'foundations of heaven,' used in Sam. are here changed for 'foundations of the hills,' or mountains. (M. R.) SCOTT.—Then, &c.] 'It does not appear, from any part of David's history, that there was any such storm as is here described, unless it may be thought that something of this nature is intimated in the account given of his second battle with the Philistines, 2 Sam. 5:23, 34. It is understood, however, that the storm is represented as real, though David, in describing it, has heightened and embellished it with all the ornaments of poetry.' Dr. A. Clarke. Some, as Assemb: Ann. Hammond, take it, not as a simple historical relation, but as a poetical description [only] of God's presence, and concurrence in David's conquests.—Morison thinks, there is here a manifest allusion to the miraculous events at the deliverance from Egypt, and at Sinai, as Henry suggests.

8 There [y] went up a smoke * out of his nostrils, and [z] fire out of his mouth devoured: coals were kindled by it.

9 [a] He bowed the heavens also, and came down: and [b] darkness was under his feet.

10 And [c] he rode upon a cherub, and did fly: yea, he did fly upon the wings of the wind.

11 He made darkness [d] his secret place; his pavilion round about him were dark waters, [e] and thick clouds of the skies.

12 [f] At the brightness that was before him his thick clouds passed, [g] hail-stones and coals of fire.

13 The LORD also [h] thundered in the heavens, and [i] the Highest gave his voice; hail-stones and [k] coals of fire.

14 Yea, [l] he sent out his arrows, and scattered them; and [m] he shot out lightnings, and discomfited them.

15 Then [n] the channels of waters were seen, [o] and the foundations of the world were discovered at thy rebuke, O LORD, [p] at the blast of the breath of thy nostrils.

16 [q] He sent from above, he took me, [r] he drew me out of † many waters.

17 He delivered me from [s] my strong enemy, and from [t] them which hated me: for [u] they were too strong for me.

18 They prevented me [x] in the day of my calamity, [y] but the LORD was my stay.

19 He brought me forth also [z] into a large place: he delivered me, [a] because he delighted in me.

20 The LORD [b] rewarded me according to my righteousness; [c] according to the cleanness of my hands hath he recompensed me.

21 For [d] I have kept the ways of the LORD, [e] and have not wickedly departed from my God.

22 For [f] all his judgments were before me, [g] and I did not put away his statutes from me.

23 I was also [h] upright ‡ before him, and [i] I kept myself from mine iniquity.

24 Therefore hath [k] the LORD recompensed me according to my righteousness, according to the cleanness of my hands § in his eye-sight.

25 [l] With the merciful thou wilt show thyself merciful; with an upright man [m] thou wilt show thyself upright.

26 With the pure thou wilt show thyself pure; and [n] with the froward thou wilt ‖ show thyself froward.

trust in Him: and we may apply it to Christ the Son of David, in his resurrection.

V. 20—28. Here,

1. David reflects, with comfort, on his own integrity, and rejoices in the testimony of his conscience, 2 Cor. 1: 12. His deliverances were an evidence of his integrity, and this was their great comfort. His enemies had misrepresented him, and perhaps, when his troubles continued long, he began to suspect himself; but, when God visibly took his part, he had both the credit and comfort of his righteousness. (1.) His deliverances cleared his innocency before men, and acquitted him from those crimes he was falsely accused of. This he calls rewarding him according to his righteousness, v. 20, 24. He had often appealed to God concerning his innocency; and now God had given judgment on the appeal, as He always will, according to equity. (2.) They confirmed the testimony of his own conscience for him, which he here reviews with great pleasure, v. 21—23. His own heart knows, and is ready to attest it: though conscious of many a false step, yet, if we recover ourselves by repentance, and go on in the way of our duty, it shall not be construed into a departure from our God. Constant care to abstain from that sin, whatever it be, which most easily besets us, and to mortify the habit of it, will be a good evidence for us, that we are upright before God. As David's deliverances cleared his integrity, so did the exaltation of Christ clear his; therefore He is said to be justified in the Spirit, 1 Tim. 3: 16.

2. He takes occasion thence to lay down the rules of God's government and judgment, that we may know not only what God expects from us, but what we may expect from Him, v. 25, 26. (1.) Those that show mercy to others, shall find mercy with God, Matt. 5: 7. Those that are faithful to their covenants with God, and relations to Him, shall find Him all to them He has promised. Those that serve God with a pure conscience, shall find the words of the Lord pure, sure, sweet. Those that resist, and walk contrary to God, shall find He will resist, and walk contrary to them, Lev. 26: 21, 24.

3. Hence he speaks comfort to the humble; 'Thou wilt save the afflicted people:' terror to the proud; 'Thou wilt bring down high looks:' and encouragement to himself; 'Thou wilt light my candle; revive and comfort my sorrowful spirit, recover me out of my troubles, and restore me to peace and prosperity; wilt make my honor bright, which is now eclipsed; guide my way, and make it plain before me, that I may avoid the snares laid for me; wilt light my candle to work by, and give me an opportunity of serving Thee, and the interests of thy kingdom among men.'

So Bp. Lowth and Horne. Morison adds, that the Christian can hardly fail to be reminded of the scenes at Calvary. ED.

Verse 9.

'What can be more overwhelming in sublimity, than the scene here pictured to the mind!' MORISON.

Verse 10.

Two letters in the original, nearly alike, one used in Sam. the other here, make the variation between the two copies: probably it was originally a trivial error of a transcriber. In Sam. it is, 'He was seen upon the wings of the wind.' SCOTT.—'Sternhold and Hopkins' vers. of this sublime stanza has been the subject of just admiration by all biblical critics: "On cherub and on cherubim, Full royally He rode; And, on the wings of mighty winds, Came flying all abroad."—Cherub and Cherubim.] Parkhurst, Hutchinson, and others of the same school, consider these as symbolical representations of the Holy Trinity, and of the union of the divine and human natures in the person of Christ. But may they not be considered [rather] as the symbolical bearers or supporters of the divine throne? and, may they not, as the fit hieroglyphics of power, wisdom and might, represent the ever-watchful and resistless energies of the divine government, especially as administered by legions of angels, swift and powerful to execute the divine will?' ID.

Verse 12.

The brightness of JEHOVAH'S appearance dispersed the 'thick clouds,' which preceded it. The clause 'his thick clouds passed,' is not in Sam. The words 'coals of fire kindled,' are here changed for 'hailstones and coals of fire,' which are also repeated in the next v.; and the M. Rr. show the propriety of the allusion in them. SCOTT.

Verse 14.

Arrows.] 'In Scripture, arrows represent God's various judgments. Here the hail may be referred to. Comp. Jos. 10:11. with Hab. 3.11. MORISON.

Verse 15.

As the grand imagery of this passage more aptly suits the death, resurrection, and ascension of Christ, than any of David's deliverances; (Matt. 27:51—53. 28:1—8. Acts 1:9—12.) so it naturally leads the pious mind to reflect on the awful descriptions given us of the Savior's last coming to judge the world. (2 Thes. 1:5—10. 2 Pet. 3:10—13. Rev. 20:11—15.) SCOTT.—Blast of the breath, &c.] 'Figuratively, that "strong east wind" by which Jehovah caused the sea to go back, and made it dry land, and divided the waters.' ID.

Verse 16.

Many waters.] 'Many waters are employed in Scripture, as the fit emblems of great and sorrowful afflictions, and of mighty, hostile powers.' ID.

Verses 20—24.

'The expressions here, considered as David's, must certainly be confined either to his steadfast adherence to the true worship, in opposition to idolatry, or to his innocency with regard to some particular crimes [as treason, &c.] falsely alleged against him by his adversaries.' HORNE.—'The great question here is, do these vs. admit of a primary reference to the literal David? or are they altogether prophetical, and exclusively belong to the Messiah? They may, doubtless, in a sense, be applied to the son of Jesse; but that they realized their only perfect fulfilment in Him whose life was pure without a spot, may be readily conceded.' ID.

Let those that walk in darkness, and labor under many discouragements, in singing these vs. encourage themselves, that God Himself will be a Light to them.

V. 29—50. In these vs.

I. David looks back, with thankfulness, on the great things God had done for him; and so we, when we set ourselves to praise God for one mercy, should observe the many more with which we have been compassed about, and followed, all our days. He owns the hand of God in all that had contributed to his advancement, to teach us to do likewise, in reviewing the several steps by which we have risen to our prosperity. 1. God had given him all his skill and understanding in military affairs, which he was not bred up to, nor designed for; his genius leading him more to music, poetry, and a contemplative life, v. 34. 2. God had given him bodily strength to go through the business and fatigue of war, v. 32, 39. to that degree, that he could break even a bow of steel, [*] v. 34. What service God designs men for, He will be sure to fit them for. 3. God had likewise given him great swiftness, not to flee from the enemies, but to fly upon them, v. 33, 36, 37. 4. God had made him very bold and daring in his enterprises, and given him spirit proportionable to his strength, v. 29, 33. 5. God had protected him, and kept him safe, in the midst of the greatest perils, v. 35. He had delivered him from the strivings of the people, v. 43. particularly, v. 48. from Saul. 6. God had prospered and succeeded him in his designs; He it was that made his way perfect, v. 32. and it was his right hand, that held him up, v. 35. 7. God had given him victory over his enemies, the Philistines, Moabites, Ammonites, and all that fought against Israel: those especially he means, yet not excluding the house of Saul, and the partisans of Absalom and Sheba. He enlarges much on the goodness of God to him in defeating his enemies, attributing his victories, not to his own sword or bow, or the valor of his mighty men, but to the favor of God, v. 37—39 All the praise is ascribed to God, v. 39. 'Thou hast given me their necks, v. 40. not only to trample on them, as Josh. 10: 24. but to cut them off.' Even those who hated David whom God loved, and were enemies to the Israel of God, in their distress, cried unto the Lord, but in vain; He answered them not. How could they expect He should, when it was He whom they fought against? And when He disowned them, (as He will all those that act against his people,) no other succors could save them, v. 41. Those whom God has abandoned are easily vanquished; Then did I beat them small as the dust, v. 42. But those whose cause is just He avenges, v. 47. and those whom He favors will certainly be lifted up above those that rise up against them, v. 48. 8. God had raised him to the throne, not only delivered him and kept him alive, but dignified him and made him great, v. 35. thy discipline and instruction; so some. The good lessons David learned in his affliction prepared him for the dignity and power intended him; and

[*] The Median and Medo-Persian kings are generally represented on the monuments of Persia, bearing a huge bow (comp. cut, 2 K. 17:6.); and Heeren thinks, this was in compliment to their personal strength, which could bend, with foot or hand, such bows. The bow was, indeed, and still is, in proper hands, a formidable weapon; the story of Jonathan, and other allusions of the SS. as well as the text here, show that much care and pains were spent in training to the use of this weapon: comp. also the notes, 2 Chr. 26:10—15. and see Fleury, 'Manners of Anc. Israelites.' David seems to have had every physical and mental accomplishment. The figure Ulysses' bow makes in Homer is well known; and feats of personal strength and dexterity, as being tokens of superiority most obvious to vulgar eyes, have ever been, and still are, elements of 'glory,' eliciting popular applause. Indeed, as indicative of what careful and persevering education will do for the powers God has endowed us with, strength and skill are, in their place, proper subjects of admiration and gratitude. Ed.

40 Thou hast also given me [m] the necks of mine enemies; [n] that I might destroy them that hate me.

41 They cried, [o] but there was none to save them; even unto the LORD, but he answered them not.

42 Then did [p] I beat them small as the dust before the wind: [q] I did cast them out as the dirt in the streets.

43 Thou hast delivered me [r] from the strivings of the people; and [s] thou hast made me the head of the heathen: [t] a people whom I have not known shall serve me.

44 [] As soon as they hear of me they shall obey me: the [††] strangers shall [‡‡] submit themselves unto me.

45 The strangers shall [u] fade away, and [x] be afraid out of their close places.

Verses 28, 29.

Some apply the expression, 'Thou wilt' or dost, 'light my candle,' which had been extinguished, to the restoration of the Savior from death, in which his body had lain as an extinguished taper; and the act, to his bursting the barriers of the tomb. ID.

(40.) The example of Christ in the temple, &c. shows us that there are times when the propensities to oppose and destroy may be virtuously used; let them never be exerted under the direction of a selfish malice, but when necessary for opposition to, and destruction of evil, let them be ever subordinated to benevolence, conscience, and God's will. See Ps. 35.14, 27, &c. 86:9. 120:7. 139:19—22. 37:3,8,20, &c. 58:10,11, (last clause,) and also Matt. 5:43—48. Mar. 12:30,31. Gal. 5:20. James 1: 20, &c. &c. Thus shall we feel a Christian energy, guarded on the one hand against a weak fear that yields to wrong influences, and neglects duty, and on the other, against a persecuting spirit, which forgets God in self-aggrandizement. the lessening of him helped very much to greaten him. God made him not only a great conqueror, but a great ruler, v. 43. all the neighboring nations were tributaries. See 2 Sam. 8: 6, 11. In all this, David was a type of Christ, whom the Father brought safely and victoriously through his conflicts with the powers of darkness, and gave to be Head over all things to his church, which is his body.

II. David looks up, with humble and reverent adorations of the divine glory and perfection; when God had, by his providence, magnified him, he endeavors, with his praises, to magnify God, to bless and exalt Him, v. 46. He gives honor to Him, 1. As a living God; The Lord liveth, v. 46. We had our lives at first from, and we owe their continuance to, that God who has life in Himself, the living God. 2. As a finishing God; As for God, He is not only perfect Himself, but his way is perfect, v. 30. He is known by his name Jehovah, Ex. 6: 3. a God performing and perfecting what He begins, in providence as well as creation, Gen. 2: 1. If it was God that made David's way perfect, v. 32. much more is his own so. Eccl. 3: 14. 3. As a faithful God; The Word of the Lord is tried. David, in God's providences concerning him, takes notice of the performance of his promises to him, which, as it sweetens the providence, so it honors the promise. 4. As the Protector and Defender of his people. David had found Him so to him; 'He is the God of my salvation, v. 46. by whose power and grace I am, and hope to be, saved; but not of mine only; He is a Buckler to all those that trust in Him, v. 30. He shelters and protects them all, is both able and ready to do so.' 5. As incomparable in all this.

III. David looks forward, with a believing hope that God would still do him good: 1. That He will completely subject his enemies, and cause his government to be extensive, so that even a people whom he had not known should serve him, v. 43. Thus the Son of David, though He sees not yet all things put under Him, yet knows He shall reign till all opposing rule, principality, and power, shall be quite put down. 2. That his seed should be for ever continued in the Messiah, who, he foresaw, should come from his loins, v. 50. He shows mercy to his anointed, his Messiah, to David himself, the anointed of the God of Jacob in the type, and to his seed for evermore. He saith not unto seeds, as of many, but to his Seed, as of one, that is Christ, Gal. 3: 16. It is He only that shall reign for ever, and of the increase of whose government and peace there shall be no end. Christ is called David, Hos. 3: 5. God has called Him his King, 2: 6. Great deliverance God does give, and will give, to Him, and to his church and people, here called his seed for evermore.

In singing these vs. we must give God the glory of the victories of Christ and his church hitherto, and of all the deliverances and advancements of the gospel-kingdom; and encourage ourselves and one another with an assurance, that the church militant will be, shortly, eternally triumphant.

Ps. XIX. Two excellent books the great God has published for the instruction and edification of men; this psalm treats of both, and recommends both to our diligent study: 1. The book of creation, in which we may easily read the power and Godhead of the Creator; 2. The book of the Scriptures, which makes known to us the will of God concerning our duty.

V. 1—6. From the things every day seen by all the world, the psalmist, in these vs. leads us to consider the invisible things of God, whose being appears incontestably evident, and whose glory shines transcendently bright, in the visible heavens, their structure, beauty, order and influence. This instance of the divine power serves not only to show the folly of atheists, but also of idolaters Observe,

I. The creatures plainly speak themselves to be God's handy-works; for they could not exist from eternity, all succession, motion [and composition, note, Gen. 1: 1.] must have had a beginning; they could not make themselves, that is a contradiction; they could not be produced by a casual hit of atoms, that is an absurdity; therefore they must have a Creator, who can be no other than an Eternal Mind, infinitely wise, powerful, and good. Thus it appears they are God's works, the work of his fingers, 8: 3. therefore they declare his glory. From the excellency of the work, we may easily infer the infinite perfection of its great Author. From the brightness of the heavens, we may collect that the Creator is Light; their vastness of extent speaks his immensity; their height his transcendency and sovereignty; their influence on this earth, his dominion and providence, and universal beneficence: and all declare his almighty power, by which they were at first made, and continue to this day, according to the ordinances then settled.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

In David, the type, we may here behold Jesus, our Redeemer, conflicting with enemies, compassed with sorrows, and with 'floods of ungodly men,' (Ps. 22: 11—18. Matt. 27: 39—44.) enduring not only the pains of death, but the wrath of God for us: yet calling on the Father with strong cries and tears; rescued from the grave with a tremendous earthquake, and various convulsions of nature; advanced to the mediatorial throne, and made Head of the heathen, as a recompense of his most perfect obedience even unto death; executing vengeance on the Jewish nation, beating them as small as the dust before the wind, and casting them out as the mire in the streets; and proceeding either to reconcile, or to put under his feet, all other enemies, till death, the last enemy, shall be destroyed. (1 Cor. 15: 20—28.) In the full assurance of these truths, and expectation of his appearing and his glory, we should hasten to submit willingly to his authority, and to embrace his salvation; we should trust in his merits, rejoice in his triumphs, and imitate his example. SCOTT.

people are a willing people, Ps. 110:3. and those whom He conquers, freely obey Him.' POOLE.

Verse 49.

Paul quotes this v. to prove, that the Gentiles would glorify God for his mercy: (Rom. 15:8—13.) and this shows beyond a doubt, that he considered the Ps. as prophetical of Christ, and in some respects as his language. (22:23—31.) Yet it is not advisable to apply every clause to Him, so as to overlook his ancestor and type; who seems to have been led, by the Holy Spirit, from speaking of his own conflicts and deliverances, to use language, which could never have its full accomplishment, but in his promised Seed. SCOTT.—'From the use made of this v. by the apostle Paul, (Rom. 15:9.) there can be no doubt, that, with a reference to the personal feelings of David, on occasion of his signal victories over all his enemies, there combined a prophetic allusion to the joy of the Redeemer, in contemplating the salvation of the Gentile Church. The manner, indeed, in which Paul introduces a reference to this v. would rather induce the supposition, that in the whole of the Ps. there is a mystic adumbration of Christ and the Church.' MORISON.

(49, 50.) 'David is here transported beyond himself to Christ, and therefore justly is this (v. 49.) applied to Him, and to his preaching to, and calling of the Gentiles, Rom. 15:9.' POOLE.

Verse 50.

For evermore.] 'This shows that another David is meant, with another kind of posterity, and another sort of kingdom. From the family of David came the man Christ Jesus. His posterity are genuine Christians; his kingdom, in which they are subjects, is spiritual. This government shall last through all time, and extend through eternity; for that is the kingdom of glory in which Jesus Christ reigns on the throne of his Father, and in which his followers shall reign with Him for ever and ever.' Dr. A. CLARKE.

NOTES.

Ps. XIX. 'On account of the sudden transition from the works to the law of God, I once suspected the Ps. was made up of two; but as it is not easy to see why it should be so, and as such transitions are frequent in Hebrew and Arabian poets, the supposition is not necessary. When the Ps. was composed, cannot be shown with any probability.' ROSENM.

Verse 1.

This Ps. seems especially to have been intended to prove, that the idolatry and irreligion of mankind were wholly inexcusable. SCOTT. It was an old idea, that the heavens, or 'firmament,' were a solid hollow sphere, which revolved round the earth, and carried the sun, planets and stars with it. The later Arab cosmology had first and lowest, earth; then water; then air; then fire; then ten heavens, one above another, viz. the emerald heaven (with bird-shaped angels, and their president); the gemmy (with eagle-shaped do. and do.); the hyacinthine (vulture-shaped do. do.); the silver (horse-shaped do.); the gold (girl-shaped); the pearly (do.); 7th. the light or lucid (human-shaped do); 8th. the heaven full of angels. the firmament; 9th. enclosed space full of angels; 10th. great sea without bound. The Syrians had first, earth; then water; then air; then fire; then 10 expanses, 9 having their respective choirs of angels; archangels; principalities; powers; virtues; dominions; thrones; cherubim; and 9th, seraphim, which

II. What some of those things are which [must strike the most inobservant eye, and] notify this. 1. The heavens and the firmament: the vast expanse of air and ether, and the spheres of the planets, and fixed stars. 2. The constant and regular succession of day and night, v. 2. to which covenant of providence, the covenant of grace is compared for its stability, Jer. 33:20.—31:35. Every day and every night speak the goodness of God, and leave it to the next day, and next night, to say the same. 3. The sun, in a special manner, declares the glory of God; without it this lower world would be a desert, a dungeon! The heavenly bodies are called hosts of heaven, therefore are fitly said to dwell in tents, as soldiers in their encampments: the sun is said to have a tabernacle, not only because he never has a fixed residence, but because the mansion he has, will, at the end of time, be taken down like a tent. His assigned circuit is performed with such steadiness and constancy, that we can certainly foretell the hour and the minute at which the sun will rise at such a place, any day to come. [What an example for punctuality, and constancy, and cheerfulness in duty!]

III. To whom this declaration is made of God's glory; to all parts of the world; v. 3, 4. There is no speech nor language, no nation, for the nations were divided after their tongues, Gen. 10:31, 32. where their voice is not heard. Their line is gone through all the earth, the equinoctial line suppose, and with it, their words to the end of the world, proclaiming the eternal power of the God of nature, v. 4. The apostle uses this, as a reason why the Jews should not be angry with him and others for preaching the gospel to the Gentiles, because God had already made Himself known to the Gentile world by the works of creation, and left not Himself without witness among them, Rom. 10:18. so that they were without excuse, if idolaters, Rom. 1:20, 21. If God used these means to prevent their apostasy, and they proved ineffectual, the apostles did well to use other means to recover them from it. They have no speech or language, (so some,) and yet their voice is heard. All people may hear these natural, immortal preachers speak to them, in their own tongue, the wonderful works of God.

In singing these vs. we must give God the glory of all the comfort and benefit we have by the lights of heaven, still looking above and beyond them to the Sun of righteousness.

V. 7—14. God's glory, i. e. his goodness to man, appears much in creation, but much more in and by revelation. The discoveries of God by his works might have served, had man retained his integrity; but to recover him out of his fallen state, there was needed the Word of God. And here,

I. The psalmist gives an account of the excellent properties and uses of the Word, in six sentences, v. 7—9. in each repeating the name Jehovah, and not in vain, for the law has its authority and all its excellency from the Law Maker. Here are six several titles of the Word of God, to take in the whole of divine revelation, precepts, and promises, and especially the gospel.

1. The law of the Lord is perfect; perfectly free from all corruption, perfectly filled with all good, and perfectly fitted for the end for which it is designed; it will make the man of God perfect, 2 Tim. 3:17. Nothing is to be added to, or taken from it. It is of use to convert the soul, to bring us back to ourselves, to our God, to our duty; for it shows us our sinfulness and misery in our departures from God, and the indispensable necessity of our return.

2. The testimony of the Lord (which witnesses for Him to us) is sure, incontestably and inviolably sure; what we may credit, and rely on, confident it will not deceive us: a sure discovery of divine truth, a sure direction in duty, a sure fountain of living comforts, and a sure foundation of lasting hopes. It is of use to make us wise, wise to salvation, 2 Tim. 3:15. It will give us an insight into things divine, and a foresight of things to come; will employ us in the best work, and secure to us our true interests; will make even the simple, poor contrivers as they may be for the present world, wise for their souls and eternity. Those that are humbly simple, sensible of their own folly, and willing to be taught, those shall be made wise by the Word of God, 25:9. [Matt. 18:3.]

3. The statutes of the Lord (enacted by his authority, and binding on all wherever they come) are right, exactly agreeing with the eternal rules and principles of good and evil, i. e. with the right reason [and harmonious constitution] of man, and the right counsels of God. All God's precepts, concerning all things, are right, 119:128. just as they should be; and they will set us to rights, if we receive them, and submit to them; and, because they are right, they rejoice the heart. The law, as we see it in the hands of Christ, gives cause for joy; and, when written in our hearts, it lays a foundation for lasting joy, by restoring us to our right mind.

4. The commandment of the Lord is pure; clear from all darkness, dross and defilement; purified from all alloy, and purifying to those that receive and embrace it. It is the ordinary means the Spirit uses in enlightening the eyes; it brings us to a sight and sense of our sin and misery, and directs us in the way of duty.

5. The fear of the Lord (true religion and godliness, prescribed in the Word, reigning in the heart, and practised in the life) is clean; clean itself, and will make us clean, John 15:3. it will cleanse our way, 119:9. and it endureth for ever; it is of perpetual obligation, and can never be repealed; the ceremonial law is long since done away, but the law concerning the fear of God is ever the same. Time will not alter the nature of moral good and evil.

6. The judgments of the Lord (all his precepts, which are framed in infinite wisdom) are true; they are grounded on the most sacred and unquestionable truths; they are righteous, all consonant to

So in Mal. 2:2. sun of righteousness is mystically understood to denote Christ: and so the Bridegroom, to which the sun is here resembled, is a signal title of Christ in respect to his spouse the church.' HAMMOND. Paxton supposes an allusion here, and in v. 5. to an ancient oriental ceremony of marriage; see Bush. ED.

Verse 5.

'Many versions read, "In the sun hath he placed his tabernacle." The Heb. however, gives no countenance to this, but fully bears out the reading of the common version, "In or among, &c."' MORISON. The bridegroom in the E. was splendidly attired, and issued forth from his own house to go to that of his intended bride, accompanied by a train of friends, richly decked and bearing torches. Verses 7—11.

The word, here translated 'law,' may be rendered doctrine; and be understood as a general name for divine revelation, as then extant, the law of Moses being the principal part of it. (Deut. 32:4.)—'The statutes' frequently mean the ordinances of God, by which Israel maintained communion with Him, and received all blessings from Him. These, though burdensome in themselves, under that dispensation, were entirely suited to its object, and proved a source of joy to the believing worshipper. (M. R. q.) But some explain the word, in this place, to signify the laws given to regulate the conduct of magistrates, in administering justice; which were peculiarly equitable, and tended to render the nation happy. 'The commandment,' or the moral law, is 'holy, just, and good,' and spiritual; enlightening the natural equity; and altogether so, there is no unrighteousness in any.

II. He expresses his great value for God's Word, and the great advantage he had, and hoped to have, from it, v. 10, 11.

1. It is the character of all good people, that they prefer their religion and the Word of God, (1.) Far before all wealth; gold is only for the body, and time; grace for the soul, and eternity. (2.) Far before all the pleasures of sense. Those are the delight of brutes, and therefore debase the great soul of man; these are the delight of angels, and exalt the soul. Those are deceitful, will soon surfeit, and yet never satisfy; but these are substantial and satisfying, and there is no danger of excess in them.

2. See what use he made of the precepts of God's Word; By them is thy servant warned. The Word of God is a word of warning to the children of men; it warns us of the duty we are to do, the dangers we are to avoid, and the deluge we are to prepare for, Ezek. 3: 17.—33: 7. It warns the wicked not to go on in his wicked way, and the righteous not to turn from his good way. All that are indeed God's servants take this warning.

3. See what advantage he promised himself by his obedience to God's precepts; In keeping of them there is great reward: [which need not be the motive, but will be the consequence of good conduct.] Those who make conscience of their duty, will not only be no losers by it, but unspeakable gainers. There is a reward, not only after keeping, but in keeping, God's commandments; a present great reward of obedience in obedience. Religion is health and honor, peace and pleasure; it will make our comforts sweet, and our crosses easy, life truly valuable, and death itself truly desirable. [Note, Job 36:]

III. He draws some good inferences.

1. He takes occasion hence to make a penitent reflection on his sins; for by the law is the knowledge of sin. From the rectitude of the divine law he learns to call his sins his errors; if the commandment be true and righteous, every transgression of it is an error, as grounded on a mistake. From the extent, and strictness, and spiritual nature, of the divine law, he learns that his sins are so many, that he cannot understand their number, and so exceeding sinful, that he cannot understand their heinousness and malignity. We are guilty of many sins, which, through our carelessness and partiality to ourselves, we are not aware of; many we have forgotten; so that when we have been ever so particular in the confession of sin, we must conclude with—and such like: for God knows a great deal more evil of us, than we of ourselves. It is well we are under grace, and not the law.

2. He takes occasion hence to pray against sin; all the law's discoveries of it, should drive us to pray, as David, (1.) For pardon; finding himself unable to specify all the particulars of his transgressions, he cries, cleanse me from my secret faults; not secret to God, (so none are,) nor only to the world, but such as were hid from his own self observation. The best have reason to suspect many secret faults, and to pray God not to lay that guilt to their charge; for even our sins of infirmity, and inadvertency, and our secret sins, would be our ruin, if God should deal with us according to their desert. Even secret faults are defiling, and unfit us for communion with God; but pardon cleanses from them, 1 John, 1: 17. (2.) For grace to help in time of need; that presumptuous sins might be prevented, v. 13. All that truly repent, and have pardon, are in care not to relapse into sin, and folly, as appears by their prayers,

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

By considering the inanimate servants of our Creator, we may learn to adore his magnificence and liberality; be stirred up to cheerfulness, constancy, and diligence in doing good; and led to use our nobler gifts of reason and speech to proclaim his praise. —The transition is easy and natural to the contemplation of the Sun of righteousness, the Bridegroom of the church, and Light of the world. He shines on us through his Word: may He send forth more and more faithful ministers to publish it throughout the earth!—Let it be observed, that the more any man studies and understands the Holy Scriptures, the more deeply will he be convinced of his own sinfulness, in thought, word, and deed: serious and frequent self-examination by this faithful mirror, will discover to him innumerable deviations from his perfect rule; and convince him that those, which have escaped his recollection or observation, are equally innumerable. This will induce him to cast himself unreservedly on the mercy and grace of God, for deliverance from those sins which have been hitherto unnoticed by himself, or vanished from his recollection. He will also grow more jealous of his own heart, and more afraid of temptation, lest he should be drawn into presumptuous sins, and come under the dominion of them: and whilst he longs, more and more, to be preserved from every transgression, and that his thoughts, words, and works, may be acceptable to the Lord; he will feel more sensibly his own insufficiency for every good thing, and learn to depend more entirely on Christ Jesus, as 'made of God unto him, Wisdom, Righteousness, Sanctification, and Redemption;' and he will 'rejoice and glory in Him alone.' (1 Cor. 1: 26—31.)

mind to perceive what men should be and do, and how far they are from that holiness which it demands —'The fear of the LORD, is clean,' as it sets the soul against all sin, and leads to holy watchfulness and diligence; and being once truly implanted in the soul, it will endure for ever. The term also may include the worship rendered to God, according to his Word; which was free from all profane mixtures of superstition and idolatry, and far removed from the gross immoralities attending the religion of the surrounding nations. The obligation to this holy worship is perpetual; but the external form was varied, when the old dispensation was superseded by the new, and a more spiritual worship appointed.—'The judgments' commonly, in the books of Moses, denote the judicial law: (Ex. 21:1. Deut. 4:6—8. 6:1.) but the term is used in various senses, in other parts of Scripture; and may include warnings, counsels, threatenings, and the instances given of divine wrath executed on sinners in different ways. SCOTT.

(7—9.) Law.] 'Contemplating the Ps. in its prophetic bearings, we may understand the phrase law to extend both to the Old and New Test.—Many divines and critics, and Castalio in particular, endeavor to attach a distinct shade of meaning to the words, law, testimony, statutes, commandments, fear, judgments; thus law will denote the preceptive part of revelation; testimony, the doctrinal; statutes, things given in charge; commandments, the general body of the divine revelation and doctrine; fear, religious fear; and judgments, the civil statutes of the Mosaic law, more particularly the penal sanctions.' MORISON.

POOLE.—'It may be understood of the easily besetting sin of a man's constitution and temperament; or the more dreadful sin of final apostasy [so Bp. Horne]; or it may refer to some flagrant sin which stood recorded in awful colors in the book of conscience.' MORISON. Dr. Kennicott refers it to idolatry. ED.

which concur with David's. See, [1.] His petition; We ought to pray to be kept from sins of infirmity, but especially from presumptuous sins, which most offend God, and wound conscience, wither our comforts, and shock our hopes. [2.] His plea; 'So shall I be upright; appear upright; preserve the evidence and comfort of my uprightness; and be innocent from the great transgression;' so he calls a presumptuous sin, because no sacrifice was accepted for it, Num. 15: 28—30. Note, Presumptuous sins are very heinous and dangerous: as sins against the habitual convictions and actual admonitions of conscience, in contempt and defiance of the law and its sanctions, with a high hand. Every good man ought to be jealous of sinning presumptuously, yea, though through grace hitherto kept from it. Let none be high-minded, but fear. Being so much exposed, we have great need to pray God, when pushing toward a presumptuous sin, either by his providence to prevent the temptation, or by his grace to give us victory over it.

3. He takes occasion humbly to beg the divine acceptance of his pious thoughts and affections, v. 14. Observe the connection: for if we favor our sins, we cannot expect God should favor us or our services, 66: 18. Gracious souls must have all they aim at, if accepted of God, for that is their bliss. His encouragement to hope for this, was, God was his Strength and Redeemer: by his strength we have power with Him.

In singing this, we should get our hearts much affected with the excellency of God's Word, and delivered into it; we should be much affected with the evil of sin, our danger of it, and by it, and fetch in help from heaven against it.

Ps. XX. V. 1—5. This prayer for David is entitled, a psalm of David; nor was it at all absurd for him, who was divinely inspired, to draw up a form of prayer, to be used in the congregation for himself, and those in authority under him; nay, it is very proper for those who desire their friends' prayers to tell them particularly what they would have asked for them. Even great and good men, and that know well to pray for themselves, must not despise, but earnestly desire, others' prayers, for them, even if inferiors in all respects. Paul often begged his friends to pray for him. Magistrates, and those in power, should esteem praying people, (encouraging them, reckon them their strength, Zech. 12: 5, 10.) do what they can for such, that they may have an interest in their prayers, and do nothing to forfeit it. Observe,

I. What they are taught to ask for the king. That God would,

1. Answer his prayers, v. 1, 5. Note, Even the greatest of men may be much in trouble. Neither the crown on his head, nor the grace in his heart, would exempt David from it. Even the greatest of men must be much in prayer; and let none expect benefit by the prayers of the church, or ministers, or friends, who are capable of praying for themselves, and yet neglect it. Happy the people that have praying princes, to whose prayers they may thus say, Amen.

2. Protect his person, and life, in war.

3. Enable him to go on in his undertakings for the public good; in performance of the promises, and in answer to the prayers in the sanctuary. Mercies out of the sanctuary are the sweetest mercies, and tokens of God's peculiar love, even our own God. Strength out of Zion is spiritual strength, and what we should most desire, both for ourselves and others, in services and sufferings.

4. Testify his gracious acceptance of the sacrifices he offered with his prayers, according to the law of that time, before he went out on this dangerous expedition, v. 3. i. e. 'The Lord give thee the victory and success thou didst by prayer with sacrifices ask, and thereby give as full proof of his acceptance of the sacrifice, as ever by kindling it with fire from heaven.' By this we may now know that God accepts our spiritual sacrifices, if by his Spirit He kindles in our souls a holy fire of pious and divine affection, and with that makes our hearts burn within us.

5. Crown all his enterprises and noble designs for the public welfare with the desired success, v. 4. This they might in faith pray for, because they knew David was a man after God's own heart, and would design nothing but what was pleasing to Him. Those who make it their business to glorify God, may expect God will, one way or other, gratify them; and they who walk in his counsel may promise themselves He will fulfil theirs; Thou shalt devise a thing, and it shall be established unto thee.

II. Their confidence of an answer of peace, for themselves and their good king, v. 5. 'We, that are subjects, will rejoice in the preservation and prosperity of our prince;' or rather, 'In thy salvation, O God, in thy power and promise to save,

NOTES.

Ps. XX. 'To what precise period of David's history this Ps. refers, is not easy with any certainty to determine.—The opening, I incline to think, is a song of praise, and not a prayer; and contains an assertion as to the conduct of Jehovah, not a petition to Him.' MORISON. 'Ainsworth thinks this whole Ps. a prophecy of Christ's sufferings, and deliverance, for which the church with him triumphs. Theodoret takes it to be a prophecy of Sennacherib's invasion of Judea, and of Rabshakeh's blasphemy, and of Hezekiah's distress and prayer on that account.' GILL.—'This is one of the dialogue Pss. and appears to be thus divided. Previously to his undertaking the war, David comes to the tabernacle to offer sacrifice. This being done, the people, in the king's behalf, offer up their prayers; these are included in the first three vs V. 4. was probably spoken by the high priest. V. 5. by David and his attendants; the last clause by the high priest. V. 6. by the high priest, after the victim was consumed. Vs. 7. and 8. by David and his men. And v. 9. as a chorus by all the congregation.' Dr. A. CLARKE.—If this was thus performed, and by different bands, with different kinds of instruments, stationed at different heights and distances; the effect must have been grand and moving in the extreme. See on Ps. 150. ED.

Verses 1, 2.

This Ps. was doubtless composed, and publicly sung, when David was about to engage in some perilous expedition: it is generally thought, in that against the Ammonites and Syrians. (2 Sam. 10: 1 Chr. 19:)—David was a type of Christ, in his conflicts and victories: and the Ps. may be applied as a prayer of the ancient church for his coming, and of the Christian church, for the completion of his work, and the establishment of his kingdom, and for its enlargement and prosperity. Verse 5.

The king of Israel was their anointed deliverer; and when they went forth to war under his command, they might properly set up their banners in the name of the LORD, as well as 'rejoice in his salvation.' —As the king is immediately addressed, the meaning may be, 'We shall rejoice in thy preservation, or deliverance,' or, 'in the deliverance, which we expect that thou wilt, in answer to our united prayers, accomplish for us.' SCOTT.—Banners.] 'It is said, [as has been before stated,] the Maccabees had their name from the inscription on their banners, taken from Ex. 15:11. Mi camoed baelim Yehovah—"Who is like unto Thee, O Lord, among the gods?" the word being formed from the initial letters M. C. B. I. Ma Ca Bi, whence Maccabeus and Maccabees.' Dr. A. CLARKE.—The Jewish tradition is, that each of the 12 tribes had a banner on which was painted the symbol of the tribe, corresponding to Jacob's blessings, Gen. 49: where see notes; and cuts, Job 38:31,32. To finish the subject of ancient military ensigns, a cut is here given containing (a) an Egyptian war-banner, with the head and emblems of a goddess, (Neith, the goddess of war?) (b) an Egyptian war-banner with the sacred symbol (the Ibis) of the god Thoth. In these then the idolatrous Egyptians set up their banners; note, 2 Chr. 26:10. (d) (from Vegetius) is a coin of Mark will we rejoice, that is it which we depend on now, and which, in the issue, we shall have occasion greatly to rejoice in.' Those that eye still the salvation of the Lord, shall have their hearts filled with its joy; In the name of our God will we set up our banners: make his glory always our end, and refer the issue to Him. David went against Goliath in the name of the Lord of hosts, 1 Sam. 17: 45. We will celebrate our victories in his name; when we lift up our banners in triumph, and set up our trophies, He shall have all the glory of our success.

In singing this, we ought to offer up to God our hearty good wishes to the good government we are under, and to its prosperity. But we may look further; these prayers for David are prophecies concerning Christ the Son of David, and in Him were abundantly answered.

V. 6—9. Here is,

1. Holy David himself triumphing in the interest he had in the prayers of good people, v. 6. Note, It may justly be taken as a happy presage to any prince and people, when God pours on them a spirit of prayer.

2. His people triumphing in God and their relation to Him, and his revelations of Himself to them, by which they distinguish themselves from those that live without God in the world, v. 7. Probably, David has here an eye to the Syrians, whose forces consisted much of chariots and horsemen, as we find in the history of David's victories over them, 2 Sam. 8: 4.—10: 18. A believing, obedient trust in God, and his name, is the surest way both to preferment and establishment, to rise and to stand upright, and this will help us, when creature-confidences fail those that depend on them.

3. They conclude their prayer for the king with a Hosanna, v. 9. As we read this v. it may be taken as a prayer, that God would not only bless the king, 'Save, Lord, give him success:' but that He would make him a blessing to them, 'Let the king hear us, when we call to him for justice and mercy.' Those that would have good of their magistrates, must thus pray for them, for they, as all other creatures, are that to us, and no more, that God makes them. Or, it may refer to the Messiah, that King of kings; let Him hear us when we call; let Him come to us, according to the promise, in the time appointed; let Him, as the great Master of requests, receive all our petitions, and present them to his Father. But many interpreters give another reading, by altering the pause, Lord, save the king, and hear us when we call; and so it is a summary of the whole Ps. and is taken into our Liturgy. O Lord, save the king, and mercifully hear us, when we call upon Thee.

In singing these vs. we should encourage ourselves to trust in God, and stir up ourselves to pray earnestly, as in duty bound, for those in authority over us, that, under them, we may lead quiet and peaceable lives in all godliness and honesty.

Ps. XXI. V. 1—6. As the foregoing Ps. was a prayer for the king, that God would protect and prosper him; so this is a thanksgiving for the success God had blessed him with.

David here speaks for himself in the first place, professing his joy was in God's strength and salvation, and not in the strength or success of his armies. He also directs his subjects herein to rejoice with him, and to give God all the glory of the victories he had obtained; and all, with an eye to Christ, of whose triumphs over the powers of darkness David's victories were but shadows.

1. They here congratulate the king on his joys, and concur with him in them, v. 1. 2 Sam. 3: 36 Happy the people, whose king makes God's strength his confidence, and God's salvation his joy; pleased with all the advancements of God's kingdom, trusting God to bear him out in all he does for its service. Jesus, in his great undertaking, relied on help from Heaven, and pleased Himself with the prospect of that great salvation He was thereby to work out.

2. They give God all the praise of the following matters of their king's rejoicing, v. 2. No prayer is accepted, but what is the heart's desire: 20: 4. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

They who pray most fervently for themselves, put the greatest value on the prayers of others; and are encouraged by them in further calling upon God.—As far as our desires are spiritual, and our counsels holy, we may hope to have them granted and fulfilled; but it would be ruinous to have our sinful inclinations indulged.—Fervent, united prayers tend much to the joyful assurance of faith and hope; and it is the first step to victory, in our spiritual warfare, to renounce all self-dependence and carnal confidence, and to trust only in the mercy and grace of God.—Happy is it for that people, whose rulers are influenced, in all their measures, by the faith and fear of God, aiming at his glory and the public good; when they value the prayers of true Christians, and act with such justice, that pious men can unreservedly pray for their success.—It is our duty to pray for our rulers, that they may be like David: and we should continually entreat the Lord, that they who are or shall be placed over us, may be directed and prospered in every undertaking, for the honor of God, the peace and welfare of the land, and the common benefit of mankind.—In answer to the hopes and prayers of the old-testament church, the anointed King of God's people came in the appointed season. in 'his salvation let us rejoice.' Ps. XXI. 'No question, David was the author of this Ps. though some, on weak grounds, would have it otherwise.' ASSEMB. ANN.—'Many think it is to be wholly referred to the victories of the Messiah.' Dr. A. CLARKE.—'What is predicted of the king celebrated here, is far more august and illustrious, especially in vs. 5. and 7. than any thing which fell to the lot of David, or any who succeeded him; therefore, as in Ps. 2. so here, the Messiah seems the subject.' [The Jews themselves thought it to relate to Christ. DODD.] ROSENM.

Verse 1.

Several circumstances of the Ps. may be accommodated to the case of David. Yet the whole seems more immediately intended for Christ and his kingdom.—'Many of the Hebrews themselves apply it to the Messiah. So that it may be called a Ps. of triumph after the victories which David got over his enemies, which were a type of Christ's victory over death, and of the triumph that ensued. And truly there are some things in it, which are more literally fulfilled in Christ than in David.' Patrick. SCOTT.

PSALM XXII.

David, prophetically speaking in the person of Christ, complains griev-ously, that he was forsaken by his God, and left to the insulting cruelty of his enemies; and he predicts many circumstances of the Messiah's suffer-ings, 1—21. He proclaims the name and praise of the Lord, calling on the people to trust and glorify him; and foretells the permanent success of the Gospel, 22—31.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

If David rejoiced greatly in the honor conferred on him, as king of Israel; what is the joy of our Redeemer in his exaltation to the mediatorial throne, and in the salvation of his people! And if Israel, from love to David and his auspicious government, rejoiced, and praised God for him; how great should be our joy to behold by faith our Brother and Friend thus glorified; and how hearty and constant should be our praises for all the blessings we may expect from Him! SCOTT.

very often preserved his life, in answer to his prayers, when in the most imminent danger; but had given him the assurance of continuing the kingdom in his family for many generations, and in Christ, as his Descendant, for ever; and he was encouraged personally to expect everlasting life in heaven. Thus his glory was in all respects 'great in God's salvation.'—Yet the passage, in its fullest import, can be accomplished only in Christ Himself. SCOTT.

(3.) Thou preventest.] Literally, Thou shalt prevent. This may be considered as the language of prophecy. SCOTT.—Preventest.] 'Lit. to go before; an exact vers.' Dr. A. CLARKE.—A crown.] 'That placed on David's head, 2 Sam. 12:30. as some [see cuts of pure gold crowns, Esth. 5:2. 2 Sam. 12:30.]; but more likely the word is taken metaphorically for a kingdom; so a crown of fine gold is taken for a choice kingdom, as was the kingdom of Israel.' ASSEMB. ANN.

Verses 6—7.

The marg. rendering, is the most literal, and suggests another important thought. David was set to be blessings, not only to his own generation, and to his posterity, and to Israel for many ages; but, by these divine poems, to the whole church, while the world shall endure; and in Christ, his Son, to all eternity. SCOTT.

Verses 8—12.

These vs. indicate, that the haters and opposers of Israel's anointed king were likewise the enemies of God. (2:1—9.) But they may be considered as addressed to the Messiah Himself. SCOTT.

(12.) Turn their back.] 'Bps. Horne and Horsley read, "Therefore thou shalt set them as a butt."—Horsley's entire tr. of the v. is very forcible: "Truly, thou shalt make them a butt for thine arrows; thou shalt take a steady aim at them." [Notes, 2 Chr. 26:10.] MOR.

Verse 13.

Both the prosperity of the church, and the ruin of its enemies, tend to exalt God, or to render his glory conspicuous to his rational creatures. These effects can be produced only by his Omnipotence; which his people unitedly pray to see displayed, that they may joyfully celebrate his praises.—This conclusion greatly resembles the first petitions, and closing doxology, of the Lord's prayer. SCOTT.

NOTES.

Ps. XXII. On the subject of this Ps. Dr. A. Clarke says, 'some refer it all to David; others, all to Christ; and others still,' with whom he agrees, 'partly to Christ, and partly to David.'—Most refer it to Christ, and nearly all agree that parts of it can be referred to no other but title of this psalm, Aijeleth Shahar—The hind of the morning; Cant. 8: 14. Prov. 5: 19. Gen. 49: 21. and v. 16. Others think it denotes only the tune. We have,

I. A sad complaint of God's withdrawings, v. 1, 2. This may be applied to David, or any other child of God, in the want of the tokens of his favor, crying earnestly for relief, and desiring his gracious returns. Note, 1. Spiritual desertions are the saints' sorest afflictions; when [fear and despondency prevail, and] their evidences are clouded, divine consolations suspended, their communion with God interrupted, and the terrors of God set in array against them, how sad are their spirits, and how sapless all their comforts! 2. Even their complaint of these burdens is a good sign of spiritual life, and spiritual senses exercised. To cry out, 'My God, why am I sick? poor?' would give cause to suspect discontent and worldliness. But, Why hast Thou forsaken me? is the language of a heart binding up its happiness in God's favor. 3. When lamenting God's withdrawings, yet still we must call Him our God, and continue to call on Him as ours. When we want the faith of assurance, we must live by a faith of adherence.

But it must be applied to Christ; for, in the first words of this complaint, He poured out his soul before God when on the cross, Matt. 27: 46. probably He proceeded to the following words, and, some think, repeated the whole Ps. Note, (1.) Christ, in his sufferings, cried earnestly to his Father, for his favor and presence with Him; in the day-time on the cross, and in the night-season in his agony in the garden, Heb. 5: 7. (2.) Yet God forsook Him, and this it was He complains of more than all his sufferings. But Christ having made Himself sin for us, in conformity thereunto, the Father laid Him under the present impressions of his wrath and displeasure against sin. It pleased the Lord to bruise Him, and put Him to grief, Is. 53: 10. But even then He kept fast hold of his relation to the Father as his God, by whom He was now employed, whom He was now serving, and with whom He should shortly be glorified.

II. Encouragement taken, in reference hereunto, v. 3—5. Though God did not hear him, did not help him, yet, 1. He will think well of God; 'But Thou art holy, Hab. 1: 13. And as Thou art infinitely pure and upright Thyself, so Thou delightest in the services of thine upright people; Thou inhabitest the praises of Israel, in the sanctuary Thou art always ready to receive their homage, and of the tabernacle of meeting hast said, This is my rest for ever.' This bespeaks God's wonderful condescension, and it may comfort us in all our complaints, that, though God seem, for awhile, to turn a deaf ear to them, yet He is so pleased with his people's praises, that He will, in due time, give them cause to change their note; Hope in God, for I shall yet praise Him. Our Lord Jesus, in his sufferings, had an eye to the holiness of God, to preserve and advance the honor of that, and of his grace in inhabiting the praises of Israel, notwithstanding the iniquities of their holy things. 2. He will take comfort from the experiences the saints in former ages had of the benefit of faith and prayer, v. 4, 5. Rom. 11: 28. He that was our fathers' God must be ours, and therefore will be ours. Our Lord Jesus, in his sufferings, supported Himself with this—that all the fathers who were types of Him in his sufferings, Noah, Joseph, David, Jonah, and others, were, in due time, delivered, and were types of his exaltation too; therefore He knew He also should not be confounded, Isa. 50: 7.

III. The complaint renewed of another grievance, the contempt and reproach of men, v. 6—8. It was great condescension that Christ became man, and is, and will be, the wonder of angels; yet, as if it were too much, too great, to be a man, he becomes a worm, and no man: Isa. 52: 14. else He could not have been trampled on as He was. The word signifies such a worm as was used in dying scarlet or purple; whence some make it as an allusion to his bloody sufferings. See what abuses were put upon Him; He was reproached as a bad man; despised as a mean man; ridiculed as a foolish man, and one that not only deceived others, but himself too. They that saw Him on the cross laughed Him to scorn. David was sometimes taunted for his confidence in God; but in the sufferings of Christ this was literally and exactly fulfilled; those very gestures were used by those that reviled him, Matt. 27: 39. they wagged their heads, nay, so far did their malice make them forget themselves, that they used the very words, v. 43. He trusted in God, let Him deliver Him. Our Lord Jesus, having undertaken to satisfy for the dishonor we had done to God by our sins, did it by submitting to the lowest possible instance of ignominy and disgrace.

IV. Encouragement taken as to this also, v. 9, 10. Men despise me; but Thou art He that took me out of the womb. David and other good men have often, for direction to us, encouraged themselves with this, that God was not only the God of their fathers, but the God of their infancy, who began to take care of them, as soon as they had a being, and therefore, they hope, will never cast them off. See the early instances of God's provi-

Title.] 'Aijeleth Shahar.' (marg.) Various conjectures have been made concerning the intention of this singular title. Some think it refers to the time when it was to be sung, rendering it 'the first dawn.' Others apply it to Christ, as the Light of the world, whose rising was predicted.—But perhaps it points out the Savior, marked by Satan from his birth for persecution, as the hind or hart is in the morning for chase; and so hunted down by his enemies, until surrounded by them, when on the cross. (16—18. Matt. 2:13—18. 27:39—44. Luke 11:53, 54. Acts 4:23—28.) Of this the persecutions of David were a type. Scott. The orientals are fond of fanciful names for admired songs, as 'rose-bush,' 'bed of anemonies,' 'string of pearls,' &c. See on 2 Sam. 1: 18. and Bush's Ill. Ed.

Verse 1.

The first clause of this v. is exactly of the same import with the words used by our Lord on the cross. (Matt. 27:46.) The Heb. verb indeed is there changed for one supposed to be Syriac; but the Evangelist's interpretation is given in the very words of the Sept. No reasonable doubt can be made, that He should be considered as the Speaker, throughout this whole prophetical Ps. It may even be questioned, whether David had any reference to his own case in it; as every thing is applicable to Christ, and most things utterly inapplicable to David.—While the man Jesus, without any personal transgression or defilement, but bearing our sins, in their guilt and punishment, was wholly deprived of all sensible comfort, and felt that horror in his soul which is the effect of the divine wrath; while the powers of darkness were permitted to assail Him with every dreadful temptation; and while wicked men unrestrainedly exercised their cruel malice towards Him; his God and Father seemed to have forsaken Him, and to stand at a distance from his salvation, as regardless of his agonies and prayers. Yet still He used the language of vigorous faith, conflicting with, and prevailing against, all despondency and impatience,—(Gen. 3:14, 15. Matt. 26:36—39. Mark 14:32—36. 15:34—39. Luke 22:43, 44.) The abruptness of the latter part is remarkable: 'Far from my salvation:' (marg.)—'the words of my roaring.'—How can this be? Scott.—Roaring.] 'When Jesus uttered the preceding words, it was with a loud voice, and in great agony, Heb. 5:7.—a cry so strong and agonizing as to be indistinct, which accounts for its being misunderstood by the by-standers, some of whom supposed He was calling for Elias.' Cott. Bib.

Verse 2.

The Lord Jesus continued whole nights in prayer; He arose a great while before day for that purpose; and in the cold, dark night He prostrated Himself in the garden, and 'prayed most earnestly:' yet did not the cup of his sufferings for sinners pass from Him! He felt a natural reluctance to such tremendous sorrows, but his zeal and love prevailed; and when He added, 'Not my will but thine be done,' He, as it were, retracted, or at least qualified, his former petition.—The prophecy expresses the feelings of his soul in the extremity of his suffering; yet his supplications were heard, as it soon appeared in his resurrection. (John 12:27—33. 17:1—3. Heb. 5:7—10.) Scott.

Verse 3.

This v. seems admirably expressive of perfect resignation under the severest sufferings, which peculiarly accords with the prophetical meaning. Id.

Verses 4—6.

(M. R.) A worm, &c. (6) The Savior here spake of the extremely abject state, to which He was reduced; and the language is very expressive of the contempt, with which he was treated by all ranks and orders of men, whether Jews or Gentiles. (Is. 49:7, 8. 53:2, 3. Zech. 11:7—9, 12—14. Luke 23:6—12.) Id.

Verses 7, 8.

The history of our Lord's sufferings is the best comment on this part of the prophecy: the language of the former v. might be thought historical of the insults attending his crucifixion; and that of the latter was adopted, without any variation at all affecting the sense, by the chief priests and rulers, to express their contempt of Him, when hanging on the cross. Little did they think, that the Spirit of prophecy, a thousand years before, had foretold that the murderers of the Messiah dential care, 1. In our birth; 2. At the breast, Job 3: 12. 3. In our early dedication to Him; I was cast upon Thee from the womb. Which perhaps refers to his circumcision on the 8th day; He was then by his parents committed and given up to God as his God in covenant; for circumcision was a seal of the covenant; and this encouraged him to trust in God. Those have reason to think themselves safe, who were so soon, so solemnly, gathered under the wings of the Divine Majesty. 4. In our experience of God's goodness to us all along ever since; Thou art my God; providing for me, and watching over me for good, from my birth, unto this day. And if, as soon as we became capable of exercising reason, we put our confidence in God, and committed ourselves and our way to Him, we need not doubt but He would always remember the kindness of our youth, and the love of our espousals, Jer. 2: 2. This is applicable to our Lord Jesus, over whose incarnation and birth the Divine Providence watched with a peculiar care, when He was born in a stable, laid in a manger, and immediately exposed to the malice of Herod, and forced to flee into Egypt; when He was a child, God loved Him, and called Him thence, Hos. 11: 1. and the remembrance of this comforted Him in his sufferings.

V. 11—21. In these vs. we have Christ suffering, and Christ praying: by which we are directed to look for crosses, and to look up to God under them.

I. Here is Christ suffering: many of the particulars here specified are such as were never true of David, and therefore must be appropriated to Christ in the depths of his humiliation.

1. He is here deserted by his friends; trouble and distress are near, and there is none to help, none to uphold, v. 11. He trod the wine-press alone; all his disciples forsook Him, and fled. It is God's honor to help, when all other helps and succors fail.

2. Insulted and surrounded by his enemies; those of a higher rank are, for their strength and fury, compared to bulls, strong bulls of Bashan, v. 12. fat and fed to the full, haughty and sour; such were the chief priests and elders that persecuted Christ; those of a lower rank, are compared to dogs, v. 16. filthy and greedy, and unwearied in running Him down. The assembly of the wicked plotting against Him, v. 16. are the chief priests in council, consulting ways and means to take Christ. These enemies were numerous and unanimous; formidable, and threatening, v. 13.

3. Crucified; the very manner of his death is described, though never in use among the Jews, v. 16. There is no one passage, in all the O. T. which the Jews have so industriously corrupted as this, because it is such an eminent prediction of the death of Christ, and was so exactly fulfilled.

4. Dying, v. 14, 15. dying in pain and anguish, because to satisfy for sin, which brought in pain, and for which we must otherwise have lain in everlasting anguish. Here is, (1.) The dissolution of the whole frame of his body; I am poured out like water, weak as water, and yielding to the power of death, emptying Himself of all the supports of his human nature. (2.) The dislocation of his bones; care was taken that not one of them should be broken, John 19: 36. but they were all out of joint by the violent stretching of his body on the cross as on a rack. Or it may denote the fear that seized Him in his agony in the garden, when He began to be sore amazed; see Dan. 5: 6. (3.) The colliquation of his spirits; My heart is like wax, melted to receive the impressions of God's wrath against the sins He undertook to satisfy for; melting away like the vitals of a dying man; as this satisfied for the hardness of our hearts, so the consideration of it should help to soften them, Job 23: 16. and see Ps. 68. 2. (4.) The failing of his natural force; My strength is dried up; so that he became parched and brittle like a potsherd, the radical moisture being wasted by the fire of divine wrath preying on his spirits. Who then can stand before God's anger? or who knows the power of it? If this were done in the green tree, what shall be done in the dry? (5.) The clamminess of his mouth, a usual symptom of approaching death; My tongue cleaveth to my jaws; this was fulfilled both in his thirst on the cross, John 19: 28. and in his silence under his sufferings; for, as a sheep before the shearers is dumb, so He opened not his mouth, nor objected against any thing done to Him. (6.) His giving up the ghost; 'Thou hast brought Me to the dust of death; I am just ready to drop into the grave;' for nothing less would satisfy divine justice. The life of the sinner was forfeited, therefore the life of the Sacrifice must be the ransom for it. The sentence of death passed upon Adam was thus expressed: Unto dust thou shalt return. Therefore Christ, having an eye to that sentence in his obedience to death, here uses a like expression; Thou hast brought Me to the dust of death.

He was stripped; His blessed body was lean and emaciated with labor, grief, and fasting, (v. 17.) during the whole course of his ministry, which made him look as if he was near 50 years old, when but 33; as we find, John 8: 57. Or, his bones might be numbered, because his body was distended on the cross. They look and stare upon Me; i. e. my bones do, being distorted, and having no flesh to cover them, as Job says, ch. 16: 8. My leanness, rising up in me, beareth witness to my face. Or, 'The standers by, the passers by, are amazed to see my bones start out thus; and, pleased, instead of pitying Me,' v. 18. The very circumstance, v. 18. was exactly fulfilled, John would speak of Him, in this insulting and impious manner. (Job 16:4—16. 30:1—14. Matt. 26:63—68. 27:27—31, 39—44.) SCOTT.

Verses 9, 10.

David seems early to have devoted himself to God; but Jesus alone was a 'holy child,' born without sin. (71:17, 18. Is. 7:15. Luke 1:34—38. 2:41—52.) He was not only the peculiar care of Providence from his birth; but from his earliest infancy He exercised the most perfect faith, hope, and love towards his God and Father. ID.

Verses 11—13.

A helpless infant, or a harmless lamb, surrounded by furious bulls and hungry lions, aptly represented the Savior encompassed by his insulting and bloody persecutors; and in his extreme distress forsaken even by his disciples. (16—18. Mat. 26:40—56. Luke 23:1—5. John 16:31—33. 18:1—3.)—The bulls, which fed in the fertile pastures of Bashan, were remarkably fat, strong, and furious. ID.

(12.) Bulls.] 'Comp. 68:30. Wicked men, or those who have much bodily strength, who insult and domineer over the weak, and all "lewd fellows of the baser sort," are still called (in the E.) Madukul, i. e. bulls. "Of what country are you the bull?" (i. e. bully?] People of docile, peaceful disposition, also, are called cows or calves. "See those bulls, how they are oppressing the calves; look at them, they are always butting the cows."' ROBERTS.

Crucifixion was not known in Judea, till many ages after this prophecy was delivered. Nothing, at all answering to the literal meaning of these terms, befell David, as far as we know; nothing could have been previously more unlikely, than that the promised and glorious Son of David should be treated in this cruel and ignominious manner: yet the fulfilment was so exact, that the vs. seem more like a narrative than a prediction!—Let any thinking man recollect, that the Jews, the greatest opposers of Christianity ever since its promulgation, have unanimously allowed, that David wrote this Ps. above a thousand years before the birth of Christ; then let him compare it with the history of his crucifixion, and determine, whether it does not stand as an unanswerable argument for the divine inspiration of the Scriptures, and for the divine original of the Christian religion. SCOTT.

(16.) Dogs, in troops, at night, are dangerous in the E. 1 K. 21: 23, and see in Bush. Pierced.] 'As a lion my hands and my feet.' But this contains no clear sense. A very trivial change gives the reading of our version. The Sept. which is certainly more ancient than the Christian era, renders it [as we]; the Chal. Paraphrast gives the same meaning; and there seems scarcely the shadow of a doubt, this is the genuine reading: though the general exactness of the Jews in preserving their SS. precludes the charge of an intentional alteration. 19: 23, 24. And though it was no great instance of Christ's suffering, yet it is a great instance of the fulfilling of the Scripture in Him. Thus it was written, and therefore thus it behooved Christ to suffer. Let this, therefore, confirm our faith in Him as the true Messiah, and inflame our love to Him as the best of friends, who loved us, and suffered all this for us.

II. Christ prays, and with that supports Himself under the burden of his sufferings; Christ, in his agony, prayed, prayed earnestly, prayed that the cup might pass from Him; of that, David's praying here was a type. He calls God his Strength, v. 19. When we cannot rejoice in God as our Song, yet let us stay ourselves on Him as our Strength; and take the comfort of spiritual supports, when we cannot come at spiritual delights. He prays that God would be with Him, and nearness of trouble should quicken us to draw near to God, and then we may hope He will draw near to us. The Father heard Him in that He feared, Heb. 5: 7. He prays God to deliver, and save Him, v. 20, 21. He is in care for the safety of his soul, 49: 15. 'Father, into thy hands I commit that, to be conveyed safe to paradise.' The psalmist here calls his soul his darling, his only one, so the word is, 'My soul is my only one; therefore the greater my shame if I neglect it, my loss if I let it perish. Being my only one, it ought to be my darling, and I do not use it as such, unless I take care to preserve it, provide for it, and be entirely tender of its welfare.' Observe the danger from which He prays to be delivered,the sword of divine wrath. This He dreaded more than any thing, Gen. 3: 24. It was the wormwood and the gall. 'O, deliver Me from that. Lord, though I lose my life, let Me not lose thy love.' The dog, and the lion's mouth, seem to mean Satan, the prince of this world, with whom He was to engage in close combat, and whom He saw coming, John 14: 30. He pleads, 'Thou hast formerly heard Me from the horns of the unicorn,' i. e. 'saved Me from him, in answer to my prayer.' This may refer to the victory Christ had obtained over Satan and his temptations, Matt. 4: Luke 4: 13. 'Lord, thou gavest Me the victory then, give it Me now.' Let that encourage us to hope that we shall be delivered; He that has delivered, doth, and will. This prayer of Christ, no doubt, was answered, for the Father heard Him always. And though He did not deliver Him from death,yet He suffered Him not to see corruption, but raised Him from death, which was a greater instance of God's favor to Him than if He had helped Him down from the cross; for that would have hindered his undertaking, whereas his resurrection crowned it.

In singing this, we should meditate on the sufferings and resurrection of Christ, till we experience in our own souls the power of his resurrection, and the fellowship of his suffering.

V. 22—31. The same that began the Ps. complaining, who was no other than Christ in his humiliation, ends it here triumphing, and it can be no other than Christ in his exaltation. And as the first words of the complaint were used by Christ Himself on the cross, so are the first words of the triumph expressly applied to Him, Heb. 2: 12. and made his own; I will declare thy name unto my brethren, in the midst of the church will I sing praise unto Thee. The certain prospect Christ had of the joy set before Him, not only gave Him a satisfactory answer to his prayers, but turned his complaints into praises; He saw of the travail of his soul, and was well satisfied: witness that triumphant word wherewith He breathed his last; It is finished.

Five things are here spoken of, the view of which were the satisfaction and triumph of Christ in his sufferings.

I. That He should have a church on earth, and that those who were given Him from eternity should, in the fulness of time,be gathered in to Him. Isa. 53: 10. It pleased Him to think, 1. That by the declaring of God's name, the preaching of the everlasting gospel in its plainness and purity, many should be effectually called to Him, and to God by Him. 2. That those thus called in, should be brought into a very near and dear relation to Him as his brethren; fellow heirs, and of the same body, Heb. 2: 11. Christ is our elder Brother. 3. That these his brethren should be incorporated into a great congregation, the universal church, John 11: 52. Eph. 1: 10. 4. That these should be accounted the seed of Jacob and Israel, v. 23. That on them, though Gentiles, the blessing of Abraham might come, Gal. 3: 14. and to them might pertain the adoption, the glory, the covenant, and the service of God, as much as ever it did to Israel according to the flesh, Rom. 9: 4. Heb. 8: 10. The gospel-church is called the Israel of God, Gal. 6: 16.

II. That God should be greatly honored and glorified in Him by that church. His Father's glory was that He had in his eye throughout his whole undertaking, John 17: 4. particularly in his sufferings, which He entered upon with this solemn request, Father, glorify thy name, John 12: 27, 28. He foresees with pleasure,

1. That God would be glorified by the church that should be gathered to Him; and that for this end they should be called and gathered in, that they might be unto God for a name and a praise. Christ by his ministers will declare God's name to his brethren, as God's mouth to them, and then

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—21. The stupendous scene here exhibited should attract our most serious and affectionate attention. Here we behold the eternal justice and holiness of our God; the immutable excellency and obligation of his law; the inconceivable odiousness and guilt of sin; the inestimable worth of our souls; the ruined state of man, the insufficiency of all other expedients for magnifying the law, or satisfying the justice of God. We here learn the vanity of the world, and the misery of its deluded inhabitants; the dire malignity of the human heart, which naturally conceived and expressed such cruel hatred and contempt of Him, who was 'the Brightness of the Father's glory, and the express Image of his person;' we become acquainted with the infinitely free love and compassion of God the Father, and of our Lord Jesus Christ, for us wretched sinners: we perceive what is the Foundation of every human hope; the Source of all grace and consolation; the Exemplar to which we are to be conformed; together with the treatment we are to expect from man, and the conduct under it which, as Christians, we are to adopt. In short, the whole system of true religion is here viewed in its central point; and every lesson is learned, with peculiar advantage, by the enlightened and humble soul. (1 Cor. 1:23,24.) SCOTT.

Verse 22.

(Heb. 2:10—13.) The subsequent part of the Ps. is as evidently prophetical of Christ's glory and the success of his gospel, as the foregoing part is of his sufferings.—The whole Ps. is allowed to be highly poetical; but this transition is peculiarly beautiful. (John 13:1—5, 31—35. 17:1—3.) What follows seems descriptive of Christ's feelings when He cried, 'It is finished,' and, 'Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit.' (Luke 23:44—49. John 19:28—30) SCOTT.

Verse 23, 24.

Some expositors think these vs. the song of praise, which the Messiah declares He will lead in the midst of the congregation. Israel is especially addressed; but all who are favored with the Gospel are equally concerned in the exhortation, as the resurrection and consequent glory of Christ are the common benefit of all that fear and seek God: for had He despised and rejected the Surety's sufferings, and left Him in the grave, all the hopes of sinners would have been for ever buried with Him. (2. Rom. 4:23—25. 8:32—34. 1 Cor. 15:12—18. Heb. 13:20, 21.) But, though man despised and abhorred Him, and the Father for a time seemed to disregard his sufferings and prayers; and though the character and conduct of those whom He represented, was abominable in the sight of God; He yet accepted the Savior's atoning sacrifice, raised Him from the dead, and made Him 'the Author of eternal salvation to all them that obey Him.' by them, as the mouth of the congregation to God, will God's name be praised. All that fear the Lord, will praise Him, v. 23. even every Israelite indeed. See 118: 2, 4.—135: 19, 20. The business of Christians, particularly in their solemn religious assemblies, is, to praise and glorify God, with a holy awe and reverence of his majesty; therefore they that are here called upon to praise God, are called upon to fear Him.

2. That God would be glorified in the Redeemer and in his undertaking. Therefore Christ is said to praise God in the church, not only because He is the Master of the assemblies in which God is praised, and the Mediator of all the praises offered up to God, but the Matter of the church's praise. See Eph. 3: 21. All our praises must centre in the work of redemption, and great reason we have to rejoice and be thankful, (1.) That Jesus Christ was owned by his Father in his undertaking, v. 24. For He hath not despised nor abhorred the affliction of the afflicted One, that is, of the suffering Redeemer; but has graciously accepted it. (2.) That He Himself will go on with his undertaking, and complete it. Christ says, I will pay my vows, v. 25. Having engaged to bring many sons to glory, He will perform his engagement to the utmost, and lose none.

III. That all humble, gracious souls should have a full satisfaction and happiness in Him, v. 26. It comforted his sufferings, that in and through Him all true believers should have everlasting consolation. 1. The poor in spirit shall be rich in blessings, spiritual blessings; the hungry shall be filled with good things. They that hunger and thirst after righteousness in Christ, shall have all they can desire to satisfy and make them easy, and shall not labor, as they have, for that which satisfies not. 2. They that are much in praying, shall be much in thanksgiving; They shall praise the Lord, that seek Him, because through Christ they are sure of finding Him; in the hopes of which they have reason to praise Him, even while seeking Him; and the more earnest they are in seeking Him, the more will their hearts be enlarged in his praises when they have found Him. 3. The souls devoted to Him shall be for ever happy with Him; 'Your heart shall live for ever. Yours that are meek, that are satisfied in Christ, that continue to seek God; whatever becomes of your bodies, your hearts shall live for ever; the graces and comforts you have shall be perfected in everlasting life. Christ has said, Because I live, ye shall live also, John 14: 19. and, therefore, that life shall be as sure, and as long, as his.'

IV. That the church, and with it the kingdom of God, should extend to all corners of the earth, and take in all sorts of people, v. 27, 28.

1. The Jews had long been the only professing people of God, but now, all the ends of the world and all the Gentiles should come into the church It is here prophesied, (1.) That they should be converted, they shall remember, and turn to the Lord. Note, Serious reflection is the first step, and a good step, toward true conversion. We must consider, and turn. The prodigal came first to himself, and then to his father. (2.) That then they should be admitted into communion with God, and with the assemblies that serve Him; They shall worship before Thee; for in every place incense shall be offered to God, Mal. 1: 11. Isa. 66: 23. Those that turn to God will make conscience of worshipping before Him. And good reason there is why all the kindreds of the nations should do homage to God, for, v. 28. The kingdom is the Lord's; his, and his only, is the universal monarchy: the kingdom of nature; so the design of the Christian religion is to revive natural religion; and the kingdom of grace, Christ as Mediator being appointed Governor among the nations; Head over all things to his church. Let every tongue therefore confess that He is Lord.

2. That it should include many of different ranks, v. 29. High and low, rich and poor, bond and free, meet in Christ. Christ shall have the homage of many of the great ones. The poor also shall receive his gospel. Or, those that go down to the dust may be understood, in general, of dying men, whether poor or rich. See what is our condition—going down to the dust to which we are sentenced, and where shortly we must make our bed: we cannot secure our life long, nor can we be the authors of our own spiritual and eternal life. Our great interest therefore, as well as duty, is, to give up ourselves to the Lord Jesus, to be his subjects and worshippers.

V. That the church of Christ, and with it the kingdom of God among men, shall continue to the end, through all the ages of time. Mankind is kept up in a succession of generations; so that there is always a generation passing away, and a generation coming up. Now, as Christ shall have honor from that which is passing away, (v. 29 they that go down to the dust,) so He shall also from that which is rising up, and setting out, in the world, v. 30. Observe,

1. Their application to Christ; A seed shall serve Him, keep up the solemn worship of Him, and profess and practise obedience to Him as their Master and Lord. Note, God will have a church in the world, to the end of time; and, in order to that, there shall be a succession of professing Christians and gospel ministers, from generation

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 22—31. In this part of the Ps. viewed in connection with the former, we behold the ransom accepted, the Savior heard, and exalted to his glorious throne, receiving inestimable gifts to bestow on sinful man, and not ashamed to call his poor disciples brethren; declaring among them, and by them to the world, the name and truths of God; fulfilling in his exaltation the design of all his sufferings; and calling on all, who fear and seek the Lord, to rejoice in Him, and to praise and glorify Him. (Heb. 2: 10—13.)—Whilst numbers despise, and wonder, and perish; the gentiles have been brought into his church, which is preserved in the midst of opposition: and ere long 'all the ends of the earth shall remember, and turn unto the LORD, and all the kindreds of the nations shall worship before Him.'—Let the infidel then study this Ps. with serious attention, and no longer object his futile cavils, in opposition to demonstration. Let those, who go about to establish their own righteousness, inquire why the beloved Son of God thus suffered, if their performances could atone for sin, or recommend a sinner to his offended God. Let the antinomian consider, whether the Savior thus honored the divine law, to purchase him the liberty of despising it. Let the careless take warning to flee from the wrath to come; and the trembling be encouraged, and rest their hopes on this Redeemer. SCOTT.

Verse 25.

Vows, &c.] I. e. the Savior will publicly fulfil all the engagements of his exaltation, for the glory of God, and the benefit of his church; even as the Psalmist offered the various sacrifices, He had vowed in his distress. (56:12. 66:13,14. 116:14—19.)—The change in the person, from thee to him, is not uncommon. (27. Prov. 1:26—28.) SCOTT.

Verse 26.

The death of Christ was the great sacrifice for sin; his 'flesh is meat indeed, and his blood drink indeed;' the poor in spirit feed on this provision, in their hearts by faith, and are satisfied: thus while they seek the Lord, they praise Him also, and their hearts, or souls, are 'preserved unto eternal life.' (John 6:30—35, 47—58.)—The sacred feasts on the peace-offerings and vows, at the sanctuary, furnished this allusion. ID.

Verses 27, 28.

The fallen race of Adam in general, all over the world, had forgotten, through alienation of heart, the one living and true God; but, through the sufferings of Christ, and the glory that followed, vast multitudes in the most distant nations, 'remembered' God; and, forsaking their idols and iniquities, turned to Him, as his worshippers and subjects. Thus the kingdom of God, which always was his by right, began in fact to be established among the nations: but this part of the prophecy has by no means yet received its grand accomplishment. (Rev. 11:15—18. 20:1—3.) SCOTT.

Verse 29.

Even the rich and powerful must feed on this spiritual provision, or starve: worship, and submit to the exalted Savior, or perish: they, that persist in their rebellion, must bow as condemned criminals before his tribunal. The most exalted, and the most abased, are in this respect precisely in the same situation.—Christ alone is 'the Resurrection and the Life;' and at length all that sleep in the dust must bow before his tribunal, and all his believing subjects will enter into his joy. (John 5:28, 29. 11:20—27.) ID.

David rejoices in the compassionate care of the Lord his Shepherd, 1–3. He exults in the assurance of being supported by Him through life and death, and of spending eternity in his presence, 4–6.

to generation. A seed shall serve Him; there shall be a remnant, more or less, to whom shall pertain the service of God, and to whom God will give grace to serve Him: perhaps but few, yet enough to preserve the entail.

2. Christ's acknowledgment of them; They shall be accounted to Him for a generation; He will be the same to them that He was to those who went before them; instead of the fathers shall be the children, whom all shall acknowledge to be a seed that the Lord hath blessed, Isa. 61: 9.—65: 23. The generation of the righteous, God will graciously own as his treasure, his children.

3. Their agency for Him, v. 31. They shall come, shall rise, not only to keep up virtue in their day, but to transmit the pure Gospel of Christ, even to a people that shall be born hereafter; to them they shall declare, (1.) That the everlasting righteousness, Jesus Christ has brought in, and not any of our own, is the foundation of all our hopes, and the fountain of all our joys. See Rom. 1: 16, 17. (2.) That the work of our redemption, by Christ, is the Lord's own doing, 118: 23. and no contrivance of ours. We must declare to our children, that God has done this; it is his wisdom in a mystery, it is his arm revealed.

In singing this, we must triumph in the name of Christ, as above every name; must give Him honor ourselves; rejoice in the honors others do Him, and in the assurance we have that there shall be a people praising Him on earth, when we are praising Him in heaven.

Ps. XXIII. Many of David's Pss. are full of complaints, but this is full of comforts, and the expressions of delight in God's great goodness, and dependence on Him. It is a Ps. which has been sung by good Christians, and will be while the world stands, with a great deal of pleasure and satisfaction. As in the foregoing Ps. he represented Christ dying for his sheep, so here he represents Christians receiving the benefit of all the care and tenderness of that great and good Shepherd.

V. 1—6. From three very comfortable premises, David, in this Ps. draws three very comfortable conclusions, and teaches us to do so too.

I. From God's being his Shepherd, he infers (as all believers should) that he shall not want any good thing, v. 1.

Time was, when David was himself a shepherd; so he knew by experience the cares and tender affections of a good shepherd, toward his flock: he once ventured his life to rescue a lamb. By this therefore he illustrates God's care of his people; and to this our Savior seems to refer, when He says, I am the Shepherd of the sheep; the good Shepherd. The Shepherd of Israel, of the whole church in general, 80: 1. is the Shepherd of every particular believer; the meanest is not below his cognizance, Isa. 40: 11. If God be as a shepherd to us, we must be as sheep, inoffensive, meek, and quiet, silent before the shearers; useful and sociable; we must know the Shepherd's voice, and follow Him.

See next the great confidence believers have in God; 'I shall not want.' If David penned this Ps. before coming to the crown, though destined to it, he had as much reason to fear want as any man. Let not those fear starving that are at God's finding. More is implied than is expressed; not only, I shall not want, but, 'I shall be supplied; and if I have not every thing I desire, either it is not fit, or not good for me, or I shall have it in due time.'

II. From his performing the office of a good Shepherd to him, he infers that he needs not fear any evil in the greatest dangers and difficulties he could be in, v. 2—4. He experiences the benefit of God's presence and care now, and therefore expects the benefit of them when he most needs it. See here the comforts of living saints.

1. They are well-pleased, well-laid; He maketh me to lie down in green pastures. God's ordinances are the green pastures; the Word of life is the nourishment of the new man; milk for babes, pasture for the sheep, never barren, never eaten bare, never parched, but always a green pasture for faith to feed in. God gives his saints quiet and contentment in their own minds, whatever their lot is; their souls dwell at ease in Him, and that makes every pasture green. It is by a constancy of the means of grace that the soul is fed.

2. They are well-guided, well-led; He leadeth me beside the still waters; by his Providence, by his Word, by his Spirit, disposes affairs for the best. The consolations of God, the joys of the Holy Ghost, are these still waters; streams which flow from the Fountain of living waters; not standing waters which corrupt and gather filth, nor troubled like the sea, nor rapid, rolling floods; but silent, purling waters; for the still, but running, waters, agree best with those spirits that flow out toward God, and yet do it silently. The divine guidance they are under is stripped of its metaphor, v. 3. He leadeth me in the paths of righteousness, in the way of my duty; in that He instructs me by his Word, and directs me by conscience and providence. These are the paths in which all the saints desire to be led and kept, and never to turn aside. And those only are led by the still waters of comfort that walk in the paths of righteousness. The way of duty is the truly pleasant way. It is the work of righteousness that is peace. In these paths we cannot walk, unless God both lead us into them, and lead us in them.

3. They are well-helped when any thing ails them; He restoreth my soul; 'He reduces me when I wander.' No creature will lose itself sooner than a sheep, so apt it is to go astray, and then so unapt to find the way back. The best saints are sensible of their proneness to go astray like lost sheep, 119: 176. When, after one sin, David's heart smote him, and, after another, Nathan was sent to tell him, Thou art the man, God restored his soul. God will not suffer his people to lie still in sin. 'He recovers me when I am sick, revives me when I am faint, and so restores the soul which was ready to depart.' He is the Lord our God that heals us, Ex. 15: 26. Many a time we had fainted, unless we had believed; and it was the good Shepherd that kept us from fainting.

See here the courage of a dying saint, v. 4. Those that are sick, those that are old, have reason to look upon themselves as in the valley of the shadow of death. One word, death, indeed sounds terrible; but, even in the supposition of the distress, four words lessen the terror. Death indeed

NOTES.

Ps. XXIII. The Chal. paraphrast thinks this Ps. is to be understood of the whole Israelitish people as one person, who were led as a flock out of Egypt, and nourished in the wilderness; but Kimchi understands it of David, when he fled from Saul, and hid in the forest of Hareth, 1 Sam. 22:5. and supposes it was afterwards accommodated to the Hebrew people on their return, under God, from exile in Babylon: so in Rosenm.; which last opinion, he says, seems as if by no means to be rejected. Dr. A. Clarke dissents, and thinks the Ps. not by David at all, but by some one after the captivity. Williams, on the other hand, as also, Morison, refers it without doubt to David; and the former thinks it one of the earliest of his compositions. Morison, moreover, sees nothing in the general sentiment or imagery of the Ps. peculiarly adapted to the return of a captive people; nor does he perceive so much the action and feeling of the many, as the minute and personal review of the individual. He therefore concludes it far more natural to attribute the Ps. to David than to any one else. As to the time of the Ps. he agrees with Dathe in fixing it at the opening of the reign of David. And that the Ps. contains in it a prophetic reference to Him who is 'the Chief Shepherd,' and 'who gave his life for the sheep,' can be doubted, he says, by those only who would deprive the composition of one of its essential charms. ED.

Verses 1—3.

(John 10.1—18, 26—31.) As Christ is 'the good,' 'the great,' 'the chief Shepherd;' we cannot doubt that He is JEHOVAH, and is especially intended. (80:1. Is. 40:9—11. Zech. 13:7. Acts 20:28. Heb. 13:20,21. 1 Pet. 5:1—4.) He is JEHOVAH, the omnipresent, omniscient, almighty God, One with the Father, and every way able and willing to take care of his sheep. SCOTT.

Verse 4.

Between that part of the flock which is on earth, and that which is gone to heaven, death lies, like a deep valley, that must be passed in going from the one to the other. ID.

8 Who is this King of glory? The LORD strong and mighty, the LORD mighty in battle.

9 Lift up your heads, O ye gates; even lift them up, ye everlasting doors; and the King of glory shall come in.

10 Who is this King of glory? The LORD of hosts, he is the King of glory. Selah.

PSALM XXV.

David, in trouble, prays for pardon, 1—7. Encouragement to others, 8—14. He prays for deliverance, 15—21.

A Psalm of David.

UNTO thee, O LORD, do I lift up my soul.

2 O my God, I trust in thee: let me not be ashamed, let not mine enemies triumph over me.

3 Yea, let none that wait on thee be ashamed: let them be ashamed which transgress without cause.

4 Shew me thy ways, O LORD; teach me thy paths.

5 Lead me in thy truth, and teach me: for thou art the God of my salvation; on thee do I wait all the day.

6 Remember, O LORD, thy tender mercies and thy lovingkindnesses; for they have been ever of old.

7 Remember not the sins of my youth, nor my transgressions: according to thy mercy remember thou me for thy goodness' sake, O LORD.

8 Good and upright is the LORD: therefore will he teach sinners in the way.

9 The meek will he guide in judgment: and the meek will he teach his way.

10 All the paths of the LORD are mercy and truth unto such as keep his covenant and his testimonies.

11 For thy name's sake, O LORD, pardon mine iniquity, for it is great.

12 What man is he that feareth the LORD? him shall he teach in the way that he shall choose.

13 His soul shall dwell at ease; and his seed shall inherit the earth.

14 The secret of the LORD is with them that fear him; and he will shew them his covenant.

15 Mine eyes are ever toward the LORD; for he shall pluck my feet out of the net.

16 Turn thee unto me, and have mercy upon me; for I am desolate and afflicted.

17 The troubles of my heart are enlarged: O bring thou me out of my distresses.

18 Look upon mine affliction and my pain; and forgive all my sins.

19 Consider mine enemies; for they are many; and they hate me with cruel hatred.

20 O keep my soul, and deliver me: let me not be ashamed; for I put my trust in thee.

21 Let integrity and uprightness preserve me; for I wait on thee.

22 Redeem Israel, O God, out of all his troubles.

PSALM XXVI.

David, in trouble, prays for pardon, 1—7. Encouragement to others, 8—14. He prays for deliverance, 15—21.

A Psalm of David.

JUDGE me, O LORD; for I have walked in mine integrity: I have trusted also in the LORD; therefore I shall not slide.

2 Examine me, O LORD, and prove me; try my reins and my heart.

3 For thy lovingkindness is before mine eyes: and I have walked in thy truth.

4 I have not sat with vain persons, neither will I go in with dissemblers.

5 I have hated the congregation of evil doers; and will not sit with the wicked.

6 I will wash mine hands in innocency: so will I compass thine altar, O LORD:

7 That I may publish with the voice of thanksgiving, and tell of all thy wondrous works.

8 LORD, I have loved the habitation of thy house, and the place where thine honour dwelleth.

9 Gather not my soul with sinners, nor my life with bloody men:

10 In whose hands is mischief, and their right hand is full of bribes.

11 But as for me, I will walk in mine integrity: redeem me, and be merciful unto me.

12 My foot standeth in an even place: in the congregations will I bless the LORD.

PSALM XXVII.

David's confidence in God, 1—6. He prays for deliverance, 7—12. Encouragement to others, 13, 14.

A Psalm of David.

THE LORD is my light and my salvation; whom shall I fear? the LORD is the strength of my life; of whom shall I be afraid?

2 When the wicked, even mine enemies and my foes, came upon me to eat up my flesh, they stumbled and fell.

3 Though an host should encamp against me, my heart shall not fear: though war should rise against me, in this will I be confident.

4 One thing have I desired of the LORD, that will I seek after; that I may dwell in the house of the LORD all the days of my life, to behold the beauty of the LORD, and to enquire in his temple.

5 For in the time of trouble he shall hide me in his pavilion: in the secret of his tabernacle shall he hide me; he shall set me up upon a rock.

6 And now shall mine head be lifted up above mine enemies round about me: therefore will I offer in his tabernacle sacrifices of joy; I will sing, yea, I will sing praises unto the LORD.

7 Hear, O LORD, when I cry with my voice: have mercy also upon me, and answer me.

8 When thou saidst, Seek ye my face; my heart said unto thee, Thy face, LORD, will I seek.

9 Hide not thy face far from me; put not thy servant away in anger: thou hast been my help; leave me not, neither forsake me, O God of my salvation.

10 When my father and my mother forsake me, then the LORD will take me up.

11 Teach me thy way, O LORD, and lead me in a plain path, because of mine enemies.

12 Deliver me not over unto the will of mine enemies: for false witnesses are risen up against me, and such as breathe out cruelty.

13 I had fainted, unless I had believed to see the goodness of the LORD in the land of the living.

14 Wait on the LORD: be of good courage, and he shall strengthen thine heart: wait, I say, on the LORD.

PSALM XXVIII.

David prays for deliverance, 1—5. Blessing God for hearing him, 6—8. He prays for the people, 9.

A Psalm of David.

UNTO thee will I cry, O LORD my rock; be not silent to me: lest, if thou be silent to me, I become like them that go down into the pit.

2 Hear the voice of my supplications, when I cry unto thee, when I lift up my hands toward thy holy oracle.

3 Draw me not away with the wicked, and with the workers of iniquity, which speak peace to their neighbours, but mischief is in their hearts.

4 Give them according to their deeds, and according to the wickedness of their endeavours: give them after the work of their hands; render to them their desert.

5 Because they regard not the works of the LORD, nor the operation of his hands, he shall destroy them, and not build them up.

6 Blessed be the LORD, because he hath heard the voice of my supplications.

7 The LORD is my strength and my shield; my heart trusted in him, and I am helped: therefore my heart greatly rejoiceth; and with my song will I praise him.

8 The LORD is their strength, and he is the saving strength of his anointed.

9 Save thy people, and bless thine inheritance: feed them also, and lift them up for ever.

PSALM XXIX.

The power and majesty of God in the thunder, 1—9. His kingdom, 10, 11.

A Psalm of David.

GIVE unto the LORD, O ye mighty, give unto the LORD glory and strength.

2 Give unto the LORD the glory due unto his name; worship the LORD in the beauty of holiness.

3 The voice of the LORD is upon the waters: the God of glory thundereth: the LORD is upon many waters.

4 The voice of the LORD is powerful; the voice of the LORD is full of majesty.

5 The voice of the LORD breaketh the cedars; yea, the LORD breaketh the cedars of Lebanon.

6 He maketh them also to skip like a calf; Lebanon and Sirion like a young unicorn.

7 The voice of the LORD divideth the flames of fire.

8 The voice of the LORD shaketh the wilderness; the LORD shaketh the wilderness of Kadesh.

9 The voice of the LORD maketh the hinds to calve, and discovereth the forests: and in his temple doth every one speak of his glory.

10 The LORD sat upon the flood; yea, the LORD sitteth King for ever.

11 The LORD will give strength unto his people; the LORD will bless his people with peace.

PSALM XXX.

David's thanksgiving for deliverance, 1—5. His prosperity, 6, 7. His prayer in trouble, 8—10. His thanksgiving, 11, 12.

A Psalm and Song at the dedication of the house of David.

I WILL extol thee, O LORD; for thou hast lifted me up, and hast not made my foes to rejoice over me.

2 O LORD my God, I cried unto thee, and thou hast healed me.

3 O LORD, thou hast brought up my soul from the grave: thou hast kept me alive, that I should not go down to the pit.

4 Sing unto the LORD, O ye saints of his, and give thanks at the remembrance of his holiness.

5 For his anger endureth but a moment; in his favour is life: weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning.

6 And in my prosperity I said, I shall never be moved.

7 LORD, by thy favour thou hast made my mountain to stand strong: thou didst hide thy face, and I was troubled.

8 I cried to thee, O LORD; and unto the LORD I made supplication.

9 What profit is there in my blood, when I go down to the pit? Shall the dust praise thee? shall it declare thy truth?

10 Hear, O LORD, and have mercy upon me: LORD, be thou my helper.

11 Thou hast turned for me my mourning into dancing: thou hast put off my sackcloth, and girded me with gladness;

12 To the end that my glory may sing praise to thee, and not be silent. O LORD my God, I will give thanks unto thee for ever.

PSALM XXXI.

David's confidence in God, 1—8. His prayer in trouble, 9—18. His thanksgiving, 19—24.

To the chief Musician, A Psalm of David.

IN thee, O LORD, do I put my trust; let me never be ashamed: deliver me in thy righteousness.

2 Bow down thine ear to me; deliver me speedily: be thou my strong rock, for a house of defence to save me.

3 For thou art my rock and my fortress; therefore for thy name's sake lead me, and guide me.

4 Pull me out of the net that they have laid privily for me: for thou art my strength.

5 Into thine hand I commit my spirit: thou hast redeemed me, O LORD God of truth.

6 I have hated them that regard lying vanities: but I trust in the LORD.

7 I will be glad and rejoice in thy mercy: for thou hast considered my trouble; thou hast known my soul in adversities;

8 And hast not shut me up into the hand of the enemy: thou hast set my feet in a large room.

9 Have mercy upon me, O LORD, for I am in trouble: mine eye is consumed with grief, yea, my soul and my belly.

10 For my life is spent with grief, and my years with sighing: my strength faileth because of mine iniquity, and my bones are consumed.

11 I was a reproach among all mine enemies, but especially among my neighbours, and a fear to mine acquaintance: they that did see me without fled from me.

12 I am forgotten as a dead man out of mind: I am like a broken vessel.

13 For I have heard the slander of many: fear was on every side: while they took counsel together against me, they devised to take away my life.

14 But I trusted in thee, O LORD: I said, Thou art my God.

15 My times are in thy hand: deliver me from the hand of mine enemies, and from them that persecute me.

16 Make thy face to shine upon thy servant: save me for thy mercies' sake.

17 Let me not be ashamed, O LORD; for I have called upon thee: let the wicked be ashamed, and let them be silent in the grave.

18 Let the lying lips be put to silence; which speak grievous things proudly and contemptuously against the righteous.

19 Oh how great is thy goodness, which thou hast laid up for them that fear thee; which thou hast wrought for them that trust in thee before the sons of men!

20 Thou shalt hide them in the secret of thy presence from the pride of man: thou shalt keep them secretly in a pavilion from the strife of tongues.

21 Blessed be the LORD: for he hath shewed me his marvellous kindness in a strong city.

22 For I said in my haste, I am cut off from before thine eyes: nevertheless thou heardest the voice of my supplications when I cried unto thee.

23 O love the LORD, all ye his saints: for the LORD preserveth the faithful, and plentifully rewardeth the proud doer.

24 Be of good courage, and he shall strengthen your heart, all ye that hope in the LORD.

PSALM XXXII.

The blessedness of pardon, 1, 2. David's experience, 3—5. Encouragement to others, 6—11.

A Psalm of David, Maschil.

BLESSED is he whose transgression is forgiven, whose sin is covered.

2 Blessed the man unto whom the LORD imputeth not iniquity, and in whose spirit there is no guile.

3 When I kept silence, my bones waxed old through my roaring all the day long.

4 For day and night thy hand was heavy upon me: my moisture is turned into the drought of summer. Selah.

5 I acknowledged my sin unto thee, and mine iniquity have I not hid. I said, I will confess my transgressions unto the LORD; and thou forgavest the iniquity of my sin. Selah.

6 For this shall every one that is godly pray unto thee in a time when thou mayest be found: surely in the flood of great waters they shall not come nigh unto him.

7 Thou art my hiding place; thou shalt preserve me from trouble; thou shalt compass me about with songs of deliverance. Selah.

8 I will instruct thee and teach thee in the way which thou shalt go: I will guide thee with mine eye.

9 Be ye not as the horse, or as the mule, which have no understanding: whose mouth must be held in with bit and bridle, lest they come near unto thee.

10 Many sorrows shall be to the wicked: but he that trusteth in the LORD, mercy shall compass him about.

11 Be glad in the LORD, and rejoice, ye righteous: and shout for joy, all ye that are upright in heart.

PSALM XXXIII.

Exhortation to praise God, 1—3. His power and providence, 4—19. Encouragement to trust in him, 20—22.

REJOICE in the LORD, O ye righteous: for praise is comely for the upright.

2 Praise the LORD with harp: sing unto him with the psaltery and an instrument of ten strings.

3 Sing unto him a new song; play skilfully with a loud noise.

4 For the word of the LORD is right; and all his works are done in truth.

5 He loveth righteousness and judgment: the earth is full of the goodness of the LORD.

6 By the word of the LORD were the heavens made; and all the host of them by the breath of his mouth.

7 He gathereth the waters of the sea together as an heap: he layeth up the depth in storehouses.

8 Let all the earth fear the LORD: let all the inhabitants of the world stand in awe of him.

9 For he spake, and it was done; he commanded, and it stood fast.

10 The LORD bringeth the counsel of the heathen to nought: he maketh the devices of the people of none effect.

11 The counsel of the LORD standeth for ever, the thoughts of his heart to all generations.

12 Blessed is the nation whose God is the LORD; and the people whom he hath chosen for his own inheritance.

13 The LORD looketh from heaven; he beholdeth all the sons of men.

14 From the place of his habitation he looketh upon all the inhabitants of the earth.

15 He fashioneth their hearts alike; he considereth all their works.

16 There is no king saved by the multitude of a host: a mighty man is not delivered by much strength.

17 An horse is a vain thing for safety: neither shall he deliver any by his great strength.

18 Behold, the eye of the LORD is upon them that fear him, upon them that hope in his mercy;

19 To deliver their soul from death, and keep them alive in famine.

20 Our soul waiteth for the LORD: he is our help and our shield.

21 For our heart shall rejoice in him, because we have trusted in his holy name.

22 Let thy mercy, O LORD, be upon us, according as we hope in thee.

PSALM XXXIV.

David's thanksgiving for deliverance, 1—7. Encouragement to others, 8—14. The happiness of the righteous, 15—22.

A Psalm of David, when he changed his behaviour before Abimelech; who drove him away, and he departed.

I WILL bless the LORD at all times: his praise shall continually be in my mouth.

2 My soul shall make her boast in the LORD: the humble shall hear thereof, and be glad.

3 O magnify the LORD with me, and let us exalt his name together.

4 I sought the LORD, and he heard me, and delivered me from all my fears.

5 They looked unto him, and were lightened: and their faces were not ashamed.

6 This poor man cried, and the LORD heard him, and saved him out of all his troubles.

7 The angel of the LORD encampeth round about them that fear him, and delivereth them.

8 O taste and see that the LORD is good: blessed is the man that trusteth in him.

9 O fear the LORD, ye his saints: for there is no want to them that fear him.

10 The young lions do lack, and suffer hunger: but they that seek the LORD shall not want any good thing.

11 Come, ye children, hearken unto me: I will teach you the fear of the LORD.

12 What man is he that desireth life, and loveth many days, that he may see good?

13 Keep thy tongue from evil, and thy lips from speaking guile.

14 Depart from evil, and do good; seek peace, and pursue it.

15 The eyes of the LORD are upon the righteous, and his ears are open unto their cry.

16 The face of the LORD is against them that do evil, to cut off the remembrance of them from the earth.

17 The righteous cry, and the LORD heareth, and delivereth them out of all their troubles.

18 The LORD is nigh unto them that are of a broken heart; and saveth such as be of a contrite spirit.

19 Many are the afflictions of the righteous: but the LORD delivereth him out of them all.

20 He keepeth all his bones: not one of them is broken.

21 Evil shall slay the wicked: and they that hate the righteous shall be desolate.

22 The LORD redeemeth the soul of his servants: and none of them that trust in him shall be desolate.

PSALM XXXV.

David prays for deliverance, 1—10. He complains of his enemies, 11—16. He prays for deliverance, 17—21. He encourages himself, 22—28.

A Psalm of David.

PLEAD my cause, O LORD, with them that strive with me: fight against them that fight against me.

2 Take hold of shield and buckler, and stand up for mine help.

3 Draw out also the spear, and stop the way against them that persecute me: say unto my soul, I am thy salvation.

4 Let them be confounded and put to shame that seek after my soul: let them be turned back and brought to confusion that devise my hurt.

5 Let them be as chaff before the wind: and let the angel of the LORD chase them.

6 Let their way be dark and slippery: and let the angel of the LORD persecute them.

7 For without cause have they hid for me their net in a pit, which without cause they have digged for my soul.

8 Let destruction come upon him at unawares; and let his net that he hath hid catch himself: into that very destruction let him fall.

9 And my soul shall be joyful in the LORD: it shall rejoice in his salvation.

10 All my bones shall say, LORD, who is like unto thee, which deliverest the poor from him that is too strong for him, yea, the poor and the needy from him that spoileth him?

11 False witnesses did rise up; they laid to my charge things that I knew not.

12 They rewarded me evil for good to the spoiling of my soul.

13 But as for me, when they were sick, my clothing was sackcloth: I humbled my soul with fasting; and my prayer returned into mine own bosom.

14 I behaved myself as though he had been my friend or brother: I bowed down heavily, as one that mourneth for his mother.

15 But in mine adversity they rejoiced, and gathered themselves together: yea, the abjects gathered themselves together against me, and I knew it not; they did tear me, and ceased not:

16 With hypocritical mockers in feasts, they gnashed upon me with their teeth.

17 LORD, how long wilt thou look on? rescue my soul from their destructions, my darling from the lions.

18 I will give thee thanks in the great congregation: I will praise thee among much people.

19 Let not them that are mine enemies wrongfully rejoice over me: neither let them wink with the eye that hate me without a cause.

20 For they speak not peace: but they devise deceitful matters against them that are quiet in the land.

21 Yea, they opened their mouth wide against me, and said, Aha, aha, our eye hath seen it.

22 This thou hast seen, O LORD: keep not silence: O Lord, be not far from me.

23 Stir up thyself, and awake to my judgment, even unto my cause, my God and my Lord.

24 Judge me, O LORD my God, according to thy righteousness; and let them not rejoice over me.

25 Let them not say in their hearts, Ah, so would we have it: let them not say, We have swallowed him up.

26 Let them be ashamed and brought to confusion together that rejoice at mine hurt: let them be clothed with shame and dishonour that magnify themselves against me.

27 Let them shout for joy, and be glad, that favour my righteous cause: yea, let them say continually, Let the LORD be magnified, which hath pleasure in the prosperity of his servant.

28 And my tongue shall speak of thy righteousness and of thy praise all the day long.

PSALM XXXVI.

The wickedness of man, 1—4. The goodness of God, 5—9. He prays for his people, 10—12.

To the chief Musician, A Psalm of David the servant of the LORD.

THE transgression of the wicked saith within my heart, that there is no fear of God before his eyes.

2 For he flattereth himself in his own eyes, until his iniquity be found to be hateful.

3 The words of his mouth are iniquity and deceit: he hath left off to behave himself wisely, and to do good.

4 He deviseth mischief upon his bed, he setteth himself in a way that is not good; he abhorreth not evil.

5 Thy mercy, O LORD, is in the heavens; and thy faithfulness reacheth unto the clouds.

6 Thy righteousness is like the great mountains; thy judgments are a great deep: O LORD, thou preservest man and beast.

7 How excellent is thy lovingkindness, O God! therefore the children of men put their trust under the shadow of thy wings.

8 They shall be abundantly satisfied with the fatness of thy house; and thou shalt make them drink of the river of thy pleasures.

9 For with thee is the fountain of life: in thy light shall we see light.

10 O continue thy lovingkindness unto them that know thee; and thy righteousness to the upright in heart.

11 Let not the foot of pride come against me, and let not the hand of the wicked remove me.

12 There are the workers of iniquity fallen: they are cast down, and shall not be able to rise.

PSALM XXXVII.

Exhortation to trust in God, 1—11. The prosperity of the wicked, 12—22. The happiness of the righteous, 23—40.

A Psalm of David.

FRET not thyself because of evil doers, neither be thou envious against the workers of iniquity.

2 For they shall soon be cut down like the grass, and wither as the green herb.

3 Trust in the LORD, and do good; so shalt thou dwell in the land, and verily thou shalt be fed.

4 Delight thyself also in the LORD: and he shall give thee the desires of thine heart.

5 Commit thy way unto the LORD; trust also in him; and he shall bring it to pass.

6 And he shall bring forth thy righteousness as the light, and thy judgment as the noonday.

7 Rest in the LORD, and wait patiently for him: fret not thyself because of him who prospereth in his way, because of the man who bringeth wicked devices to pass.

8 Cease from anger, and forsake wrath: fret not thyself in any wise to do evil.

9 For evil doers shall be cut off: but those that wait upon the LORD, they shall inherit the earth.

10 For yet a little while, and the wicked shall not be: yea, thou shalt diligently consider his place, and it shall not be.

11 But the meek shall inherit the earth; and shall delight themselves in the abundance of peace.

12 The wicked plotteth against the just, and gnasheth upon him with his teeth.

13 The Lord shall laugh at him: for he seeth that his day is coming.

14 The wicked have drawn out the sword, and have bent their bow, to cast down the poor and needy, and to slay such as be of upright conversation.

15 Their sword shall enter into their own heart, and their bows shall be broken.

16 A little that a righteous man hath is better than the riches of many wicked.

17 For the arms of the wicked shall be broken: but the LORD upholdeth the righteous.

18 The LORD knoweth the days of the upright: and their inheritance shall be for ever.

19 They shall not be ashamed in the evil time: and in the days of famine they shall be satisfied.

20 But the wicked shall perish, and the enemies of the LORD shall be as the fat of lambs: they shall consume; into smoke shall they consume away.

21 The wicked borrowed, and paid not again: but the righteous sheweth mercy, and giveth.

22 For such as be blessed of him shall inherit the earth; and they that be cursed of him shall be cut off.

23 The steps of a good man are ordered by the LORD: and he delighteth in his way.

24 Though he fall, he shall not be utterly cast down: for the LORD upholdeth him with his hand.

25 I have been young, and now am old; yet have I not seen the righteous forsaken, nor his seed begging bread.

26 He is ever merciful, and lendeth; and his seed is blessed.

27 Depart from evil, and do good; and dwell for evermore.

28 For the LORD loveth judgment, and forsaketh not his saints; they are preserved for ever: but the seed of the wicked shall be cut off.

29 The righteous shall inherit the land, and dwell therein for ever.

30 The mouth of the righteous speaketh wisdom, and his tongue talketh of judgment.

31 The law of his God is in his heart; none of his steps shall slide.

32 The wicked watcheth the righteous, and seeketh to slay him.

33 The LORD will not leave him in his hand, nor condemn him when he is judged.

34 Wait on the LORD, and keep his way, and he shall exalt thee to inherit the land: when the wicked are cut off, thou shalt see it.

35 I have seen the wicked in great power, and spreading himself like a green bay tree.

36 Yet he passed away, and, lo, he was not: yea, I sought him, but he could not be found.

37 Mark the perfect man, and behold the upright: for the end of that man is peace.

38 But the transgressors shall be destroyed together: the end of the wicked shall be cut off.

39 But the salvation of the righteous is of the LORD: he is their strength in the time of trouble.

40 And the LORD shall help them, and deliver them: he shall deliver them from the wicked, and save them, because they trust in him.

PSALM XXXVIII.

David's prayer in trouble, 1—14. His confidence in God, 15—22.

A Psalm of David, to bring to remembrance.

O LORD, rebuke me not in thy wrath: neither chasten me in thy hot displeasure.

2 For thine arrows stick fast in me, and thy hand presseth me sore.

3 There is no soundness in my flesh because of thine anger; neither is there any rest in my bones because of my sin.

4 For mine iniquities are gone over mine head: as a heavy burden they are too heavy for me.

5 My wounds stink and are corrupt because of my foolishness.

6 I am troubled; I am bowed down greatly; I go mourning all the day long.

7 For my loins are filled with a loathsome disease: and there is no soundness in my flesh.

8 I am feeble and sore broken: I have roared by reason of the disquietness of my heart.

9 LORD, all my desire is before thee; and my groaning is not hid from thee.

10 My heart panteth, my strength faileth me: as for the light of mine eyes, it also is gone from me.

11 My lovers and my friends stand aloof from my sore; and my kinsmen stand afar off.

12 They also that seek after my life lay snares for me: and they that seek my hurt speak mischievous things, and imagine deceits all the day long.

13 But I, as a deaf man, heard not; and I was as a dumb man that openeth not his mouth.

14 Thus I was as a man that heareth not, and in whose mouth are no reasons.

15 For in thee, O LORD, do I hope: thou wilt hear, O Lord my God.

16 For I said, Hear me, lest otherwise they should rejoice over me: when my foot slippeth, they magnify themselves against me.

17 For I am ready to halt, and my sorrow is continually before me.

18 For I will declare mine iniquity; I will be sorry for my sin.

19 But mine enemies are lively, and they are strong: and they that hate me wrongfully are multiplied.

20 They also that render evil for good are mine adversaries; because I follow the thing that good is.

21 Forsake me not, O LORD: O my God, be not far from me.

22 Make haste for my help, O Lord my salvation.

PSALM XXXIX.

David's prayer for the shortness of life, 1—6. His confidence in God, 7—13.

To the chief Musician, to Jeduthun, A Psalm of David.

I SAID, I will take heed to my ways, that I sin not with my tongue: I will keep my mouth with a bridle, while the wicked is before me.

2 I was dumb with silence, I held my peace, even from good; and my sorrow was stirred.

3 My heart was hot within me, while I was musing the fire burned: then spake I with my tongue,

4 LORD, make me to know mine end, and the measure of my days, what it is; that I may know how frail I am.

5 Behold, thou hast made my days as an handbreadth; and mine age is as nothing before thee: verily every man at his best state is altogether vanity. Selah.

6 Surely every man walketh in a vain show: surely they are disquieted in vain: he heapeth up riches, and knoweth not who shall gather them.

7 And now, Lord, what wait I for? my hope is in thee.

8 Deliver me from all my transgressions: make me not the reproach of the foolish.

9 I was dumb, I opened not my mouth; because thou didst it.

10 Remove thy stroke away from me: I am consumed by the blow of thine hand.

11 When thou with rebukes dost correct man for iniquity, thou makest his beauty to consume away like a moth: surely every man is vanity. Selah.

12 Hear my prayer, O LORD, and give ear unto my cry; hold not thy peace at my tears: for I am a stranger with thee, and a sojourner, as all my fathers were.

13 O spare me, that I may recover strength, before I go hence, and be no more.

PSALM XL.

David's thanksgiving for deliverance, 1—5. His resolution to obey God, 6—10. He prays for deliverance, 11—17.

To the chief Musician, A Psalm of David.

I WAITED patiently for the LORD; and he inclined unto me, and heard my cry.

2 He brought me up also out of an horrible pit, out of the miry clay, and set my feet upon a rock, and established my goings.

3 And he hath put a new song in my mouth, even praise unto our God: many shall see it, and fear, and shall trust in the LORD.

4 Blessed is that man that maketh the LORD his trust, and respecteth not the proud, nor such as turn aside to lies.

5 Many, O LORD my God, are thy wonderful works which thou hast done, and thy thoughts which are to us-ward: they cannot be reckoned up in order unto thee: if I would declare and speak of them, they are more than can be numbered.

6 Sacrifice and offering thou didst not desire; mine ears hast thou opened: burnt offering and sin offering hast thou not required.

7 Then said I, Lo, I come: in the volume of the book it is written of me,

8 I delight to do thy will, O my God: yea, thy law is within my heart.

9 I have preached righteousness in the great congregation: lo, I have not refrained my lips, O LORD, thou knowest.

10 I have not hid thy righteousness within my heart; I have declared thy faithfulness and thy salvation: I have not concealed thy lovingkindness and thy truth from the great congregation.

11 Withhold not thou thy tender mercies from me, O LORD: let thy lovingkindness and thy truth continually preserve me.

12 For innumerable evils have compassed me about: mine iniquities have taken hold upon me, so that I am not able to look up; they are more than the hairs of mine head: therefore my heart faileth me.

13 Be pleased, O LORD, to deliver me: O LORD, make haste to help me.

14 Let them be ashamed and confounded together that seek after my soul to destroy it; let them be driven backward and put to confusion that wish me evil.

15 Let them be desolate for a reward of their shame that say unto me, Aha, aha.

16 Let all those that seek thee rejoice and be glad in thee: let such as love thy salvation say continually, The LORD be magnified.

17 But I am poor and needy; yet the Lord thinketh upon me: thou art my help and my deliverer; make no tarrying, O my God.

PSALM XLI.

The happiness of him that considereth the poor, 1—3. David's prayer in trouble, 4—10. His confidence in God, 11—13.

To the chief Musician, A Psalm of David.

BLESSED is he that considereth the poor: the LORD will deliver him in time of trouble.

2 The LORD will preserve him, and keep him alive; and he shall be blessed upon the earth: and thou wilt not deliver him unto the will of his enemies.

3 The LORD will strengthen him upon the bed of languishing: thou wilt make all his bed in his sickness.

4 I said, LORD, be merciful unto me: heal my soul; for I have sinned against thee.

5 Mine enemies speak evil of me, When shall he die, and his name perish?

6 And if he come to see me, he speaketh vanity: his heart gathereth iniquity to itself; when he goeth abroad, he telleth it.

7 All that hate me whisper together against me: against me do they devise my hurt.

8 An evil disease, say they, cleaveth fast unto him: and now that he lieth he shall rise up no more.

9 Yea, mine own familiar friend, in whom I trusted, which did eat of my bread, hath lifted up his heel against me.

10 But thou, O LORD, be merciful unto me, and raise me up, that I may requite them.

11 By this I know that thou favourest me, because mine enemy doth not triumph over me.

12 And as for me, thou upholdest me in mine integrity, and settest me before thy face for ever.

13 Blessed be the LORD God of Israel from everlasting, and to everlasting. Amen, and Amen.

BOOK II.

PSALM XLII.

The longing of the soul for God, 1—4. Encouragement to trust in God, 5—11.

To the chief Musician, Maschil, for the sons of Korah.

AS the hart panteth after the water brooks, so panteth my soul after thee, O God.

2 My soul thirsteth for God, for the living God: when shall I come and appear before God?

3 My tears have been my meat day and night, while they continually say unto me, Where is thy God?

4 When I remember these things, I pour out my soul in me: for I had gone with the multitude, I went with them to the house of God, with the voice of joy and praise, with a multitude that kept holyday.

5 Why art thou cast down, O my soul? and why art thou disquieted in me? hope thou in God: for I shall yet praise him for the help of his countenance.

6 O my God, my soul is cast down within me: therefore will I remember thee from the land of Jordan, and of the Hermonites, from the hill Mizar.

7 Deep calleth unto deep at the noise of thy waterspouts: all thy waves and thy billows are gone over me.

8 Yet the LORD will command his lovingkindness in the daytime, and in the night his song shall be with me, and my prayer unto the God of my life.

9 I will say unto God my rock, Why hast thou forgotten me? why go I mourning because of the oppression of the enemy?

10 As with a sword in my bones, mine enemies reproach me; while they say daily unto me, Where is thy God?

11 Why art thou cast down, O my soul? and why art thou disquieted within me? hope in God: for I shall yet praise him, who is the health of my countenance, and my God.

PSALM XLIII.

David's confidence in God, 1—4. Encouragement to trust in God, 5.

JUDGE me, O God, and plead my cause against an ungodly nation: O deliver me from the deceitful and unjust man.

2 For thou art the God of my strength: why dost thou cast me off? why go I mourning because of the oppression of the enemy?

3 O send out thy light and thy truth: let them lead me; let them bring me unto thy holy hill, and to thy tabernacles.

4 Then will I go unto the altar of God, unto God my exceeding joy: yea, upon the harp will I praise thee, O God my God.

5 Why art thou cast down, O my soul? and why art thou disquieted within me? hope in God: for I shall yet praise him, who is the health of my countenance, and my God.

PSALM XLIV.

The people's complaint of their distress, 1—8. Their complaint of God's dealings, 9—22. They pray for deliverance, 23—26.

To the chief Musician for the sons of Korah, Maschil.

WE have heard with our ears, O God, our fathers have told us, what work thou didst in their days, in the times of old.

2 How thou didst drive out the heathen with thy hand, and plantedst them; how thou didst afflict the people, and cast them out.

3 For they got not the land in possession by their own sword, neither did their own arm save them: but thy right hand, and thine arm, and the light of thy countenance, because thou hadst a favour unto them.

4 Thou art my King, O God: command deliverances for Jacob.

5 Through thee will we push down our enemies: through thy name will we tread them under that rise up against us.

6 For I will not trust in my bow, neither shall my sword save me.

7 But thou hast saved us from our enemies, and hast put them to shame that hated us.

8 In God we boast all the day long, and praise thy name for ever. Selah.

9 But thou hast cast off, and put us to shame; and goest not forth with our armies.

10 Thou makest us to turn back from the enemy: and they which hate us spoil for themselves.

11 Thou hast given us like sheep appointed for meat; and hast scattered us among the heathen.

12 Thou sellest thy people for nought, and dost not increase thy wealth by their price.

13 Thou makest us a reproach to our neighbours, a scorn and a derision to them that are round about us.

14 Thou makest us a byword among the heathen, a shaking of the head among the people.

15 My confusion is continually before me, and the shame of my face hath covered me, 16 For the voice of him that reproacheth and blasphemeth; by reason of the enemy and avenger.

17 All this is come upon us; yet have we not forgotten thee, neither have we dealt falsely in thy covenant.

18 Our heart is not turned back, neither have our steps declined from thy way;

19 Though thou hast sore broken us in the place of dragons, and covered us with the shadow of death.

20 If we have forgotten the name of our God, or stretched out our hands to a strange god;

21 Shall not God search this out? for he knoweth the secrets of the heart.

22 Yea, for thy sake are we killed all the day long; we are counted as sheep for the slaughter.

23 Awake, why sleepest thou, O Lord? arise, cast us not off for ever.

24 Wherefore hidest thou thy face, and forgettest our affliction and our oppression?

25 For our soul is bowed down to the dust: our belly cleaveth unto the earth.

26 Arise for our help, and redeem us for thy mercies' sake.

PSALM XLV.

The excellency of Christ, 1—9. The duty of the church, 10—15. The glory of Christ's kingdom, 16, 17.

To the chief Musician upon Shoshannim, for the sons of Korah, Maschil, A Song of loves.

MY heart is inditing a good matter: I speak of the things which I have made touching the king: my tongue is the pen of a ready writer.

2 Thou art fairer than the children of men: grace is poured into thy lips: therefore God hath blessed thee for ever.

3 Gird thy sword upon thy thigh, O most mighty, with thy glory and thy majesty.

4 And in thy majesty ride prosperously because of truth and meekness and righteousness; and thy right hand shall teach thee terrible things.

5 Thine arrows are sharp in the heart of the king's enemies; whereby the people fall under thee.

6 Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever: the sceptre of thy kingdom is a right sceptre.

7 Thou lovest righteousness, and hatest wickedness: therefore God, thy God, hath anointed thee with the oil of gladness above thy fellows.

8 All thy garments smell of myrrh, and aloes, and cassia, out of the ivory palaces, whereby they have made thee glad.

9 Kings' daughters were among thy honourable women: upon thy right hand did stand the queen in gold of Ophir.

10 Hearken, O daughter, and consider, and incline thine ear; forget also thine own people, and thy father's house;

11 So shall the king greatly desire thy beauty: for he is thy Lord; and worship thou him.

12 And the daughter of Tyre shall be there with a gift; even the rich among the people shall entreat thy favour.

13 The king's daughter is all glorious within: her clothing is of wrought gold.

14 She shall be brought unto the king in raiment of needlework: the virgins her companions that follow her shall be brought unto thee.

15 With gladness and rejoicing shall they be brought: they shall enter into the king's palace.

16 Instead of thy fathers shall be thy children, whom thou mayest make princes in all the earth.

17 I will make thy name to be remembered in all generations: therefore shall the people praise thee for ever and ever.

PSALM XLVI.

God's protection of his people, 1—7. His power and providence, 8—11.

accept the devotions and services of his peculiar chosen people, v. 3—5. it is not because He needs them, or can be benefited by them, see Exod. 19: 5.—Ps. 50: 12. It is likewise to be applied to the dominion Christ has, as Mediator, over the utmost parts of the earth, which are given Him for his possession. The apostle quotes this Scripture twice in his discourse about things offered to idols, 1 Cor. 10: 26, 28. This is a good reason why we should be content with our allotment in this world, and not envy others theirs; the earth is the Lord's, and may He not do what He will with his own, and give to some more of it, to others less, as it pleases Him?

II. The ground of this propriety; an indisputable title, He hath founded it, v. 2. The matter is his, for He made it out of nothing; the form is his, for He made it according to the eternal counsels and ideas of his own mind. He made it Himself, and for Himself, and it abideth, Eccl. 1: 4. so He is sole, entire, absolute, Owner, and none can let us a title to any part, but by, from, and under, Him; see 89: 11,12. The waters which at first covered the earth, and rendered it unfit to be a habitation for man, were ordered under it, that the dry land might appear, and so they are as a foundation to it; see 104: 8, 9.

V. 3—6. From this world, and the fulness thereof, the psalmist's meditations rise, of a sudden, to the great things of another world, the foundation of which is not on the seas, nor on the floods.

I. Here is an inquiry after better things, v. 3. A soul that knows and considers its own nature, original, and immortality, when it has viewed the earth and the fulness thereof, will sit down unsatisfied; there is not found among all the creatures a help meet for man, therefore it will think of ascending toward God, toward heaven. This question is much the same with that, 15: 1. The hill of Zion, on which the temple was built, typified the church, both visible and invisible. When the people attended the ark to its holy place, David put them in mind, that these were but patterns of heavenly things, and therefore that by them they should be led to consider the heavenly things themselves.

II. An answer to this inquiry.

1. The properties of God's peculiar people, (1.) They are such as keep themselves from all the gross acts of sin. None that were ceremonially unclean might enter into the mountain of the temple, which signified that cleanness of conversation required in all those that have fellowship with God. (2.) They are such as make conscience of being really, that is, inwardly, as good as they seem to be outwardly; they have pure hearts. We make nothing of our religion, if we do not make heart-work of it. Yet in vain do those pretend to have pure and good hearts, whose hands are defiled with the acts of sin. A pure heart is sincere and without guile in covenanting with God, is carefully guarded, that the wicked one, the unclean spirit, touch it not, is purified by faith, and conformed to the image and will of God; see Matt. 5: 8. (3.) They are such as do not set their affections on the things of this world; whose hearts are not carried out inordinately toward the wealth of the world, the praise of men, or the delights of sense; who do not choose these things for their portion, because they believe them to be vanity, uncertain and unsatisfying. (4.) They are such as deal honestly both with God and man. In their covenant with God, and their contracts with men, they have not sworn deceitfully, nor broken their promises, violated their engagements, or taken any false oath. (5.) They are a praying people, v. 6. In every age there is a remnant of this character, who are accounted to the Lord for a generation, 22: 30. such as seek God, that seek thy face, O Jacob. They join themselves to God, to seek Him; not only in earnest prayer, but in serious endeavors to obtain his favor, and keep themselves in his love; this is the top of their happiness. They join themselves to the people of God, to seek God with them; conforming to the patterns of the saints gone before (so some); they seek God's face, as Jacob, so some, who was therefore surnamed Israel, because he wrestled with God and prevailed, sought Him and found Him; and, associating with the saints of their own day, they shall court the favor of God's church, Rev. 3: 9. be glad of an acquaintance with God's people Zech. 8: 23. incorporate themselves with them, and when they subscribe with their hands to the Lord, shall call themselves by the name of Jacob, Isa. 44: 5. As soon as Paul was converted, he joined himself to the disciples, Acts 9: 26. They shall seek God's face in Jacob, so some, in the assemblies of his people; Thy face, O God of Jacob; so our margin supplies. As all believers are the spiritual seed of Abraham, so all that strive in prayer are the spiritual seed of Jacob, to whom God never said, Seek ye Me in vain.

2. The privileges of God's peculiar people, v. 5. They shall be made truly and for ever happy: shall be justified, and sanctified. These are the spiritual blessings in heavenly things, which they shall receive, even righteousness, the very thing they hunger and thirst after, Matt. 5: 6. Righteousness is blessedness, and it is from God only that we must expect it, for we have no righteousness of our own. They shall receive the reward of their righteousness, so some, the crown of righteousness which the righteous Judge shall give. They shall be saved; for God Himself will be the God of their salvation.

V. 7—10. What is spoken once, is spoken a second time, in these vs.; such repetitions are usual in songs, and have much beauty in them. Here is entrance once and again demanded for the King of glory, and inquiry once and again made concerning this mighty Prince, in whose name entrance is demanded; as, when any knock at our door, it is common to ask, Who is there? Also satisfaction is once and again given concerning the royal Person that makes the demand, v. 8, 10. Now,

1. This splendid entry here described, probably refers to the solemn bringing in of the ark into the tent David pitched for it, or the temple Solomon built for it; for when David prepared materials for its building, it was proper for him to prepare a Ps. for its dedication. The porters are called upon to open the doors, and they are called everlasting doors, because much more durable than the door of the tabernacle, which was but a curtain. They are taught to ask, Who is this King of glory? And they that bear the ark are taught to answer, in the language before us, and very fitly, because the ark was a symbol or token of God's presence,

Verses 3—6.

External privileges were granted to Israel as a nation; but the character of the true Israelite was here inquired after. (See on Ps. 15:) A holy life, springing from a sanctified heart, free from external and mental idolatry, and all corrupt affections and carnal confidences, united with watchfulness against all hypocrisy and dissimulation; an exact punctuality and fidelity to every vow, profession, or engagement, to God or man;—these things distinguished the acceptable worshippers from the rest of the congregation at the sanctuary, as they now do real from nominal Christians. This character originates from regeneration; and is gradually formed by the Divine Spirit, through faith: and while others derive no benefit from divine ordinances, persons of this description 'receive the blessing from the LORD' continually; even 'righteousness from the God of salvation.' For 'by the Spirit they wait for the hope of righteousness through faith.' (M. R. n.) Thus it is very clearly stated, that while separation from sin, and a pious, conscientious conduct, prepare a man's heart for receiving divine blessings, and evidence his interest in them; they do not constitute his justifying righteousness, or merit the favor of God; in whom he must trust as the 'God of his salvation,' and from whom he must receive 'the gift of righteousness by faith.' (Is. 54:15—17. Rom. 4:14—22. 10:1—4. Gal. 5:1—6.) They, who thus trust and serve God, constitute the generation of those who seek Him, as Jacob did, and so enjoy his favor, as 'the God of Jacob.' (M.) The clause is rendered in the old translation, 'This is Jacob,' the true seed of Abraham, the true Israel.—To interpret this of Christ exclusively, or at all, except as our example, supposes Him to 'receive righteousness from the God of his Salvation,' instead of our being 'made the righteousness of God in Him.' SCOTT.

Verses 7—10.

It is supposed, that the priests who bare the ark, and the Levites who attended them, demanded entrance into the tabernacle from those who kept the gates. The expression, 'Lift up your heads, O ye gates,' may allude to the form in which the gates were made, the upper part lifting up, to render the entrance more spacious: the gates might be called 'everlasting,' because the ark was to have an abiding residence on mt. Zion, where a durable temple was about to be erected. ID.

PSALM XXV.

David, trusting in God and waiting on Him, prays for protection and guidance, 1—5. Pleading the mercy of God and the honor of his name, he entreats forgiveness; and shows the Lord's readiness to teach the meek and upright, 6—11. He states the privileges of the godly, and blends his complaints with earnest prayers for himself, and for Israel, 12—22.

A Psalm of David.

Josh. 3: 11. Or, it may be taken as a poetical figure designed to represent the subject more affectingly. God, in his Word and ordinances, is thus to be welcomed by us. (1.) With great readiness; the door and gates must be thrown open to Him. (2.) With all reverence, remembering how great a God He is, with whom we have to do, in all our approaches to Him.

2. Doubtless, it points at Christ, of whom the ark, with the mercy-seat, was a type. (1.) We may apply it to the ascension of Christ into heaven, and the welcome given to him there. His approach being very magnificent, the angels ask, Who is this King of glory? Rev. 21: 12. (2.) We may apply it to Christ's entrance into the souls of men by his Word and Spirit, that they may be his temples. Christ's presence in them is like that of the ark in the temple, it sanctifies them. Behold, He stands at the door and knocks, Rev. 3: 20. The gospel call and demand is, that we let Jesus Christ, the King of glory, come into our souls, and welcome Him with hosannas, Blessed is He that cometh. That we may do this aright, we are concerned to ask, Who this King of glory is? so to acquaint ourselves with Him whom we are to believe in, and to love above all. And the answer is ready; He is Jehovah, and will be Jehovah our righteousness, an all-sufficient Savior to us, if we give Him entrance and entertainment. He is strong and mighty, and the Lord of hosts; therefore it is at our peril if we deny Him entrance.

In singing this, let our hearts cheerfully answer to this call, as it is in the first words of the next Ps. Unto Thee, O Lord, do I lift up my soul.

Ps. XXV. This Ps. is full of devout affection to God; the out-goings of holy desires toward his favor and grace, and the lively actings of faith in his promises. We may learn out of it, What it is to pray; what we must pray for; what we may plead in prayer; and what precious promises we have to encourage us in prayer. It is easy to apply its several passages to ourselves in singing it; for we have often troubles, and always sins, to complain of, at the throne of grace.

V. 1—7. 1. Here we have David's professions of desire toward God, and dependence on and confidence in Him. He often begins his Pss. with such professions; not to move God, but to move himself, and to engage himself to answer those professions. Note, In worshipping God, we must lift up our souls to Him. Prayer is the ascent of the soul to God; God must be eyed, and the soul employed. With a holy contempt of the world and the things of it, by a fixed thought and active faith, we must set God before us, and let our desires be toward Him as the Fountain of our happiness. If we make our confidence in God our stay, it shall not be our shame; and if we triumph in Him, our enemies shall not triumph over us, as they would, if we should now sink under our fears, or should, in the issue, come short of our hopes. All the saints have obtained a like precious faith; therefore, doubtless, it will be alike successful in the issue. Thus the communion of saints is kept up, even by their praying one for another. True saints will make supplication for all saints. It is certain that none who, by a believing attendance, wait on God, and, by a believing hope, wait for Him, shall be made ashamed of it. But they shall be ashamed, that transgress without cause, or vainly, as the word is: on no provocation; they revolt from God and their duty, from David and his government, so some, without any occasion, not having found any iniquity in either. The weaker the temptation to sin, the stronger the corruption which drives us to it. They know their attempts against God are fruitless; they imagine a vain thing, therefore will soon be ashamed.

2. He begs direction from God in the way of his duty, v. 4, 5. Observe what he desired to learn; not fine words or fine notions, but 'thy ways, thy paths, thy truth; the ways in which Thou walkest toward me, v. 10. and the ways in which Thou wouldest have me to walk toward Thee.' Those are best taught who understand their duty, and know the good things they should do, Eccl. 2: 3. The paths of the Lord, and his truth, are the same; divine laws are all founded on divine truths. The way of God's precepts is the way of truth, 119: 30. Christ is both the Way and the Truth, therefore we must learn Christ. What he desires of God, in order to this, is, that He would enlighten his understanding concerning his duty, and incline his will to it, and strengthen him in it; we go no further in the way to heaven, than God is pleased to lead us, and to hold us up. What he pleads, is, his great expectation from God; Thou art the God of my salvation; and his constant attendance on God; On Thee do I wait all the day. Whence should a servant expect direction what to do, but from his own master, on whom he waits all the day? If we sincerely desire to know our duty, with a resolution to do it, we need not question but God will direct us in it.

3. He appeals to God's infinite mercy, and casts himself on that, not pretending to any merit of his own, v. 6. 'Thou always wast a merciful God; that is thy name, thy nature and property. Thy counsels and designs of mercy were from everlasting; the vessels of mercy were, before all worlds, ordained to glory. The instances of thy mercy to the church in general, and to me in particular, have been ever of old, and never ceased. Thou hast taught me from my youth up, teach me now.

4. He is in a special manner earnest for the pardon of his sins, v. 7. 'Lord, remember thy mercies, v. 6. which speak for me, and not my sins, which speak against me.' He specifies par-

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

As the earth, with its fulness and all its inhabitants, belongs to the great Creator, whose glorious wisdom, power, and goodness appear on every side; we should continually remember our obligations to love and serve Him with all our powers, to receive all our comforts as his gifts, and to employ all we possess, according to his will. This must also remind us of our need of his mercy, and lead us to continual humiliation before Him: for which of his gifts have we not abused? which of our powers have we not employed in rebellion? (Luke 7: 40—43.)—Lord, open the everlasting doors of our souls by thy grace, that we may most thankfully receive Thee as our Lord and Savior, and be willingly and wholly thine! SCOTT.

NOTES.

Ps. XXV. 'This Ps. consists of 22 stanzas, the number precisely of the Heb. alphabet, and is in the acrostic form, like Pss. 34. 37. 111. 112. 119. 145. though the insertion of the letters at the commencement is not perfectly observed.—The immediate object of this alphabetical arrangement is not known. Perhaps the most probable design was, to draw special notice to the matter of the acrostic Pss. and mark the care with which the Jews professed to watch over the sacred and canonical books.' MORISON.

Verse 1.

The repeated and deep confessions of sin, which are blended with the petitions and complaints throughout this Ps. favor the opinion of those, who think it was written during Absalom's rebellion, by which David's atrocious crimes in the matter of Uriah, as well as the sins of his youth, were brought to his remembrance. SCOTT.

Verses 2, 3.

These vs. are rendered, in most versions, merely as a prayer throughout. Yet v. 3. may be rendered more literally, 'Yea, none who wait on Thee shall be ashamed: they shall be ashamed who act perfidiously without cause.'—David had given Saul and his adherents no just cause to hate and persecute him; nor had Absalom, or the rebellious Israelites, any cause for their treason and perfidy. Their hatred was not only unmerited, but directly contrary to his deserts. It was wholly free, or gratuitous. The Jews hated Christ without a cause, or freely: the same word being employed, as the apostle uses in respect of a sinner's justification before God, 'Being justified freely.' (Comp. John 15:25. Rom. 3:24. Gr.) SCOTT.

(3.) Yea let none, &c.] As if the Psalmist had subjoined to his foregoing request, 'Yea, I know that my prayer will be answered, as I am one who wait upon God, and none who do so shall be ashamed.' It is peculiarly animated and beautiful. ID.

Verses 4, 5.

The term wait, implies a simple, dependent, expecting, attentive state of heart; which leads to frequency and perseverance in the use of proper means, notwithstanding delays and discouragements, with a determined rejection of all other confidences, and all inconsistent measures. (130:5,6. Gen. 49:18. Lam. 3:24—30. Jam. 5:7—11.) ID.

ticularly the sins of his youth. Note, The sins of our youth should be matter of our repentance and humiliation long after, because time does not wear out the guilt of sin. He aggravates his sins, calling them his transgressions; and the more holy, just, and good, the law is, which sin is the transgression of, the more exceeding sinful sin ought to appear to us. He petitions for mercy; 'Remember not the sins.' When God pardons sin, He is said to remember it no more, which denotes a plenary remission, He forgives, and forgets. We need no more to make us happy, than for God to remember us with favor. His plea is, 'according to thy mercy, and for thy goodness-sake.' Note, God's goodness, and not ours, his mercy, and not our own merit, must be our plea for the pardon of sin, and all the good we need.

V. 8—14. God's promises are here mixed with David's prayers; here he meditates on them, and by a lively faith draws satisfaction from these consolations; for the promises of God are not only the best foundation of prayer, but a present answer to prayer. Let the prayer be made according to the promise, and then the promise may be read as a return to the prayer; and we are to believe the prayer is heard, because the promise will be performed. But here one petition seems to come in abruptly, and should have followed on v. 7. It is that, v. 11. Pardon mine iniquity. But prayers for the pardon of sin are never impertinent; we mingle sin with all our actions, therefore should mingle such prayers with all our devotions. He enforces this petition with a double plea. The former is very natural; 'For thy name's sake, because thou hast proclaimed thy name gracious and merciful, pardoning iniquity, for thy glory-sake, for thy promise-sake, for thine own sake,' Isa. 43: 25. But the latter is very surprising; 'Pardon mine iniquity, for it is great; and the greater it is, the more will divine mercy be magnified in the forgiveness of it.' It is the glory of a great God to forgive great sins, to forgive iniquity, transgression, and sin, Ex. 34: 7. 'It is great, therefore I am undone, for ever undone, if infinite mercy do not interpose for the pardon of it. It is great; I see it to be so.' The more we see of the heinousness of our sins, the better qualified we are to find mercy with God. When we confess sin, we must aggravate it.

Let us now view the great and precious promises we have in these vs. and observe,

I. To whom they belong, and who may expect their benefit. They are sure to those who, though they have been sinners, yet now keep God's Word. To such, 1. As keep his covenant and his testimonies, v. 10. as take his precepts for their rule, and his promises for their portion. Though, through the infirmity of the flesh, they sometimes break the command, yet, by a sincere repentance, when at any time they do amiss, and a constant adherence by faith to God as their God, they keep the covenant, and do not break that. 2. To such as fear Him, v. 12. and, v. 14. as stand in awe of his majesty, and worship Him with reverence, submit to his authority, and obey Him with cheerfulness, dread his wrath, and are afraid of offending Him.

II. On what these are grounded, and what encouragement we have to build on them. Here are two things which ratify and confirm them all.

1. The perfections of God's nature. We value the promise by the character of Him that makes it; we may therefore depend on God's promises, for good and upright is the Lord, therefore He will be as good as his word. Faithful is He who hath promised, who also will do it.

2. The agreeableness of all He says and does, with the perfections of his nature, v. 10. All the paths of the Lord; i. e. all his promises, all his providences, all his dealings with his people, all are according to the mercy of his purposes, and the truth of his promises; all He does comes from love, covenant-love; and they may see in it his mercy displayed, and his Word fulfilled. What a rich satisfaction may this be to good people, whatever afflictions they are exercised with;—so it will appear at their journey's end.

III. What these promises are,

1. That God will instruct and direct them in duty This is most insisted on, because it is an answer to David's prayers, v. 4, 5. Shew me thy ways, and lead me. We should fix our thoughts, and act our faith, most on those promises which suit our present case. The devil leads men blindfold to hell, but God enlightens them in a true light, and so leads them to heaven. The meek will He guide, the meek will He teach, those that are humble and low in their own eyes, that are distrustful of themselves, desirous to be taught, and honestly resolved to follow the divine guidance; these He will guide in judgment, i. e. by the rule of the written Word; guide in what is practical, what relates to sin and duty; and He will do it judiciously, so some, i. e. will suit his conduct to their case; will teach them his way. All good people make God's way their way, and desire to be taught that; and those that do so shall be taught and led in that way. Him that feareth the Lord, He will teach in the way that He shall choose; either in the way God shall choose, or the good man choose. It comes all to one, for he that fears the Lord chooses the things that please Him. If we choose the right way, He that directed our choice will direct our steps, and will lead us in it. If we choose wisely, God will give us grace to walk wisely.

2. That God will make them easy, v. 13. His soul shall dwell at ease, shall lodge in goodness, marg. With respect to those that devote themselves to the fear of God, and give up themselves to be taught of God, it is their own fault, if they be not easy; [note, Job 36:] even when the body is sick, and lies in pain, yet the soul may dwell at ease in God, may return to Him, and repose in Him, as its rest. Many things occur to make us uneasy, but there is enough in the covenant of grace to balance them all, and to make us easy.

3. That He will give to them and theirs as much of this world as is good for them; His seed shall inherit the earth. Next to our care concerning our souls, is our care concerning our seed, and God has a blessing in store for the generation of the upright.

4. That God will admit them into the secret of communion with Himself, v. 14. The secret of the Lord is with them that fear Him. They understand his Word. John 7: 17. They that receive the truth in the love of it, and experience the power of it, best understand the mystery of it. They know the meaning of his providence, and what and loving kindnesses,' which had always been exercised to his worshippers, and sprang from his everlasting love; and his not 'remembering' the Psalmist's transgressions, is very expressive. (Jer. 31: 33,34.)—The language also is peculiarly emphatical. The distinction between the sins of youth, thus brought afresh to remembrance, and later transgressions of which David was conscious, seems to fix the occasion of the Ps. to have been as above stated. (Note, 1.) (M. R. s, t.)—Most of the vs. in this Ps. begin with the Heb. letters, in alphabetical order; (of which there are several instances in the Psalms;) but a few omissions and variations are found, which some ascribe to the perturbation of David's mind. SCOTT.

(6.) Ever of old.] 'The Heb. when applied to the affairs of the present life, expresses generally a lengthened duration, Gen. 6: 4. Isa. 42:14. but when applied to the divine character, and to the exercise of God's love to the church, it denotes eternity, in its proper sense.' MORISON.

Verse 11.

For it is great.] Some would render the clause 'though it be great:' but certainly this is not the most obvious interpretation; and probably would not have been adduced, except either out of dislike to the doctrine implied in our version, or a fear of its being perverted. (Rom. 6:1,2.) SCOTT.—For it is great.] 'We are not to consider the greatness of our sins as an argument for divine forgiveness; but because our sin is great, therefore we should the more earnestly pray for pardon.' WILLIAMS.

Verses 12, 13.

It is said of all unconverted men, that 'there is no fear of God before their eyes;' and that 'the fear of the LORD is the beginning of wisdom.' (36:1. 111:9,10. Rom. 3:9—18.)—Where then is that man, in this evil world, who truly reverences the authority of God, who fears his displeasure, and seeks his favor, as the main concern of his life? How disadvantageously soever he may be circumstanced; how great soever his past guilt, or his present darkness and discouragement; the God of all grace, who has excited this fear by his own preventing grace, will assuredly afford him the means of instruction, and enable him to profit by them: so that eventually, he 'shall dwell at ease,' or lodge in goodness; (marg.) and shall find a never-failing source of comfort in the divine love, while he expects the complete felicity of heaven at last.—The inheritance of Canaan was a type of heaven: but indeed that man inherits the earth as far as it can profit him, who 13 [k] His soul shall * dwell at ease; and [l] his seed shall [m] inherit the earth.

14 The [n] secret of the LORD is with them that fear him; and † he will shew them his covenant.

16 [q] Turn thee unto me, and have mercy upon me; [r] for I am desolate and afflicted.

God is doing with them, better than others, Gen. 18: 17. He calls them not servants, but friends, as He called Abraham. They know by experience the blessings of the covenant, and the pleasure of that fellowship which gracious souls have with the Father and with his Son Jesus Christ. This honor have all his saints.

V. 15—22. David, encouraged by the promises he had been meditating upon, here renews his addresses to God, and concludes the Ps. as he began, with the professions of dependence on God and desire toward Him.

I. He lays open before God the calamitous condition he was in. v. 15, 16. It is common for those that are afflicted to be desolate; their friends desert them then, and they are themselves disposed to sit alone, and keep silence, Lam. 3: 28. David calls himself desolate and solitary, because he depended not on his servants and soldiers, but entirely on God. Being in distress, in many distresses, he grew more and more melancholy, and troubled in mind, v. 17. Sense of sin afflicted him more than any thing else: that was it that broke and wounded his spirit, and made his outward troubles lie heavy upon him. He was in affliction and pain, v. 18. His enemies were many and malicious, and very barbarous; it was with a cruel hatred that they hated him, v. 19. Such were Christ's enemies, and the persecutors of his church.

22 [b] Redeem Israel, O God, out of all his troubles.

II. He expressed the dependence he had on God in these distresses, v. 15. Idolaters were for gods that they could see with their bodily eyes, and they had their eyes ever toward their idols, Isa. 17: 7, 8. But we must have an eye of faith toward God, who is a Spirit, Zech. 9: 1. we must always set Him before us: thus we must live a life of communion with God, not only in ordinances, but in providences, not only in the acts of devotion, but in the whole course of our conversation. David had the comfort of this, in his affliction; and those that have their eye ever toward God, shall not have their feet long in the net. He repeats his profession of dependence on God, v. 20. Let me not be ashamed; for I put my trust in Thee; and of expectation from Him, I wait on Thee, v. 21. It is good thus to hope, and quietly to wait, for the salvation of the Lord.

III. He prays earnestly to God for relief and succor.

1. For himself; see how he begs for the remission of sin, v. 18. Forgive all my sins. Those were his heaviest burdens, and the cause of all his other burdens. He had begged v. 7. for the pardon of the sins of his youth, and, v. 11. for the pardon of some one particular iniquity remarkably great. But here he prays, Lord, forgive all, take away all iniquity. It is observable, that, as to his affliction, he asks for no more than God's regard to it; 'Look upon my affliction and my pain,

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

In vain will our voice be lifted up in prayer, unless our souls be lifted up to God, in fervent desires and believing expectations.—We must be careful not to give our enemies so much as a plausible pretext for their malice; and for that reason should above all things be instant in praying, to be guided in the ways of truth and holiness. The most wise and experienced feel most their need of this continual teaching, and are most desirous of it; not only lest they should be wholly deceived, but lest they should be seduced into any paths of error or iniquity. They will therefore 'wait all the day' on 'the God of their salvation.' And his tender mercies, and his love to his people of old, will encourage them to come to Him, that they may be remembered in the same gracious manner. The most ignorant or atrocious sinner may properly be encouraged to trust in our gracious God, who in perfect sincerity invites all who hear to come to Him. He who has learned, in meek and humble teachableness, to sit at the Savior's feet and hear his Word, shall soon be made acquainted with the secret comforts of true godliness, and shown the nature and excellency of his everlasting covenant: and having acceded to it, and learned to walk with Him in faith and obedience, according to its tenor; he shall find every one of the Lord's dispensations towards him to be unmingled truth and mercy; not excepting his sharpest trials and severest corrections. The sudden recollection of the greatness of his iniquity may often assail his confidence; but faith in the Lord's more abundant mercy can even convert that into an argument, why He should pardon.—Pride, obstinacy, and the love of sin, dictate all the complaints which are made of difficulty and uncertainty, in discovering the truth and will of God: for wherever a man truly fears the Lord, he shall certainly be taught by the Holy Spirit the safe and happy way. SCOTT.

has food and raiment, and lives contented and in peace. SCOTT.

(13.) 'The first clause of this verse has been considered by many Jewish and Christian commentators as referring to the felicity of the future life; for my own part, I think not with sufficient argument. The reading of Street seems unexceptionable. "He shall continue in prosperity, and his seed shall inherit the earth."' MORISON.

Verse 14.

The knowledge of the glory and harmony of the divine perfections, which encourages a sinner to trust and love a holy God; that sweet communion, which the believer enjoys with God his Savior; and that peace and joy, which springs from the earnest of the Spirit, may be well called 'The secret of the LORD:' and they lead the soul into a conciliating and satisfactory acquaintance with his purposes, and the wisdom and equity of them; and with the security and blessings of the new covenant, and the assurance of an interest in it. (Prov. 3:32. Matt. 13:10—13. John 14:21—24. Col. 3:1—4. Rev. 2:17.) But none, except those who fear God, can possibly enjoy this satisfaction, which must still remain a secret to all ungodly men.—Several other discoveries of the secret plan and purposes of God, may also be intended, which none but the pious Christian can receive. (M. R.) SCOTT.—Secret, &c.] 'The word primarily denotes a company of people sitting together; hence it is employed to express confidential intercourse, and, as in this verse, intimate communion with God. See also Prov. 3:32. Job 29:4.' Morison, after Poole.—'The counsel and covenant of the Lord to them that fear Him, is, to make known or reveal to them his will.' HAMMOND.—'By this we do not understand any knowledge of the divine decrees, or of mysteries unrevealed: but rather the assurance of his mercy, and that secret and divine communion with God, through Jesus Christ, in which consists the essence of true Christianity.' WILLIAMS.

Verses 15, 16.

(121:1,2. 123:1,2. 124:4—8. 141:8—10.) The word rendered 'desolate' is the masculine of the noun, which, when feminine, is translated 'my darling.' (Note, 22:19—21.)—The Sept. here render it, 'only begotten;' as it certainly means in some places: but in this connection it seems rather to imply the destitute condition of the Psalmist, when left alone, or forsaken by his former adherents and friends; and a fit type of Christ, as deserted by his disciples, and surrounded by his insulting enemies. SCOTT.

Verses 17—20.

Every occurrence during Absalom's rebellion tended to augment the distress of David; especially as reminding him of his sins, which were thus visited on him, as Nathan had foretold. (2 Sam. 12:10—12.) He therefore united reiterated prayers for pardon, with his earnest requests for deliverance.—He was aware, that even his own son, and his bosom-counsellor, and a large part of the nation, thirsted for his blood; and would decline no violence, treachery, or cruelty, to destroy him: so that his life could be preserved only by the same divine power and mercy, in which he trusted for the salvation of his soul. (2 Sam. 15:—18:) ID.

Verse 21.

In the sight of God, David pleaded guilty of great and many sins; but he had acted an upright part towards his unnatural son, and treacherous subjects. As a penitent likewise, he was 'without guile,' and was determined to adopt no sinful measures for his preservation. And thus waiting on God, he trusted that he should be preserved. ID.

Verse 22.

The cause of the royal sufferer was that of his nation, and of true religion. David, therefore, in this prayer for the redemption of Israel from oppression, was a type of Christ interceding, amidst his personal sufferings, for his Church; and for his own exaltation, as indispensably necessary to her interests, and to the salvation of his elect people (51:18,19. 130:7,8. John 17:) ID.

PSALM XXVI.

David professes his integrity, and his delight in the people and ordinances of God, with a solemn appeal to Him, 1—8. He deprecates the doom of the wicked, and unites earnest prayers with pious purposes and believing confidence in God, 9—12.

A Psalm of David.

and do with it as thou pleasest.' But, as to his sin, he asks for no less than a pardon, Forgive all my sins. When at any time we are in trouble, we should be more concerned about our sins, to get them pardoned, than about our afflictions, to get them removed. Yet he prays for the redress of his grievances. His mind was troubled for God's withdrawings from him, and under the sense he had of his displeasure against him for his sin; therefore he prays, v. 16. Turn Thee unto me. And if God turn to us, no matter who turns from us. His condition was troubled, and, in reference to that, he prays, 'O bring Thou me out of my distresses.' His enemies were spiteful; and, in reference to that, he prays, 'O keep my soul from falling into their hands, or else deliver me out of their hands.'

Four things he mentions by way of plea, to enforce these petitions; and refers himself and them to God's consideration: These are God's mercy, his own misery, especially the troubles of his heart; the iniquity of his enemies; and his own integrity, v. 21. which intimates that he did not expect to be safe, any longer than he continued in his integrity and uprightness; and that, while he did continue in it, he did not doubt of being safe. Sincerity will be our best security in the worst of times; this will preserve us to the heavenly kingdom; we should therefore pray to God to preserve us in our integrity.

2. For the church of God, v. 22. David was now in trouble himself, but he thinks it not strange, since trouble is the lot of all God's Israel; and he forgets not the distresses of God's church; for when we have ever so much business of our own at the throne of grace, we must still remember to pray for the public. Good men have little comfort in their own safety, while the church is in distress and danger. This prayer is a prophecy, that God would, at length, give David rest, and therewith give Israel rest from all their enemies round about. It is a prophecy of the sending of the Messiah in due time to redeem Israel from his iniquities, 130: 8. and so from their troubles. It refers also to the future state. In heaven only, will God's Israel be perfectly redeemed from trouble.

Ps. XXVI. Holy David is, in this Ps. putting himself on a solemn trial, by God and his own conscience. In singing it, we must teach and admonish ourselves, and one another, what we must be, and do, that we may have the favor of God, and comfort in our own consciences; and comfort ourselves with it, as David, if we can say, that in any measure we have, through grace, answered these characters. Amyraldus suggests, that David is here, by the spirit of prophecy, carried out to speak of himself as a type of Christ, of whom what he here says of his spotless innocence, was fully and eminently true, and of Him only, and to Him we may apply it in singing this Ps. We are complete in Him.

V. 1—5. Probably David penned this when persecuted by Saul and his party, who, to give some color to their unjust rage, represented him as a very bad man, and falsely accused him of many crimes and misdemeanors. Innocency itself is no fence to the name, though it is to the bosom, against the darts of calumny. Herein he was a type of Christ; whose followers, also, must have all manner of evil said against them falsely. In this case,

I. He appeals to God, v. 1. 'Judge me, O God; be Thou Judge between me and my accusers; bring me off with honor, and put them to shame that falsely accuse me.' Saul was himself supreme judge in Israel, so that, in a controversy with him, David could appeal to no other than to God Himself. As to his offences against God, he prays, Lord, enter not into judgment with me, 143: 2. Remember not my transgressions, 25: 7. there he appeals to God's mercy; but as to his offences against Saul, he appeals to God's justice, and begs of Him to judge for him, as, 43: 1. Or thus; he cannot justify himself against the charge of sin, but he can against the charge of hypocrisy, and has reason to hope, that, according to the tenor of the covenant of grace, he is one of those that may expect to find favor with God. Thus holy Job often owns he has sinned, and yet holds fast his integrity. God Himself is a Witness to sincerity.

II. He submits to his unerring search, v. 2. Lord, examine me; which intimates that he was well pleased that God did know him, and truly desirous that He would discover him to himself, and discover him to all the world: so sincere was he in his devotion to his God, and his loyalty to his Prince.

III. He solemnly protests his sincerity, v. 1. 'My conversation has agreed with my profession, and one part of it with another.' It is in vain to boast of our integrity, unless we can make it out, that, by the grace of God, we have walked in our integrity, and that our conversation in the world has been in simplicity and godly sincerity.

He produces here several proofs of his integrity,

1. He had a constant regard to God and to his grace, v. 3. aimed at God's favor as his end, and chief good; Thy loving-kindness is before mine eyes; and governed himself by the Word of God as his rule. 'I have walked in thy truth, according to thy law, for thy law is truth.' Note, Those only may expect the benefit of God's loving-kindness, that value his favor, and live up to his truths, and his laws grounded on them. Some understand it of his conforming himself to God's example in truth and faithfulness, as well as in goodness and loving-kindness. Those certainly walk well, that are followers of God as dear children.

2. He had no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness, nor with the workers of those works, v. 4, 5. By this it appeared he was truly loyal to his prince, and faithful to his God: that he never associated with the disaffected: nor with open enemies, or false friends, to religion. Great care to avoid bad company, is both a good evidence of our integrity, and a good mean to preserve us in it. David shunned the company, not only of wicked, but of vain persons, which may perhaps be the more pernicious of the two to a good man, because he will not be so ready to stand on his guard against the contagion of vanity, as against that of downright wickedness. The company of dissemblers is as dangerous as any other, and as much to be shunned, in prudence as well as piety. Sometimes he could not avoid being in the company of bad people, yet he would not choose such for his companions, nor seek an opportunity of acquaintance and converse with them; he would not go in with them, sit with them, be in their company longer than necessary, nor concur with them, as they that sit with the scornful, 1: 1. He would not sit in counsel with them, to do mischief, nor in judgment to condemn the righteous. The congregation of evil doers is in a special manner hateful to good people. In all this, David was a type of Christ, who, though He received sinners, and ate with them, to instruct them and do them good, yet, otherwise, was holy, harmless, undefiled, and separate from sinners, particularly from the Pharisees, those dissemblers; thus too David was an example to Christians, Acts 2: 40.

I. David produces a farther evidence of his integrity, his sincere affection to God's ordinances, the constant care he took about them, and pleasure in them. Hypocrites and dissemblers may indeed attend God's ordinances, as the proud Pharisee went to the temple with the penitent publican; but it is a good sign of sincerity, if we attend on them, as David, v. 6—8.

1. He was very careful and conscientious in his preparation for holy ordinances. I will wash mine hands in innocency. This is like that, 1 Cor. 11: 28. Let a man examine himself, and so prepared let him eat. This denotes habitual preparation; see 24: 3, 4. and actual preparation; it alludes to the ceremony of the priests' washing, when they went in to minister, Ex. 30: 20, 21. David was no priest, yet, as every worshipper ought, he would look to the substance of that which the priests were enjoined the shadow of. In our preparations for solemn ordinances, we must not only be able to clear ourselves from the charge of reigning infidelity and hypocrisy, and to protest our innocency of that, (signified by washing the hands, Deut. 21: 6.) but we must take pains to cleanse ourselves from the spots of remaining iniquity, by renewing our repentance, and making a fresh application of the blood of Christ to our consciences, to purify and pacify them. He that is washed, i. e. in a justified state, has need thus to wash his feet, John 13: 10. to wash his hands, to wash them in innocency; he that is pardoned, is so far innocent, that his sins shall not be mentioned against him.

2. He was very diligent and serious in attendance; I will compass thine altar; alluding to the priests, who, while the sacrifice was offering, walked round the altar, and, probably, the offerers likewise did so at some distance, denoting a diligent regard to what was done, and a dutiful attendance in the service. David, a man of honor, of business, of war, thought it not below him to attend with the multitude on God's altars, and could find time for it. Note, All God's people will be sure to wait on God's altar, in obedience to his commands, and in pursuance of his favor. Christ is our Altar.

3. In all his attendance, he aimed at God's glory, and was much in thankful adoration of Him. He had an eye to the place of worship, as the place where God's honor dwelt, v. 8. and therefore made it his business there to honor God, and to give Him the glory due to his name; to publish, as should we, with the voice of thanksgiving, all God's wondrous, which are his gracious, works.

4. He did this with delight, and from a principle of true affection to God and his institutions. Touching this, he appeals to God, v. 8. David was sometimes forced by persecution into the countries of idolaters, and hindered from attending God's altars, which perhaps his persecutors upbraided him with as his crime. See 1 Sam. 20: 27. 'But, Lord,' says he, 'though I cannot come to the habitation of thine house, I love it, my heart is there, and it is my greatest trouble that I am not there.' All that truly love God, truly love his ordinances. Our Lord Jesus loved his Father's honor, and made it his business to glorify Him; those who love communion with God, and delight in approaching Him, find it a constant pleasure, a comfortable evidence of their integrity, and a comfortable earnest of their endless felicity.

II. David, having given proofs of his integrity, earnestly prays, that he might not fall under the doom of the wicked, v. 9, 10. Here, 1. David describes these sinners, whom he looked upon to be in a miserable condition, so miserable, that he could not wish the worst enemy he had in the world to be in a worse. 'They are bloody men, they do mischief, and though they get by their wickedness, (v. 10.) yet that will never better them. 2. He dreads having his lot with them; he never loved them, nor associated with them, in this world, and therefore could in faith pray he might not have his lot with them in the other. Balaam desired to die the death of the righteous. David dreaded dying the death of the wicked; so both sides are of that mind, which if we be of, and will live up to, we are happy for ever.

III. David, with a holy, humble confidence, commits himself to God's grace, v. 11, 12. 1. He promises, that by the grace of God he would persevere; When our consciences testify for us, that we have walked in our integrity, that should confirm our resolutions to continue therein. 2. He prays for the divine grace, both to enable him to do so, and to give him the comfort of it; Be we ever so confident of our integrity, still we must rely on God's mercy, and the great redemption Christ has wrought out, and pray for the benefit of them. 3. He pleases himself with his steadiness. This he speaks, as one that found his resolutions fixed for God and godliness, not to be shaken by temptation; and his comforts firm in God and his grace, not to be disturbed by crosses and troubles. 4. He promises himself he should yet have occasion to praise the Lord; be furnished with matter, and have a heart for praise; and that though now perhaps banished, he should again have opportunity of blessing God in his congregation.

Ps. XXVII. Some think David penned this Ps. before his coming to the throne, when in the midst of his troubles, and, perhaps, on occasion of the death of his parents; but the Jews think he penned it, when old, on occasion of his wonderful deliverance from the sword of the giant, 2 Sam. 21: 16, 17. and his people, thereupon, resolved he should never venture his life again in battle, lest he should quench the light of Israel. Perhaps it was not penned on any particular occasion; but it is very expressive of the pious and devout affections of gracious souls at all times, especially of trouble. And let our hearts be thus affected in singing this Ps. Observe here,

V. 1—6. 1. With what a lively faith David triumphs in God, glories in his holy name, and his interest in Him. 1. The Lord is my Light. David's subjects called him the light of Israel, 2 Sam. 21: 17. but he owns he shone, as the moon, with a borrowed light; The Lord is my Light. God is a Light to his people, to show the way in doubt, to comfort and rejoice them in sorrow: in his light they now walk on in their way, and hope to see light for ever. 2. 'He is my Salvation, in whom I am safe, and by whom I shall be saved.' 3. 'He is the Strength of my life; not only the Protector of my exposed life, but the Strength of my frail, weak life, who keeps me from dying away.' God, is a believer's Light, the Strength of his life, by whom, in whom, he lives and moves. In God therefore let us strengthen ourselves.

2. With what an undaunted courage he tri-

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

According to that covenant which Jesus mediated, the man who 'walketh in his integrity,' yet wholly trusts in mercy and grace, is evidenced to be in a state of acceptance: the Lord may be appealed to, to plead his cause: and he shall not slide, but 'be kept by a divine power, through faith unto salvation.' This man desires to have his inmost soul searched and proved to the uttermost. He is aware of the deceitfulness of his own heart, desires to detect and mortify every sin, and longs to be fully satisfied he is a true believer. He examines himself; and is willing to be examined by the penetrating and distinguishing Word of truth: but, lest after all he should be deceived, he appeals to the great Searcher of hearts; and, in his better judgment, welcomes even those fiery trials, by which his graces may be manifested and improved, as gold and silver in the furnace: and, as he delights in blessing God with his congregations on earth, he trusts that shortly he shall join the great assembly in heaven. SCOTT.

Verses 9—11.

The Psalmist especially refers here to Saul, Doeg, and others who gave or received bribes, in order to murder him and his pious adherents. (52: 1 Sam. 22:6—19.) In this conduct they resembled, and in some respects prefigured, Caiaphas, Judas, and the false witnesses and wicked priests, who combined to murder the Prince of life.—David, though conscious of integrity, and determined to persist in it, trusted only in the redeeming mercy and grace of God. (4:3—5.) SCOTT.

umphs over his enemies, v. 2. no fortitude like that of faith. The gracious presence of God, his power, his promise, his readiness to hear prayer, the witness of his Spirit in the hearts of his people; these are the secret of his tabernacle, and in these the saints find cause for that holy security and serenity of mind in which they dwell at ease. David here, (v. 6.) by faith in the promise of God, triumphs before the victory, and is as sure, not only of the laurel, but of the crown, as if it were already on his head.

3. With what a gracious earnestness he prays for a constant communion with God in holy ordinances, v. 4. If our hearts can witness for us, that we delight in God above any creature, that may encourage us to depend on Him; for it is a sign we are of those whom He protects as his own.

Observe, (1.) What he desires; to dwell in the house of the Lord. In the courts of God's house the priests had their lodgings, and David wished he had been one. Disdainfully as some look on God's ministers, one of the greatest and best of kings would gladly have taken his lot, his lodging, among them. Or rather, he desires he might duly and constantly attend on the public service of God, with other faithful Israelites, according as the duty of every day required; therefore he longed to see an end of the wars in which he was now engaged. Thus Hezekiah, a genuine son of David, wished for health, not to go up to the thrones of judgment, but to the house of the Lord, Isa. 38: 22. Note, All God's children desire to dwell in God's house; where should they dwell else? Do we hope that the praising of God will be the blessedness of our eternity? Surely then we ought to make it the business of our time.

(2.) How earnestly he covets this, v. 4. If he were to ask but one thing of God, this should be it; for this he had at heart more than any thing. He desired it as a good thing; as the Lord's gift, and a token of his favor. And, having fixed his desire on this as the one thing needful, he sought after it; continued to pray for it; contrived his affairs so he might have this liberty and opportunity. They that truly desire communion with God, will set themselves with all diligence to seek it, Prov. 18: 1.

(3.) What he had in his eye in it; not the plenty of good entertainment in the feasts on the sacrifices, nor the music and good singing, but to behold the beauty of the Lord, and to inquire in his temple. He knew something of the beauty of the Lord, the infinite and transcendent amiableness of the Divine Being, and his perfections; his holiness is his beauty, 110: 3. and his goodness, Zech. 9: 17. The harmony of all his attributes is the beauty of his nature. But David here desires to behold more of it. He would be instructed also in his duty; for concerning this he would inquire in God's temple, Lord, what wilt thou have me to do? For the sake of these two things, he desired that one thing, to dwell in the house of the Lord, all the days of his life. Mary's sitting at Christ's feet to hear his word, Christ calls the one thing needful, and the good part.

(4.) What advantage he promised himself there: he should be quiet and easy; troubles would not find him, for he should be set on high, v. 5; he should be pleasant and cheerful; there he would offer sacrifice of joy, v. 6. God's work is its own wages, 2 Cor. 2: 14.

V. 7—14. David, in these vs. expresses,

I. His desire toward God, in many petitions.

1. He humbly asks, because he firmly believes he shall have, a gracious audience. He asks also an answer of peace, which he expects, not from his own merit, but God's goodness, v. 7. If we pray and believe, God will graciously hear and answer.

2. He takes hold of the kind invitation God had given him to this duty, v. 8. My heart said unto thee, so it begins in the original, or of thee; Thou saidst, so it may be supplied, Seek ye my face; and then he returns, Thy face, Lord, will I seek. Observe, God calls us to seek his face, in our conversion to Him and converse with Him. He calls us, by the whispers of his Spirit, by his Word, by the stated returns of opportunities for his worship, and by special providences, merciful and afflictive. A gracious soul readily complies with this invitation immediately; My heart answered, Thy face, Lord, will I seek. The call was general; but, like David, we must apply it to ourselves. The Word does us no good, when we transfer it to others. A gracious heart readily echoes to the call of a gracious God, (Jer. 3: 22.) being made willing in the day of his power.

3. He is very particular in his requests. (1.) For the favor of God, that he might not be shut out from that, v. 9. He owns he had deserved God's displeasure, but begs God would not cast him away from his presence; for what is hell, but that? (2.) For the continuance of his presence with him; 'Thou hast been my Help formerly, and art the God of my salvation; therefore withdraw not the operations of thy power from me, for then I am helpless; nor the tokens of thy goodwill, for then I am comfortless.' (3.) For the benefit of a divine guidance, v. 11. It is not policy, but plainness, i. e. downright honesty, that will direct us into, and keep us in duty. He begs to be guided in a plain path, because of his enemies; or, as the margin reads it, his observers. His enemies watched for his halting, to find occasion against him. Saul eyed David, 1 Sam. 18: 9. This quickened him to pray, 'Lord, lead me in a plain path, that they may have nothing ill, or nothing that looks ill, to lay to my charge.' (4.) For the benefit of a divine protection, v. 12. Deliver me not over to the will of mine enemies: for it aims at my life. Herein, David was a type of Christ; for false witnesses rose up against Him, and such as breathed out cruelty.

II. He expresses his dependence on God.

1. That He would help and succor him when all other helps and succors failed, v. 10. This is God's time to help those that trust in Him. This promise has often been fulfilled in the letter. Forsaken orphans have been taken under the especial care of Providence, which has raised them up relief and friends, in a way not expected. God is a surer and better Friend than our earthly parents are, or can be.

2. That in due time he should see the displays of his goodness, v. 13. Even the best saints are subject to faint, when their troubles become grievous and tedious; but then faith is a sovereign cordial, it keeps them from despairing, from desponding, keeps them hoping, and praying, and waiting, in good thoughts of God, and the comfortable enjoyment of themselves. He now hoped he should outlive his troubles, and not perish under them. He should see it also in the land of Canaan, and in Jerusalem, where the lively oracles were; in comparison with the heathen that were at Hebron, by the men of Judah; and the third, at Hebron also, by the elders of Israel, when, after the death of Ishbosheth, he was recognised king. This Ps. might have been written before the second or third anointing, as David had been grievously harassed by Saul prior to both these events; and there is certainly something in the general structure and phraseology of the Ps. which connects it with those persecutions the son of Jesse endured at the hand of that wicked man.' MOR.

Verses 1—3.

It is probable, this Ps. was composed by David, in the extremity of his danger from Saul, in order to silence the fears of his companions, by showing them the strength and reasonableness of his confidence. (11:1—3.) Some, however, think it relates to his subsequent conflicts and dangers.—Being confident God was on his side, he was determined he would not yield to fear, even of a whole army. (3:6.) Comp. this with the complaint of Saul. (1 Sam. 28:15.) SCOTT.

Verse 8.

Lit. 'My heart said unto thee, Seek ye my face: Thy face LORD will I seek.' In retired meditation, the exhortations of God to men to 9 [d] Hide not thy face far from me; [e] put not thy servant away in anger: [f] thou hast been my Help: [g] leave me not, neither forsake me, [h] O God of my salvation.

10 When [i] my father and my mother forsake me, then [k] the LORD will * take me up.

11 [l] Teach me thy way, O LORD, and lead me in † a plain path, because of ‡ mine enemies.

12 Deliver me not over unto [m] the will of mine enemies: for [n] false witnesses are risen up against me, and such as [o] breathe out cruelty.

13 I had [p] fainted, unless I had believed to see the goodness of the LORD [q] in the land of the living.

14 [r] Wait on the LORD: [s] be of good courage, and [t] he shall strengthen thine heart: wait, I say, on the LORD.

PSALM XXVIII.

David earnestly prays for deliverance, and denounces the righteous doom of the wicked, 1—5. He exults in God, and prays for his people, 6—9.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

He, who is 'the Light of the world, is the eternal JEHOVAH: and whosoever 'followeth Him shall not abide in darkness, but shall have the light of life.' (John 8: 12. 9: 4—7. 12: 44—50.)—The temporary success of the wicked is only an introduction to their deeper disgrace and misery: they shall soon stumble, and fall, and rise no more; while the trials of believers will terminate in everlasting honor and felicity.—But the believer's confidence should be carefully distinguished from the hypocrite's presumption. Whatever be the Christian's rank, expectations, reputation, or employment; he considers the salvation and service of God, as his 'one thing needful.' (Note, Luke 10: 38—42.) This he prays for and seeks after; for what is heartily desired will be diligently sought.—With such desires and experiences, we may triumph amidst conflicts, and 'rejoice in tribulation.' The Savior, who suffered and conquered for us, will conquer by us: and, in hope of rendering eternal songs of praise in the temple above, we may now celebrate every mercy, with sacrifices of exulting joy and thanksgiving here on earth. But we should all be far more joyful and thankful, if more instant and fervent in prayer.—The Christian's loss of earthly friends, or their unkindness, or his anxiety about them, leads him more diligently to seek, and more highly to value, a relation to his Heavenly Friend: and should his attachment to the Lord forfeit the favor of all his relatives, that loss would prove his richest gain. Let then the destitute, the orphan, and the widow, let us all seek the LORD with patient expectation and fervent prayer. SCOTT.

seek his favor, were recollected: and his heart answered, 'Dost Thou deign thus to invite us? Then without delay or hesitation, I will seek thy face.' SCOTT.—'The tr. of this v. has been thought by critics to involve considerable difficulty. The Sept. have it: "My heart said unto Thee, I have sought thy face,—thy face, O Lord, I will seek." Abp. Secker renders: "To Thee, my heart, He hath said, seek ye my face: Thy face, O Jehovah, I will seek."' MORISON.

Verse 9.

'Do not in anger reject my suits, because I am a sinner; but accept them, because I am thy servant; whom in former times Thou hast so often relieved, that even thence also I am emboldened to beseech Thee not to desert me; . . . but . . . continue to give me deliverance and safety.' Patrick. SCOTT.

Verse 10.

Perhaps David's parents died about this time, or he was deprived of the solace of their company: or he meant in general, that the favor of God would compensate the loss of all earthly friends, and of the nearest and most endeared relations, should they prove treacherous; and he was determined to stay his mind on God alone. ID.

Verses 11, 12.

(M. R.) ID.

Verse 13.

'Unless I had believed,'—the consequences must have been dreadful. The broken form of the sentence, adds greatly to the effect. Perhaps some person had asked David, how he kept up his spirits under his manifold trials and dangers: and he gave him this answer, as comprising the whole secret of his cheerful confidence.—'The land of the living,' in this connection, seems to imply a prospect beyond this present dying world. (M. R. q.) ID.

Verse 14.

Some understand this v. as the Psalmist's apostrophe to his own soul: but perhaps it was chiefly intended as an exhortation to his discouraged companions in tribulation; and also as a pious counsel to every one, who might at any future time read this admirable Ps. (25: 4, 5. 62:1, 2, 5—10. Mic. 7:5—7. Hab. 2:1—3.) SCOTT

NOTES.

Ps. XXVIII. 'There is reason to regard this Ps. as partaking of the responsive character: it is highly probable it was composed on the same occasion with the former.' MORISON.

Verse 1.

It is not agreed, whether this Ps. was written during David's persecutions from Saul, or at a later period of life.—'Be not silent to me.' 'Treat not my humble requests with silent neglect.'—The word rendered 'the pit' generally means the grave, when used in this manner: yet when the death of the wicked is thus expressed, it seems also to denote the place of future punishment; for all men go down into the grave, but the wicked into the pit of destruction. (55:23.)—If God did not show, by some visible interposition, that He heard and answered David's prayers; he must soon be cut off and laid in the grave, never more to glorify God on earth; and it would appear, as if he died under the divine wrath, as the wicked do. (M. R. d.)—Had Christ continued in the grave, it might have been concluded, He had been justly put to death: but He was justified and proved to be the Son of God by his resurrection. (Rom. 1:1—5. 4:23—25. 1 Cor. 15:12—18.) SCOTT.

Holy oracle.] 'The oracle of thy sanctuary.' (M.) (1 K. 6:15—22. 8:28—30. Dan. 6:10, 11.) ID.

3 [f] Draw me not away with the wicked, and with the workers of iniquity, which [g] speak peace to their neighbors, but [h] mischief is in their hearts.

4 [i] Give them according to their deeds, and [k] according to the wickedness of their endeavors: [l] give them after the work of their hands: [m] render to them their desert.

5 Because [n] they regard not the works of the LORD, nor [o] the operation of his hands, he shall destroy them, and [p] not build them up.

6 [q] Blessed be the LORD, because he hath heard the voice of my supplications.

7 The LORD is [r] my Strength and [s] my Shield; [t] my heart trusted in him, and I am helped: [u] therefore my heart greatly rejoiceth, and [x] with my song will I praise him.

8 The LORD is * their Strength, and he is the † saving Strength of [y] his anointed.

9 [z] Save thy people, and [a] bless thine inheritance: ‡ feed them also, and [b] lift them up for ever.

a type of Christ, and to Him we must lift up our eyes and hands, for through Him all good comes from God to us. It was also a figure of heaven, Heb. 9: 24. The Scriptures are called the oracles of God, and there is the Word on which God hath caused and encouraged us to hope.

II. He deprecates the doom of the wicked, as before, 26: 9. v. 3. 'Save me from being entangled in the snares they have laid for me; from being infected with their sins, and from doing as they do; from being involved in their doom.' Note, Good men dread the way of sinners; the best are sensible of their danger of being drawn aside into it; and therefore we should all pray earnestly for grace to keep us in integrity, Rev. 18: 4.

III. He imprecates the just judgments of God on the workers of iniquity, v. 4. This is not the language of passion or revenge, nor is it inconsistent with the duty of praying for our enemies. But, 1. He would show how far he was from complying with the workers of iniquity, and with what good reason he had begged not to be drawn away with them; and, 2. He would express his zeal for the honor of God's justice in governing the world; 'Lord, they think all well that they do, and justify themselves in their wicked practices; Lord, give them after the work of their hands, and so undeceive those about them, who think there is no harm in what they do, because it goes unpunished,' 94: 1, 2. 3. This prayer is a prophecy, that God will, sooner or later, render to all impenitent sinners according to their deserts: not only for the mischief they have done, but for what they intended and endeavored. And if God go by this rule, in dealing with the wicked, surely He will do so, in dealing with the righteous.

IV. He foretells their destruction, for their contempt of God and his hand, v. 5. A stupid regardlessness of the works of God is the cause of the sin of sinners, and so becomes the cause of their ruin. See Isa. 5: 12.

In singing this, we must arm ourselves against all temptations to join workers of iniquity, and animate ourselves against all troubles threatened by them.

V. 6—9. In these vs. I. David thanks God for the answer to his prayers, as affectionately as, a few vs. before, he had begged it, v. 6. How soon are the saints' sorrows turned into songs, and their prayers into praises! It was in faith that David prayed, v. 2. and by the same faith he gives thanks, v. 6. Note, 1. They that pray in faith may rejoice in hope. 2. What we win by prayer, we must wear with praise.

II. He encourages himself to hope in God for the perfecting of every thing that concerned him; having given to God the glory of his grace, v. 6. he is humbly bold to take the comfort of it, v. 7. 27: 13. The very actings of faith are present aids to a drooping spirit, and often help it at a dead lift. He improves; my heart greatly rejoices. The joy of a believer is seated in the heart, while, in the laughter of the fool, the heart is sorrowful. It is great joy, joy unspeakable, and full of glory. The heart that truly believes shall in due time greatly rejoice; it is joy and peace in believing that we are to expect. God shall have the praise of it.

III. He pleases himself with the interest all good people, through Christ, have in God, v. 8. The saints rejoice in their friends' comforts, as well as their own. This is our communion with all saints, that God is their Strength and ours; Christ their Lord and ours, 1 Cor. 1: 2. He is their Strength, the Strength of all Israel, because He is the saving Strength of his anointed, i. e. 1. Of David in the type. God, in strengthening him as king, strengthened the whole kingdom. He calls himself God's anointed, because it was the unction he had received, that exposed him to the envy of his enemies, and therefore entitled him to the divine protection. 2. Of Christ, his Anointed, his Messiah, in the anti-type. God was his saving Strength, qualified Him for his undertaking, and carried Him through it; see 89: 21. Isa. 49: 5. 50: 7—9. And so He becomes their Strength, the Strength of all the saints; He strengthened Him that is the church's Head, and from Him diffuses strength to all the members; strengthens what He has wrought for us, 68: 28.—80: 17, 18.

IV. He concludes with a short, but comprehensive prayer for the church of God, v. 9. He prays for Israel, not as his people, but as God's people. God's interest in them lay nearer his heart than his own, Isa. 61: 9.—63: 19. He begs for them, 1. That He would save them from their enemies, and dangers; bless them with all good, flowing from his favor, in performance of his promise, and amounting to a happiness for them; would feed them; bless them with plenty, and especially the plenty of his ordinances, food to the soul. Rule

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Believers, under distresses, should not rest from their prayers, till they have received some satisfactory token that their prayers are heard, for the Lord will never refuse to answer those, who come to the mercy-seat of a reconciled God, in 'the holy place not made with hands,' through the intercession of our great High Priest; sincerely desiring and humbly hoping for those blessings, which He purchased by his meritorious sacrifice, and is now exalted to bestow.—If men duly [studied, and] regarded the works of the Lord, the displays of his power and majesty would intimidate them from rebellion, and 'his goodness would lead them to repentance:' but alienation of heart from God causes men to neglect all his operations, and to despise even his redeeming love. SCOTT.

Verse 3.

'Draw me not away,' as criminals are violently carried to the place of execution.—David deprecated the doom which awaited his deceitful persecutors, or that of Saul in particular. (26:9—11. 36:3, 4. 52:1—5. Prov. 26:23—27.) SCOTT.

Verses 4, 5.

The first of these vs. is the language of prayer; the latter, that of prediction. In the one the Psalmist calls on God to 'deliver' him, and plead the cause of true religion, by executing deserved punishment on his implacable enemies: in the other he assigns the reason, why he used this language; namely, because he foresaw this doom coming on them, and because their conduct showed them to be given up to final hardness of heart.—In general we may and ought to pray, for the just punishment of all impenitent enemies of the church: but with particular application to individuals, such prayers can only be proper for inspired persons.—To be dealt with according to their deservings, must be most tremendous to every sinner. (Jam. 2:8—13.)—Regard not, &c. (5) M. R. n.—92:4—7. Rom. 1:18—20. ID.

Verses 6, 7.

This sudden transition from earnest prayers and the language of distress, to exulting joy and praise, accords so much to the method of those Ps. which are evidently prophetical of Christ, that some expositors interpret this of Him; and suppose these vs. spoken as an anticipation of the triumphs and glory, which followed his deep humiliation and sufferings. (22:22—31.)—David himself, however, seems frequently to have anticipated the answer of his prayers in a similar manner: or perhaps after his deliverances, while leading the praises of his people, he contrasted the joyful scene with the dangers and sorrows, the prayers and tears, which preceded it. SCOTT.

Verse 8.

Some render this, 'The LORD is Strength to them:' (i. e. to his people:) 'and his Messiah, the strength of salvation is He.'—It is not clear, that the original can bear this construction. SCOTT.—Their strength.] 'Six or eight MSS. read "to his people," instead of, "to them," or "their strength;" and in this reading agree all the ancient versions, except the Chal.' MORISON.

Verse 9.

David's prayer for Israel was in some respects typical of Christ's intercession for his church.—The authority of a good prince resembles the care of a tender shepherd over his flock. [the shepherd's crook, was an early symbol of such power; cut, Ex. 1:8.] The word rendered feed, therefore, means also rule: and is applied to JEHOVAH, to the Messiah, and to David, and others. (M. R. ‡—Notes, 2 Sam. 5:1, 2. Is. 40:9—11. Jer. 23:3, 4. Mic. 5:3, 4. 7:14—17.) SCOTT.

PSALM XXIX.

David calls on the mighty to give glory to God, 1, 2. He shows the majesty and power of his voice, 3—9: and that, as the eternal King, he will strengthen and bless his people, 10, 11.

A Psalm of David.

[a] GIVE unto the LORD, O ye [*] mighty, give unto the LORD glory and strength.

2 [b] Give unto the LORD the [†] glory due unto his name; [c] worship the LORD in [‡] the beauty of holiness.

3 [d] The voice of the LORD is upon the waters: [e] the God of glory [f] thundereth: the LORD is upon [§] many waters.

4 The voice of the LORD is [‖] powerful; the voice of the LORD is full of majesty.

7 The voice of the LORD [] divideth [m] the flames of fire.

8 The voice of the LORD [n] shaketh the wilderness; the LORD shaketh the wilderness of [o] Kadesh.

them; so the marg That he would lift them up out of their troubles and distresses; not only those of that age, but his people in every age, even to the end. Observe, Those only, whom God feeds and rules, who are willing to be taught, guided, and governed, by Him, shall be saved, and blessed, and lifted up for ever.

Ps. XXIX. It is the probable conjecture of some very good interpreters, that David penned this on occasion, and just at the time, of a great storm of thunder, lightning, and rain; as Ps. 8. was his meditation in a moon-shine night, and 19. in a sun-shine morning. It is good to take occasion, from the sensible operations of God's power in nature, to give glory to Him. So composed was David, and so cheerful, even in a dreadful tempest, when others trembled, that then he penned this Ps. for though the earth be removed, yet will we not fear. Great and high thoughts of God should fill us, in singing it.

V. 1—11. We have here,

I. A demand of the homage of the great of the earth to the great God. Every clap of thunder David thus interpreted as a call to himself, and other princes and rulers; princes because they have their power from God, are to use it for Him, and owe Him this tribute of acknowledgment for it. This call being thrice repeated, intimates, that the mighty are backward to this duty, and with difficulty persuaded to it; but that it is of great consequence to the interests of God's kingdom among men, that they should heartily espouse them. Rev. 21:24. See what they are to give unto the Lord: the recognition of God's glory, and dominion over us, He is pleased to interpret as a gift to Him. Princes value themselves by their glory and strength; these they must ascribe to God, owning Him infinitely more glorious and powerful.

This demand may be looked upon as directed either to the grandees of David's own kingdom, the peers of the realm, the princes of the tribes, or to the neighboring kings, whom his sword had made tributaries. What is here said to the mighty, is said to all, Worship God; it is the sum and substance of the everlasting Gospel, Rev. 14: 6, 7. Here is the nature of religious worship; giving to the Lord the glory due to his name, v. 2. that whereby He has made Himself known: when we answer that revelation with suitable affections, [actions,] and adorations, then we give Him some of that glory. And here is the rule of its performance, in the beauty of holiness; denoting the Object of our worship, God, called the beauty of holiness, 2 Chr. 20: 21. Rev. 4: 8. or, the place of worship, the sanctuary, then the beauty of holiness, 48: 1, 2. Jer. 17: 12. or, the manner of worship. We must be holy, devoted to God, his will and glory. There is a beauty in holiness, and it is that which puts an acceptable beauty on all worship.

II. Good reasons given for this demand. 1. God's sufficiency in Himself, intimated in his name Jehovah, I am that I am; repeated here no less than 18 times in this short Ps. twice in every v. but three, and once in two of those three; I do not recollect the like in all this book. Let the mighty ones know Him by this name, and give Him the glory due to it. 2. His sovereignty over all things. Let those that rule over men, know there is a God that rules over them,—over all. The psalmist here sets forth God's dominion, in the kingdoms,

(1.) Of nature: wherein we ought to notice God's glory and strength. Some observe, there were then particular reasons why thunder should be called the voice of the Lord, as that God often spake in thunder, particularly at Sinai, and by thunder discomfited Israel's enemies. To speak it the voice of the God of glory, it is here said to be upon the waters, upon many waters, v. 3. it reaches over the vast ocean, the waters under the firmament; it rattles among the thick clouds, the waters above the firmament. Every time we hear it thunder, let our hearts be thereby filled with great, and high, and honorable thoughts of God, in the holy adorings and admirings of whom the power of godliness so much consists. O Lord our God, Thou art very great!

The voice of the Lord is powerful, 1st. Trees have been rent and split by thunderbolts, v. 5, 6. Some understand it of the violent winds which shook the cedars, and sometimes tore off their aspiring tops. Earthquakes also shook the ground itself, on which the trees grew, and made Lebanon and Sirion to dance; the wilderness of Kadesh was shaken, v. 8. the trees by winds, the ground by earthquakes, and both by thunders, of which I incline rather to understand it. Dr. Hammond understands it of the consternation and conquest of the neighboring kingdoms that warred with Israel, and opposed David; as the Syrians, whose country lay near the forest of Lebanon, the Amorites that bordered on mt. Hermon, and the Moabites and Ammonites that lay about the wilderness of Kadesh. 2dly. [Destructive fires have thus been kindled in dry forests, and in towns; the summers of Palestine are excessively dry. And we have several allusions in the Bible referring to fires kindled in thickets;] hence we read of hot thunderbolts, 78: 48. accordingly, the voice of the Lord, in the thunder, is here said to divide the flames of fire, v. 7. to scatter them on the earth, as God sees fit to direct them, and do execution by them.

NOTES.

Ps. XXIX. Morison observes, that the inscription of this Ps. exhibits great varieties, as it stands in the ancient versions; and Dr. A. Clarke suggests, that it was probably written to commemorate the abundant rain which fell in the days of David, after the heavens had been shut up three years, 2 Sam. 21:1—10. ED.

(3.) Upon the waters.] 'It may refer to the rolling thunder, as it passes from cloud to cloud, or as heard resounding along the surface of the hoary deep; the latter is peculiarly natural, as those who lived in the land of Judea were accustomed to look to the Mediterranean Sea, as the place whence those thunderstorms generally arose, which afterwards descended in terror or blessing on their favored soil.' MOR.

(9.) Hinds to calve.] 'Oaks to tremble:' Bps. Horne, Lowth. This rendering requires a needless alteration of the original, from hinds, to oaks.—The original verb seldom if ever means to tremble. The change leaves out one of the most interesting points in this truly sublime description of a thunder-storm; namely, its effects on the inhabitants of the forest: and the clause becomes little more than a repetition of what went before. SCOTT.—Morison remarks, that the chief justification of the change is to be sought in the context; since, though it cannot be denied that the original word rendered hinds may, and often does, signify oaks; yet it may also be readily admitted, that the violent convulsions of a thunder-storm [especially of a hot climate] may so terrify certain animals, in their pregnant state, as to make them cast their young. He also refers to Ainsworth's remarks on this v. as going, without criticism on the original text, to confirm, in some degree, the common reading. Roberts remarks on the terrific loudness and extreme violence of tropical thunder and lightning, 'the earth literally trembles, fierce animals rush to covert, and birds fly to shade. Then the people say, "This will cause the womb to tremble"—"the pains to come." See Bush. People of peculiar temperaments (perhaps, too, influenced by education and example) are much more affected by electrical phenomena than others; the deer kind have peculiar 'nervous sensibility,' as any one who observes them knows; they tremble at the least agitation. Let us not then be too hasty in deciding, that the text either in the Heb. or our transl. is a vulgar error, while we have yet so much to learn of that wonderful family of powers called electricity, (and its connections with life,) of which the earth, acted upon by the sun's rays, is thought to be the vast reservoir. Caligula, Henry remarks, would hide himself during thunder; and Horace says he was reclaimed by it from atheism. ED.

3dly. The terror of thunder makes the hinds [whose labor, as Pliny remarks, is difficult,] to calve sooner, and some think more easily, than otherwise they would. The hind is a timorous creature, and much affected with the noise of thunder. The thunder is said here to discover the forest, i. e. it so terrifies the wild beasts of the forest, that they quit the dens and thickets in which they hid themselves, and so are discovered. Or it throws down the trees, and so discovers the ground that was shaded by them. Whenever it thunders, let us think of this Ps.; and whenever we sing it, let us bless God there is another voice of his, even the still small voice of his Gospel, the terror of which shall not make us afraid.

(2.) Of providence, v. 10. God is to be praised as the Governor of the world of mankind. The opposition of his enemies is compared to the floods, 93: 3, 4. but He sits upon the flood; He crushes it, conquers it, and completes his own purposes, in despite of all the devices of men. The word here translated the flood, is never used but of Noah's flood, therefore some think that here spoken of. God sat upon that flood, as a Judge executing the sentence of his justice on that world of the ungodly, swept away by it. And He still sits upon the flood, restraining the waters, that they turn not again to cover the earth, according to his promise, Gen. 9: 11. Isa. 54: 9. Besides the power, He shows the perpetuity of his kingdom; He sits King for ever. Its administration is consonant to his counsels from eternity, and his designs for eternity.

(3.) Of grace; here his glory shines brightest, 1. In adoration from the subjects of that kingdom, v. 9. In his temple, where his people attend his discoveries of Himself and his mind, and attend Him with their praises, there does every one speak of his glory; in the world, every man sees it, or, at least, may behold it afar off, Job 36: 25. but it is only in the church it is spoken of to his honor. All his works do praise Him, they minister matter for praise; but his saints only do bless Him, and speak of his glory in his works, 145: 10. 2. In his favors to them, v. 11. He will enable them for his service; give strength to his people, to fortify them against every evil work, and furnish them for every good work. He will encourage them in his service; will bless his people with peace: great peace have they that love thy law; the end of the righteous is peace, endless peace. When the thunder of God's wrath shall make sinners tremble, the saints shall lift up their heads with joy.

Ps. XXX. This is a Ps. of thanksgiving for the great deliverances God had wrought for David, penned on occasion of the dedicating of his cedar house, and sung in that pious solemnity, though there is nothing in it of particular reference to that occasion. Some collect, from divers passages of it, that it was penned on his recovery from a dangerous fit of sickness, which might happen about the time of the dedication of his house. In singing it, we ought to remember with thankfulness and faith any like deliverances.

V. 1—5. It was the laudable practice of the pious Jews, when they built a new house, to dedicate it to God, Deut. 20: 5. David did so, 2 Sam. 5: 11. Note, The houses we dwell in should, at our first entrance, be dedicated to God, as little sanctuaries. We must solemnly commit ourselves, our families, and all our family affairs, to God's guidance and care, devote ourselves, and all ours, to his glory, and resolve, both that we will put away iniquity far from our tabernacles, and that we and our houses will serve the Lord, both in family worship, and all gospel obedience. Some conjecture, this Ps. was sung at the re-dedication of David's house, after he had been driven out by Absalom's defilement of it; and as a thanksgiving for the crushing of that dangerous rebellion. In these verses,

I. David thanks God for the great deliverances He had wrought for him, v. 1. 'I will extol Thee, O Lord.' In consideration of the great things God has done to exalt us, both by his providence and grace, we are bound, in gratitude, to do all we can to extol his name, though the most we can do is but little. The more imminent our dangers and deliverances, the more comfortable are these, and the more illustrious proofs of God's power and goodness. A life from the dead ought to be spent in extolling the God of our life.

II. He calls on others to join him in praise, not only for the particular favors God had bestowed on him, but for the general tokens of his good-will to all his saints, v. 4. All that are truly saints, He owns for his; there is a remnant of such, and they are expected to sing unto Him; for they are created, and sanctified, made, and made saints, that they be to Him for a name and a praise. His saints in heaven sing to Him; why should not those on earth?

1. They believe Him to be a God of unspotted purity; therefore let them sing to Him; 'Let them give thanks at the remembrance of his holiness. God is a holy God; his holiness is his glory; that is the attribute the holy angels, in their praises, fasten most on, Isa. 6: 3. Rev. 4: 8. We ought to be much in the mention and remembrance of God's holiness; and holy souls can give thanks at the mention of it: which, done heartily, is a good sign of partaking it in some measure. It is matter of joy to the saints, that God is a holy God; for then they hope He will make them holy, more holy. None of all God's perfections carries in it more

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The most exalted creatures indeed cannot render to the Infinite God, their Creator and constant Benefactor, all 'the glory due;' much less can any sinner: but when we come before Him, as 'in Christ reconciling the world unto Himself,' adoring his majesty, submitting to his authority and righteousness, in genuine repentance and faith, and offering our spiritual sacrifices of praise, and thanksgiving, and willing obedience; He will pardon and accept our defective services, though infinitely beneath his majesty and excellency.—The voice of the divine law, if duly attended to, would fill the consciences of sinners with more terror and amazement, than all the convulsions in nature; (Ex. 19: 16—20. 20: 18—20. Deut. 5: 22—27. Heb. 12: 18—21.) and the effects of the Word of God, when attended by the operations of his Holy Spirit, are far greater on the souls of men, than that of thunder in the material world. (Heb. 4: 12.) If we have heard his voice, and fled for refuge to lay hold of the hope set before us; if we have welcomed Christ as a Savior, and submitted to Him as our King for ever; if, relying on his merits, we are no longer terrified by 'the ministration of death,' yet have learned to love Him and keep his commandments: let us remember, that it is the same glorious God our Savior who causes the thunder; and the children need not fear their Father's voice, when He speaks in anger to his enemies. SCOTT.

NOTES.

Ps. XXX. Title.] This title may be rendered, 'A Psalm: a song at the dedication of the house for David.' When advanced to the throne, the Psalmist built himself a house, which no doubt he dedicated to God. SCOTT.—Dr. A. Clarke, after Calmet, with whom concur Morison, and Dathe, refer this Ps. to David's building the place of sacrifice in the field of Ornan, 2 Sam. 24: 25. Morison says the inscription is in two parts; the one recognising the writer, the other, the occasion. He tr. 'A Ps. of David; a song at the dedication of the house.' ED.—But there is nothing in this Ps. peculiarly appropriate to that occasion. M. R. SCOTT.

Verses 1, 2.

(35:17—19, 25—28. 41:11—13.) Healed. (2) If this word be literally understood, a dangerous illness and an unexpected recovery, gave occasion to the Ps. But some think the expression figurative, as no doubt it frequently is, denoting a forlorn and hopeless condition, like that of a sick man given over by physicians, and unable to help himself. The expectation of his death, formed by David's enemies, and the joy and triumph which that event would have given them, peculiarly suit the state of things during Absalom's rebellion. (41:1—8.) SCOTT.

Verse 4.

'The word saints, chasidim, signifieth them that have received mercy, and show mercy liberally unto others.' Several words, varying in meaning, but all implying genuine piety and holiness, are translated 'saints' in different parts of Scripture. By persons of this character, the holiness of God, or his moral excellences, as displayed in his Word, and by his works, is reflected on with admiring and grateful love, and celebrated with joyful praises. terror to the wicked, or more comfort to the godly.

2. They have experienced Him to be a God gracious and merciful; therefore let them sing to Him, v. 5. When we offend Him, He is angry, but, slow to anger; so, on repentance and humiliation, his anger is soon turned away, and He is willing to be at peace with us. If He hide his face from his own children, and suspend the wonted tokens of his favor, it is but in a little wrath, and for a small moment; but He will gather them with everlasting kindness, Isa. 54: 7, 8. As sure as light returns after darkness, the covenant of grace is as firm as the covenant of the day. This word (v. 5.) has often been fulfilled to us in the letter. Observe, As long as God's anger continues, so long the saints' weeping continues; but if that be but for a moment, the affliction is but for a moment, and when the light of God's countenance is restored, the affliction is easily pronounced light and momentary.

We have found his smiles very sweet; In his favor is life, all good. The return of his favor to an afflicted soul, is as life from the dead; nothing can be more reviving. Our happiness is bound up in it, whatever else we want. It is the life of the soul, spiritual life, the earnest of life eternal.

V. 6—12. We have, in these vs. an account of three several states David was in successively, and of the workings of his heart toward God in each —what he said and did, and how his heart stood affected; in the first of which we may see what we are too apt to be, and in the other two what we should be.

I. He had long enjoyed prosperity, and then he grew secure, and over-confident of the continuance of it, v. 6, 7. Note, 1. We are very apt to dream, when things are well with us, that they will never be otherwise; To-morrow shall be as this day. 2. When we see ourselves deceived in our expectations, it becomes us to reflect, with shame, on our security, as our folly, as David does here, that we may be wiser another time, and may rejoice in our prosperity as though we rejoiced not, because the fashion of it passes away.

II. On a sudden he fell into trouble, and then he prayed to God, and pleaded earnestly for relief and succor. In every change of his condition, he still kept his eye on God, and as he ascribed his prosperity to God's favor, so, in his adversity, he observed the hiding of God's face to be its cause If God hide his face, a good man is certainly troubled, though no other calamity befall him. Is any afflicted? is any troubled? let him pray. Though God hid his face from him, yet he prayed. If God, in wisdom and justice, turn from us, yet it will be in us the greatest folly and injustice imaginable, if we turn from Him. It seems, God's withdrawings made his prayers the more vehement, v. 8. He pleaded, v. 9. that God would be no gainer by his death; he saw not what good could be done by his dying in the bed of sickness, as might be, if he had died in the bed of honor. Nay, that, in his honor, God would seem a Loser by his death; Shall the dust praise Thee? The sanctified spirit, which returns to God, shall praise Him, shall be still praising Him; but the dust, which returns to the earth, shall not praise Him, nor declare his truth. We ask aright for life, when we have in view that we may live and praise Him. He prayed, v. 10. for mercy to pardon, and for grace to help in time of need. On these two errands we also may come boldly to the throne of grace, Heb. 4: 16.

III. In due time, God delivered him, and restored his prosperity, v. 11. God's anger now endured but for a moment, and David's weeping but for a night. As David's plunge into trouble from the height of prosperity, and then when he least expected it, teaches us to rejoice as though we rejoiced not, because we know not how near trouble may be; so his sudden return to a prosperous condition teaches us to weep as though we wept not, because we know not how soon the storm may become a calm, and the formidable blast, a favorable gale.

But what temper of mind was he in, on this happy change? He tells us, v. 12. 1. His complaints were turned into praises. By his glory is meant his tongue; our tongue is our glory, and never more so than when employed in praising God; or his soul; that is our glory above the beasts, and must be employed in blessing the Lord, as in singing psalms. 2. These praises were likely to be everlasting; I will give thanks for ever. This bespeaks a gracious resolution to persevere to the end in praising God, and a gracious hope that he should never want fresh matter for praise, and that he should shortly be there where this would be the

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

We ought to dedicate all our possessions to Him, who gave them to us: and when our comforts have been interrupted, and are again restored; we should renew our dedication of them to the service of our God. Yet alas! how many houses, even of men called Christians, are not only destitute of religion, but are also scenes of such impiety and wickedness, that one might almost be led to conclude, they had been set apart to the service of the devil!—But let all beware of unwarranted confidence and carnal security: neither outward prosperity nor inward peace is here immovable: the Lord in his favor has fixed the believer's safety firm as the deep-rooted mountains; but in every thing else he may expect to be shaken, and to meet with temptations and afflictions. When we grow unwatchful, we fall into sin; and the Lord hides his face, our comforts droop, troubles assail, and perhaps our enemies insult over us. And to arise from such depths requires redoubled earnestness and diligence, renewed humble confessions, and fervent, importunate prayers. We should entreat the Lord, that we may not close our lives under his frown, in a way dishonorable to his name, or unprofitable to our brethren; and we may properly pray to have our lives spared, that we may yet praise Him on earth and declare his truth: but whatever may befall us by the way, or however we come to the end of our course; if we have learned to love and praise God on earth, we shall exult in his favor and give Him thanks for ever and ever. Verses 6—8.

When the Psalmist had been delivered from Saul's persecuting malice, and was settled in his kingdom, he seems to have concluded, that he should thenceforth have uninterrupted peace. 2 Sam. 7:1—3, 18, 19, 26—29.) But though he ascribed all to the faithfulness, power, and love of God; he seems to have given way to unwarranted confidence, and to have remitted his vigilance and activity, and probably the fervency of his devotion. (2 Sam. 11:1—5.) Thus he was gradually drawn away into indulgence; and at length into most aggravated guilt, in the matter of Uriah, which threatened his ruin; and exposed him to sharp rebukes; till Absalom's rebellion formed a sort of crisis in his case, and reduced him to such a humble, submissive, believing, and devout state of mind, as prepared him for returning peace and comfort. (2 Sam. 11:—20:) The Lord 'hid his face and he was troubled.' (Notes, 10:1. 13:1—4.) his deepest trouble, however, was but for a moment: God, in answer to his prayers, 'restored to him the joy of his salvation;' (51:12, 13.) and he spent the rest of his days in a degree of prosperity, honor, and comfort, which, in so dreadful a case as his had been, was beyond what could at all have been expected. SCOTT.

(7.) Mountain.] 'Mountain would certainly appear to have little connection with the subject of this Ps. which as Houbigant observes, is health restored by God.—Green, after Houbigant and Mudge, as well as the Sept. Vulg. and Syr. r. v. 7, "Thou by thy favor, O Lord, Hadst given such firmness to my health: But no sooner didst Thou hide thy face, than I was in disorder." ' MORISON.

Verses 11, 12.

These vs. illustrate the doctrine of v. 5. by the Psalmist's own experience; whose case seemed as likely to form an exception to the general rule, as any that could well be conceived. The figurative language, used on the occasion, is highly descriptive of the most exulting

PSALM XXXI.

David avows his confidence in God, craves his help, and rejoices in his mercy, 1—8. He states his various trials, and blends his complaints with prayers, 9—18. He admires the goodness of God to those who fear Him, and excites the saints to love and trust Him, 19—24.

To the chief Musician, A Psalm of David.

IN [a] thee, O LORD, do I put my trust; let me never be ashamed: [b] deliver me in thy righteousness.

2 [c] Bow down thine ear to me; [d] deliver me speedily: be thou * my strong Rock, for [e] an house of defence to save me.

3 For thou art my Rock and my Fortress; therefore, [f] for thy name's sake, [g] lead me, and guide me.

4 [h] Pull me out of the net, that they have laid privily for me: for thou art [i] my Strength.

5 [k] Into thine hand I commit my spirit: [l] thou hast redeemed me, O LORD [m] God of truth.

6 I have [n] hated them that regard [o] lying vanities: but I trust in the LORD.

7 [p] I will be glad and rejoice in thy mercy: for [q] thou hast considered my trouble; thou hast [r] known my soul in adversity;

8 And hast not [s] shut me up into the hand of the enemy: thou hast [t] set my foot in a large room.

9 ¶ Have mercy upon me, O LORD, for I am in trouble: [u] mine eye is consumed with grief, yea, [x] my soul and my belly.

everlasting work. Blessed are they that dwell in God's house, they will be still praising Him. Thus must we learn to accommodate ourselves to the various providences of God that concern us; to want and to abound, to sing of mercy and judgment, and to sing unto God for both.

Ps. XXXI. V. 1—8. David probably penned this when persecuted by Saul; some passages agree particularly to his narrow escape at Keilah, 1 Sam. 23: 13. then in the wilderness of Maon, and, soon after, in the cave in the wilderness of En-gedi; but that it was penned on any of those occasions we are not told. It is a mixture of prayers and praises, and professions of confidence in God, all which do well together, and are helpful to one another. Faith and prayer must go together. He that believes, let him pray; and he that prays, let him believe, for the prayer of faith is the prevailing prayer. We have both here.

1. David, in distress, is very earnest in prayer, for succor and relief. He prays, (1.) That God would deliver him, his life from his enemies, and that an end might be put to their persecutions; that, as a righteous Judge betwixt him and his unrighteous persecutors, He would deliver him speedily, lest, if the deliverance were long deferred, his faith should fail, v. 1, 2. (2.) That if He did not immediately deliver him out, yet He would protect and shelter him in his troubles; 'Be Thou my Rock.' Thus may we pray God to secure to us our lives and comforts, and by his grace enable us to think ourselves safe in Him, Prov. 18: 10. (3.) That, his case having much in it of difficulty, both in respect of duty, and of providence, he might be under the divine guidance, v. 3. They that resolve to follow God's direction, may in faith pray for it. (4.) That, his enemies being very crafty, as well as very spiteful, God would baffle their designs, v. 4.

2. In this prayer, he gives glory to God, by a repeated profession of his confidence in Him, and dependence on Him. This encouraged his prayers, and qualified him for the mercies he prayed for; v. 1. (1.) He had chosen God for his Protector, and God had, by his promise, undertaken to be so, v. 2, 3. They that have in sincerity avouched the Lord for theirs, may expect the benefit, v. 4. (2.) He gave up his soul in a special manner to Him, v. 5. With these words, our Lord yielded up the ghost. By Stephen's example we are taught, in our dying moments, to eye Christ at God's right hand, and to commit our spirits to Him; Lord Jesus, receive my spirit. But, in trouble, David's great care is about his soul, his spirit, his better part. Outward afflictions should increase our concern for our souls, 2 Cor. 4: 16.—Luke 21: 19. He thinks the best he can do for his soul is, to commit it into the hand of God, and lodge that great trust with Him. He had prayed, v. 4. to be plucked out of the net of outward trouble, but, as not insisting on that, (God's will be done,) he immediately lets fall that petition, and commits the spirit, the inward man, into God's hand. Note, It is the wisdom and duty of every one of us, solemnly to commit our spirits into the hands of God, to be sanctified by his grace, devoted to his honor, employed in his service, and fitted for his kingdom And what encourages us to this is, that He has not only created, but redeemed us; the particular redemptions of the O. T. church, and the O. T. saints, were typical of our redemption by Jesus Christ, Gen. 48: 16. The redemption of the soul is so precious, that it must have ceased for ever, if Christ had not undertaken it; but, that He has undertaken it, encourages us to commit our souls to Him, who has thus become their rightful owner, to be preserved to his heavenly kingdom, 2 Tim 1: 12.

3. He disclaimed all confederacy with those that made an arm of flesh their confidence, v. 6. that regard lying vanities, idolaters, so some; astrologers, and those that give heed to them, so others. David abhorred all these; he trusted in God only, and not in any creature; his interest in the court and country, his retreats or strongholds, even Goliath's sword itself—these were lying vanities, which he could not depend on, but trusted in the Lord only. See 40: 4.—Jer. 17: 5.

4. He comforted himself with his hope, v. 7. Those know not how to value their hope in God, who cannot find joy enough in that hope to balance their grievances.

5. He encouraged himself in this hope, with the experiences he had had, of late, and formerly, of God's goodness, v. 7, 8. God's eye is upon our souls, when in trouble, to see whether they be humbled for sin, submissive to the will of God, and bettered by the affliction. Christ's using these words, v. 5. on the cross, may warrant us to apply all this to Christ, who trusted in his Father, and was supported and delivered by Him, and (because he humbled Himself) highly exalted, which it is proper to think of, when we sing these vs., as also therein to acknowledge our experience of God's gracious presence in trouble, and to encourage ourselves to trust in Him for the future.

V. 9—18. In the foregoing vs. David had appealed to God's righteousness, and pleaded his relation to Him, and dependence on Him; here he appeals to his mercy, and pleads the greatness of his own misery, which made him the proper object of it. Observe,

I. His complaint, v. 9. The remembrance he makes of his condition is not much unlike some even of Job's complaints. 1. His troubles had fixed a very deep impression on his mind, and made him a man of sorrows, consumed his very soul, and spent his life, and he was continually gladness, and most animated, constant, and unmingled praises; such as are found in the six concluding Pss. (M. R.—145:1,2. 146:2. Comp. 16:9. with Acts 2:26.) SCOTT.

NOTES.

Ps. XXXI. Dr. A. Clarke thinks the time, place, occasion and author of this Ps. uncertain. Some, he says, think Jeremiah to have been the author. Comp. v. 13. with Jer. 20:10. Most, however, agree, with Henry and Scott, that it was written by David upon his escape from Keilah. Yet Kimchi and Dathe (in Morison) refer it rather to the time when the Ziphites proposed to deliver him to Saul; and 'Theodoret, with whom agree many of the fathers, refers it to David's flight from Absalom, and his painful state of mind connected with his sin against Uriah.—It may partake, in a slight degree, of the prophetic spirit, and so, many have understood it; while others, as Bps. Horsley and Horne, consider it as uttered exclusively in reference to the Messiah and the Church.' Morison. ED.

Verse 1.

(1 Sam. 23:22—28.) We should realize the circumstances, [of his exposure,] which precluded all hope of escape by ordinary means, if we would enter into the spirit of the Psalmist, and perceive the strength of his faith and confidence in God. But David was only a feeble type of the Savior, in his extreme sufferings, his deep humiliation, and his prospect of the joy set before Him.—The clause, rendered 'Let me never be ashamed,' may signify 'I shall by no means be ashamed for ever.' (Is. 45:15—17.) SCOTT.

Verse 5.

Christ [on the cross] omitted the latter clause of the v. which more properly relates to the type, than to the antitype. (Luke 23:46. Acts 7:54—60.)—All the deliverances of the church, and of believers, of old, were earnests of the redemption made by the death of Christ, and wrought with reference to it: and the merciful deliverances the Psalmist had received, encouraged him still to confide in 'the LORD God of truth.' ID.

Verses 7, 8

To conceive of the Psalmist in the crisis of his danger, thus anticipating his deliverance, and his joy in the mercy of God in it, gives the passage a peculiar animation. ID.

Verse 9.

The Psalmist's present feelings seem to have interrupted the full exercise of his faith and hope.—Some suppose, that entire want of provisions was added to the rest of his difficulties; so that he and his men were ready to die with hunger. ID.

10 For [y] my life is spent with grief, and my years with sighing: [z] my strength faileth because of mine iniquity, and [a] my bones are consumed.

11 [b] I was a reproach among all mine enemies, but [c] especially among my neighbors, and [d] a fear to mine acquaintance: they that did see me without fled from me.

12 I am [e] forgotten as a dead man out of mind: I am like * a broken vessel.

13 For [f] I have heard the slander of many: [g] fear was on every side: [h] while they took counsel together against me, they devised to take away my life.

sighing, v. 9, 10. Herein he was a type of Christ. We may guess by David's complexion, which was ruddy and sanguine, by his genius for music, and by his daring enterprises in his early days, that his natural disposition was both cheerful and firm; yet here we see what he is brought to. Let the airy and gay take heed of extremes, and never set sorrow at defiance; God can find ways to make them melancholy, if they will not otherwise learn to be serious. 2. His body was affected with the sorrows of his mind, v. 10. As to Saul, and the quarrel he had with him, he could confidently insist on his righteousness; but as it was an affliction God laid on him, he owns he had deserved it, and freely confesses his iniquity to have been the procuring cause of all his trouble; and the sense of sin touched him to the quick, and wasted him more than all his calamities. 3. His friends were unkind, and became shy of him, v. 11. They durst not harbor him, nor give him any assistance, nor show him any countenance, not so much as to be seen in his company, for fear of being brought into trouble by it, now that Saul had proclaimed him a traitor, and out-lawed him. They saw how dear Abimelech the priest had paid for aiding and abetting him, though ignorantly; therefore, though they could not but own he had great wrong done him, yet they had not the courage to appear for him. He was forgotten by them, as a dead man out of mind, v. 12, looked upon with contempt as a broken vessel. Such swallow-friends the world is full of, that are gone in winter. Let those that fall on the losing side, not think it strange, if they be thus deserted, but make sure, and make use of, a Friend in heaven. 4. His enemies were unjust; they would not so have persecuted him, had they not first represented him as a bad man; he was a reproach among all his enemies, but especially among his neighbors, v. 11. Those that could not but be convinced he was an honest man, were the most forward to represent him quite otherwise, that they might get favor with Saul, because fear was on every side. Thus the best have been ranked with the worst by those that resolved to give them the worst treatment. 5. His life was aimed at, and he went in continual peril of it, v. 13. Thus, in all the plots of the Pharisees and Herodians against Christ, still the design was to take away his life; such are the enmity and cruelty of the serpent's seed.

II. His confidence in God, in the midst of these troubles; 'I trusted in Thee, O Lord, v. 14, and that kept me from sinking.' Two things comforted him in his straits, and these he pleads with God; 1. 'Thou art my God; I have chosen Thee for mine, and Thou hast promised to be mine. They need not be straitened in their prayers, who can plead this; for if God undertake for us, He will do that which will answer the compass and vast extent of that engagement. 2. My times are in thy hand. Join this with the former, and it makes the comfort complete. If God have our times in his hand, He can help us; and if He be our God, He will help us; and then what can discourage us? The time of life is in God's hands, to lengthen or shorten, imbitter or sweeten, as He pleases, according to the counsel of his will. Our times, all events that concern us, and the timing of them, these are at God's disposal; they are not in our own hands, not in our friends' hands, nor in our enemies' hands, but in God's; every man's judgment proceedeth from Him.

III. His petitions, in this faith:

1. That God would deliver him out of the hand of his enemies, v. 15, and save him, v. 16, and this, for his mercies' sake, and not for any merit of his own. Our opportunities are in God's hand, so some read, therefore He knows how to choose the fittest time for our deliverance, and we must be willing to wait that time. When David had Saul at his mercy in the cave, those about him said, 'This is the time in which God will deliver thee,' 1 Sam. 24:4. 'No,' says David, 'the time is not come for my deliverance, till it can be wrought without sin; and I will wait that time, for it is God's, that is the best.' 2. That God would, in the meantime, let him have the comfortable tokens and evidences of favor, v. 16. 3. That his prayers might be answered, and his hopes in God accomplished, v. 17. For thou never saidst to thy people, Seek in vain, and hope in vain.' 4. That shame and silence might be the portion of wicked people, particularly his enemies. Confident of success, 'let them be made ashamed by disappointment.' Particularly, he prays for, i. e. he prophesies, the silencing of those that reproach and calumniate the people of God, v. 18 a very good prayer which we have often occasion to use; for religion, and the strict and serious professors of it, are every where spoken against, (1.) With great malice; they speak grievous things, on purpose to vex them, hard things, so the word is, which bear hard on them, and by which they hope to fasten indelible characters of infamy on them. (2.) With a great deal of falsehood; they are lying lips. (3.) With great scorn and disdain; they speak proudly and contemptuously, as if the righteous, whom God has honored, were the most despicable people in the world. One would think, they thought it no sin to tell a deliberate lie, if it may but serve to expose a good man either to hatred or contempt. Hear, O our God, for we are despised. We may pray it in faith: for these lying lips shall be put to silence. God has many ways of doing it; sometimes by their repentance, which our Savior teaches us to pray for, for all; sometimes by the consciences of those that reproach his people, and sometimes by his providence visibly bringing forth the righteousness of his people as the light. However, a day is coming, when God will convince ungodly sinners of these falsehoods, and will execute judgment on them, Jude 14, 15. Then shall this prayer be fully answered, [in justice on the wicked, which is mercy to the universe;] and to that day we should have an eye in singing it; engaging ourselves likewise, by

Verses 10—13.

The life of David, while persecuted by Saul, was one continued series of afflictions and sorrows, except as he rose above them by faith and communion with God. It must be supposed that he felt his sufferings with great sensibility: and while dejected and weakened under them, in body and mind, his former sins were brought to remembrance, and he considered himself as visited for them.—The M. R. will show how each of these circumstances was, still more emphatically, observable in the history of the divine Savior. One circumstance must be excepted: 'He was wounded for our transgressions,' but had no iniquity of his own.—This passage seems to mark out the crisis before mentioned as the date of the Ps.: but as events not wholly dissimilar occurred during Absalom's rebellion, after David had brought great guilt on his conscience, in the matter of Uriah; some expositors apply the several expressions to Shimei's reproaches, Ahithophel's counsel, and the other particulars of that eventful period. (13.) 'Horsley r. thus: "Truly, I have heard the angry muttering of the mighty, Of them that are the general dread, While they sit in counsel against me; They have laid a plot to take my life!" So, in general, the Arab. the Sept. the Vulg. and the Syr. The Chal. is against it, and is followed by the Eng. Bible.' MORISON.

Thus the counsels and decrees of the Jewish rulers against our Lord were continually disappointed for several years, because 'his time was not yet come.' (M. R.—116:15. 1 Sam. 26:8—12.) SCOTT.

Verses 17, 18.

(1.) The language implies both prayer and prediction.—The word righteous is singular: it especially marks David's strict integrity, while grievously slandered with insolent contempt; as typical of the Just and Holy One of God, who was reviled far more haughtily and despitefully. PSALM XXXII.

David shows the happiness of a pardoned sinner, 1, 2; and that penitent confessions alone can relieve the misery of the guilty conscience, and make way for comfort, 3—7. He instructs and warns sinners to repent, and believers to rejoice in God, 8—11.

well-doing, if possible, to silence the ignorance of foolish men, 1 Pet. 2: 15.

V. 19—24. We have three things in these vs.

I. David's believing acknowledgment of God's goodness to his people in general, v. 19, 20.

1. God is good to all, but in a special manner to Israel. His goodness to them is wonderful, and will be, to eternity, matter of admiration; Oh how great is thy goodness! How profound the counsels, how rich the treasures, how free and extensive the communications of it! Those very persons whom men load with slanders, God loads with benefits and honors. There is goodness laid up for them in the other world, an inheritance reserved in heaven, 1 Pet. 1: 4. and goodness wrought for them in this world, goodness wrought in them. It is laid up in his promise for all that fear God, and wrought, in the actual performance of the promise, for all that trust in Him. If it be not wrought for us, it is our own fault; because we do not believe. Those that trust in God, as they have the comfort of his goodness in their own bosoms, so they have the credit of it; it is wrought for them before the sons of men: God's goodness to them puts an honor on them, for all that see shall acknowledge them, as the seed the Lord hath blessed, Is. 61: 9.

2. God preserves man and beast; but is, in a special manner, the Protector of his own people, v. 20. See here, the danger they are in, from the pride of man, and the strife of tongues; but see, too, the defence they are under; Thou shalt hide them in the secret of thy presence; in a pavilion. God has many ways of sheltering them, Jer. 36: 26. God's grace shall keep them safe from the evil of the judgments, [on the disobedient,] that are abroad; his comforts shall keep them easy and cheerful; his sanctuary shelter them from the fiery darts of terror and temptation; and the mansions in his house above shall be shortly, eternally, their hiding place from all danger and fear.

II. David's thankful returns for God's goodness to him in particular, v. 21, 22.

1. Without were fightings; but God had wonderfully preserved his life; God's loving-kindness to his people is wonderful; but some instances of it, even in this world, are, in special; as this here, when God preserved David from the sword of Saul, in caves and woods, as safe as if it had been in a strong city. In Keilah, that strong city, God showed him great mercy, both in making him an instrument to rescue the inhabitants from the Philistines, and then in rescuing him from the same men, who would have ungratefully delivered him up to Saul, 1 Sam. 23: 5, 12. This was marvellous loving kindness indeed, on which he writes, with wonder and thankfulness, Blessed be the Lord. Special preservations call for particular thanksgivings.

2. Within were fears; but God was better to him than his fears, v. 22. He here mentions, (1.) His folly, in distrusting God, which he acknowledges to his shame. It refers perhaps to that expression, 1 Sam. 27: 1. This he said, in his flight, so some read, which denotes the distress of his affairs. Saul was just at his back, and ready to seize him, which made the temptation strong; in my haste, so we read it, which denotes the disturbance and discomposure of his mind, making the temptation surprising, so that it found him off his guard. Note, It is common to speak amiss, when we speak without consideration; but what we speak amiss in haste, we must repent of at leisure, particularly what we have spoken distrustfully of God. (2.) God's wonderful goodness to him notwithstanding; though his faith failed, God's promise did not; Thou heardest the voice of my supplication, for all this. When we have thus distrusted God, He might justly have taken us at our word, and brought our fears on us, as He did on Israel, Num. 14: 28. Isa. 66: 4. But He has pitied and pardoned us, and our unbelief has not made his promise and grace of none effect; for He knows our frame.

III. The exhortation and encouragement he, hereupon, gives all saints, v. 23, 24. 1. He would have them set their love on God; v. 23. It is the character of the saints, that they love God; yet they must be still called upon to love Him more, and better, and to give proofs. We must love Him, not only for his goodness, because He preserves the faithful, but for his justice, because He plentifully rewards the proud doer according to his pride. Some take it in a good sense; He plentifully rewards the magnificent or excellent doer, that is daringly good, whose heart, like Jehoshaphat's, is lifted up in the ways of the Lord. He rewards him that does well, but plentifully rewards him that does excellently well. 2. He would have them set their hope in God; v. 24. They that hope in God have reason to be of good courage, and strong hearts, for, as nothing truly evil can befall them, so nothing truly good for them shall be wanting.

In singing this, we should animate ourselves, and one another, to persevere in our Christian course, whatever threatens, and whoever frowns.

Ps. XXXII. This Ps. though it speaks not of Christ, as many of the Pss. hitherto have, has yet a great deal of Gospel in it. The apostle tells us David here describes the blessedness of the man unto whom God imputes righteousness without works, Rom. 4: 6. The way to obtain these privileges, is to make conscience of these duties. Grotius thinks it was designed to be sung on the day of atonement.

V. 1—6. Maschil, some take to be only the

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The consciousness of trusting in God for every thing, on the warrant of his Word, inspires confidence in danger, and suggests pleas in prayer: for it would not be honorable for the Lord, to leave those who thus rely on Him to be ashamed of their hope.—Every true Christian, having learned the worth of his soul, and the dangers to which it is exposed, has been led to intrust it as a sacred deposit to the care of the Almighty: but, considering the holiness and justice of God, and his own guilt and pollution, he would not dare to do so, did he not behold Him as in Christ, his Redeemer, ready to forgive, and true to his covenant and promises. (2 Tim. 1:11,12.) But those who desire this comfortable assurance, must abhor the fellowship of all such as regard lying vanities; and renounce all idolatrous, superstitious, and carnal confidences, on which such immense numbers depend. They must rejoice in the mercy of God alone; and in every affliction remember, that He considers their trouble. They should treasure up, for future use, their experiences of his having noticed, supported, and comforted their souls in adversity.—It is our infirmity, 'if our life be spent with grief, and our years with sighing.' Should pain, sickness, poverty, reproach, contempt, and persecution, come upon us, with combined force;—should our foes prevail, and our friends prove unfaithful, or afraid of owning or regarding us;—should any be so degraded from honorable or useful stations, as to be 'forgotten like a dead man,' or 'thrown aside as a broken vessel;'—should enmity unite with contempt, and slanderous accusation give countenance to conspiracy against our lives;—still we ought to remember that we have deserved more than all this, and to be thankful for deliverance from the wrath to come.—Lord, pardon our complaints and fears; increase our faith, patience, love, and gratitude; and teach us to rejoice in tribulation, and in hope of thine eternal glory. SCOTT.

'Maschil occurs in the inscriptions of 10 Pss. viz. the 32. 42. 52. 53. 54. 55. 74. 78. 88. 89. 142.—Street mentions an old Bible, in which the inscription of this Ps. is read—"An instruction of David"— . . . which harmonizes with the spirit of the composition.—Gesenius is more simple, and tr. it "a song, or poem, of David." He considers it as probably derived from the Arabic signification of the root. According to strict Heb. usage, it would denote knowledge:

name of the tune to which the psalm was to be sung; but others think it significant: our margin reads it, giving instruction; and there is nothing in which we have more need of instruction than in the nature of true blessedness, wherein it consists, and the way that leads to it—what we must do, that we may be happy. There are divers things in which these vs. instruct us. In general, that our happiness consists in the favor and grace of God, in spiritual blessings, and not the good things of this world. When it is here said, Blessed is the man whose iniquity is forgiven, the meaning is, 'This is the ground of his blessedness; this is that fundamental privilege from which flow all the other ingredients of his blessedness.' In particular, we are here instructed,

I. Concerning the nature of the pardon of sin; this is that which we all need, and are undone without; we are therefore concerned to be very solicitous and inquisitive about it. 1. It is the forgiving of transgression. Sin is the transgression of the law; on our repentance, the transgression is forgiven, lifted off, so some read it, as a heavy burden. Matt. 11:28. 2. It is the covering of sin, that it may not appear to our shame, Rev. 3:18. God is no longer displeased with us, but perfectly reconciled. Our sins are not covered from us; My sin is ever before me; nor from God's omniscience, but from his vindictive justice: when He pardons sin, He remembers it no more, He casts it behind his back, it shall be sought for, and not found. The sinner, being thus reconciled to God, begins to be reconciled to himself. 3. It is the not imputing of iniquity, not laying it to the sinner's charge, not proceeding against him for it, according to the strictness of the law, not dealing with him as he deserves. The righteousness of Christ being imputed to us, and we being made the righteousness of God in Him, our iniquity is not imputed, God having laid on Him the iniquity of us all, and made Him sin for us. Observe, Not to impute iniquity, is God's act, for He is the Judge. It is God that justifies.

II. Concerning the character of those whose sins are pardoned, in whose spirit there is no guile; He does not say, 'There is no guilt,' (for who is there that lives, and sins not?) but no guile; that does not dissemble with God, in his professions of repentance and faith, and in his prayers for peace or pardon; but, in all these, is sincere; that does not repent, with a purpose to sin again, and then sin, with a purpose to repent again, as a learned interpreter glosses upon it. Those that design honestly, that are really what they profess to be, are the Israelites indeed, in whom is no guile.

III. Concerning the happiness of a justified state; Blessednesses are to the man whose iniquity is forgiven, all manner of blessings, sufficient to make him completely blessed. The forgiveness of sin, is that article of the covenant, which is the reason and ground of all the rest; For I will be merciful to their unrighteousness, Heb. 8:12.

IV. Concerning the uncomfortable condition of an unhumbled sinner, that sees his guilt, but is not yet brought to a penitent confession. This David describes very pathetically, from his own sad experience, v. 3, 4. Those may be said to keep silence, who stifle their convictions, and divert their minds to something else; as Cain to the building of a city; who cry not when God binds them; who will not unburden their consciences by a penitent confession, nor seek for peace, as they ought, by faithful and fervent prayer; and who choose rather to pine away in their iniquities, than to take the method God has appointed of finding rest for their souls; let such expect that their smothered convictions will be a fire in their bones; if conscience be seared, the case is so much the more dangerous; but if it be startled and awake, it will be heard. The hand of divine wrath will be felt lying heavy on the soul, and the anguish of the spirit will affect the body; to that degree David experienced it, so that when he was young, his bones waxed old; and even his silence made him roar all the day long, as if he had been under some grievous pain and distemper of body; when really the cause of all his uneasiness, was, the struggle he felt in his own bosom between his convictions and his corruptions. Note, He that covers his sin shall not prosper; some inward trouble is required in repentance, but there is much worse in impenitency.

V. Concerning the true and only way to peace of conscience. We are here taught to confess our sins, that they may be forgiven; to declare them, that we may be justified. This course David took; I acknowledged my sin unto Thee, [not unto man,] and no longer hid mine iniquity, v. 5. Note, Those that would have the comfort of pardon must take shame by a penitent confession. We must confess the fact of sin, and be particular in it; Thus, and thus have I done; confess the fault of sin, aggravate it, and lay a load upon ourselves for it; I have done very wickedly; confess the justice of the punishment we have been under for it; The Lord is just in all that is brought upon us; and that we deserve much worse; I am no more worthy to be called thy son. We must confess sin with shame and holy blushing, with fear and holy trembling.

VI. Concerning God's readiness to pardon sin to those who truly repent of it; 'I said, I will confess; I sincerely resolved upon it, hesitated no longer, but came to a point, that I would make a free and ingenuous confession of my sins; and immediately Thou forgavest the iniquity of my sin, and gavest me the comfort of the pardon in mine own conscience; immediately I found rest to my soul.' Note, God is more ready to pardon sin, on our repentance, than we are to repent, in order to obtain pardon. It was with much ado, David was here brought to confess his sins, v. 3, 4. but when hence poetry: inasmuch as the poets of antiquity were wise men and preservers of knowledge.—Upon the whole, I prefer the marg. reading, as most natural and intelligible, and of the highest authority.—It is highly probable the Ps. was composed soon after the commission of those crimes, which threw a shade over David's fair history, and brought him into a state of unutterable mental darkness before God.' MORISON.

Maschil.] This Ps. teaches the nature and effects of true repentance; 12 other Pss. have the same title, the subjects of which are various; but all replete with instruction: that the word maschil showed the music to which the Ps. was set, is by no means satisfactory.—This is one of the seven penitential Pss. It seems to have been written some time after the 51st, and when God had 'restored to him the joy of his salvation.' (51:12,13.) SCOTT.

Verses 1, 2.

(Note, 1:1—3.) Sin is the only cause of misery; and forgiveness is the commencement of a sinner's happiness. The believer's transgressions are not imputed to him, as to any of their penal consequences: nay, 'righteousness without works' is imputed, and as a righteous person, the reward is adjudged to him: hence all his present comforts, and hopes of future felicity. (Rom. 4:4—8.) ID.

Verses 3—5.

It seems David, before Nathan came to him, had often been exceedingly tortured in his conscience, on account of the atrocious crimes he had committed; (2 Sam. 11:27. 12:1—6.) yet reluctance to humble himself before God, or to be considered as a criminal by men, led him to 'keep silence,' or only to give vent to his anguish by solitary bemoanings; endeavoring, no doubt, by one sophistical excuse or other, to palliate his guilt to himself, and to be on better terms with his conscience. But this stubborn and rebellious conduct served only to prolong and enhance his misery. Thus the hand of God was 'heavy upon him:' (M. R. i.) and it is probable, some additional distressing malady was superadded to the natural effects of his inward conflicts (30:1,2. 38:1—10. 41:1—8.) But at length, being brought to a more proper frame of mind, he resolved humbly to submit himself to God, and to make full and ingenuous confession of his aggravated crimes, without attempting any excuse, or palliation. Having done this, the 'iniquity,' or injustice, of his sin was pardoned, his burden was speedily removed, and at length his comforts were restored; and he recorded these things with a mark of peculiar emphasis, Selah, that others might profit by his painful and by his joyful experience. Jer. 31:18—20. Luke 15:13—24. 1 John 1:8—10. Soon after the heats commence, the grass withers, the flower fades, every green thing is dried up by the roots, and the fields, so lately clothed with the richest verdure, and adorned with the loveliest flowers, are converted into a brown and arid wilderness. To this uniform appearance of an eastern summer the psalmist alludes.' PAXTON.

he surrendered, see how quickly, how easily, he obtained good terms; I did but say, I will confess, and Thou forgavest.' Thus the father of the prodigal saw his returning son when yet afar off, and ran to meet him with the kiss that sealed his pardon. What an encouragement this to poor penitents; what an assurance, that, if we confess our sins, we shall find God, not only faithful and just, but gracious and kind, to forgive us our sins!

VII. Concerning the good use we are to make of David's experience of God's readiness to forgive his sins, v. 6. For this shall every one that is godly pray unto Thee. Note, 1. All godly people are praying people. As soon as ever Paul was converted, Behold, he prays, Acts 11: 11. You may as soon find a living man without breath, as a living Christian without prayer. 2. The instructions given us concerning the happiness of those whose sins are pardoned, and the easiness of obtaining the pardon, should engage and encourage us to pray, and particularly to pray, God be merciful to us sinners. For this, shall every one that is well-inclined, be earnest with God in prayer, and come boldly to the throne of grace, with hopes to obtain mercy, Heb. 4: 16. 3. Those that would speed in prayer, must seek the Lord in a time when He will be found. When, by his providence, He calls them to seek Him, and by his Spirit He stirs them up to seek Him, they must go speedily to seek the Lord, (Zech. 8: 21.) and lose no time, lest death cut them off, and then it will be too late to seek Him, Isa. 55: 6. Behold now is the accepted time, 2 Cor. 6: 2. 4. Those that are sincere and abundant in prayer, will find the benefit of it, when in trouble; floods of great waters, very threatening, shall not come nigh, to terrify, much less to overwhelm them. Such is the security of all upright, penitent, praying people. As the temptations of the wicked one touch them not, 1 John 5: 18. so neither do the troubles of this evil world; these fiery darts, of both kinds, drop short of them.

V. 7—11. David is here improving his experience of the comfort of pardoning mercy.

I. He speaks to God, and professes his confidence in Him, and expectation from Him, v. 7. having tasted the sweetness of divine grace to a penitent sinner, he cannot doubt its continuance to a praying saint, and that in it he should find both safety and joy. 1. Safety; 'Thou art my Hiding-Place; Thou shalt preserve me from trouble, such trouble as I was in, while I kept silence,' v. 3. When God has pardoned our sins, if He leave us to ourselves, we shall soon plunge ourselves again into the same gulf; therefore we must fly to the grace of God, to be preserved from having our hearts again hardened through the deceitfulness of sin. God keeps his people from trouble, by keeping them from sin. 2. Joy; 'Thou shalt not only deliver me, but compass me about with songs of deliverance; which way soever I look, I shall see occasion to rejoice, and to praise God; and my friends also shall compass me about in the congregation, to join their songs with mine; as every one that is godly shall pray with me, so they shall give thanks with me.'

II. He turns his speech to men, to strengthen his brethren, v. 8. I will instruct thee, whoever thou art that desirest instruction, and teach thee in the way which thou shalt go: see 51: 12, 13. When Solomon became a penitent, he immediately became a preacher, Eccl. 1: 1. Those are best able to teach others the grace of God, who have themselves had the experience of it: and those who are themselves taught of God, ought to tell others what He has done for their souls, 66. 16. and so teach them. I will guide thee with mine eye. Some apply it to God's conduct and direction. He teaches us by his Word, and guides us by the secret intimations of his will in the hints and turns of Providence, which He enables his people to understand and take direction from; as a master makes a servant know his mind by a wink of his eye. When Christ turned and looked upon Peter, He guided him with his eye. But it is rather to be taken as David's promise to those who sat under his instruction, his own children and family especially; 'I will counsel thee, mine eyes shall be upon thee,' so the marg. 'I will give thee the best counsel I can, and then observe whether thou takest it or no.' Those that are taught in the Word, should be under the constant inspection of those that teach them; spiritual guides must be overseers.

In this application of the foregoing doctrine concerning the blessedness of those whose sins are pardoned, here is a word to sinners, and a word to saints; and this is rightly dividing the Word of truth, and giving to each their portion.

1. A word of caution to sinners, and a good reason given for it. (1.) The caution is, not to be unruly and ungovernable, v. 9. Be ye not as the horse, or the mule, which have no understanding. When the psalmist would reproach himself for the sins he repented of, he compared himself to a beast before God; so foolish have I been and ignorant, 73: 22. and therefore warns others not to be so. Let us not be like brute animals, hurried by appetite and passion. If sinners would be governed and determined by the dictates of right reason, they would soon become saints, and go no

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

All men would be happy, but they vainly expect that riches, pleasures, and worldly honors can make them so; and when disappointed, change one vanity for another: so that he, and he alone, who attends to the Word of God, seeks felicity successfully.—Pride and stoutness of heart; aversion to God and his holy character and spiritual worship; and unbelief, either absolutely, or to a considerable degree, prevailing in the heart; keep back from unreserved submission, ingenuous confession, and fervent prayer, numbers who are deeply distressed with a sense of guilt. In this way many are at length driven to despair and suicide; while far more seek relief from a condemning conscience, by having recourse to infidelity, or some corrupt system, which excuses or explains away the evil of sin, and so enables them to keep up a delusive hope of being happy, or at least of escaping misery, without 'repentance and works meet for repentance.' When, however, God is pleased to visit the soul with his special grace, He sends his Word, not only by a Nathan to the outward ear, but by his Holy Spirit to the inmost soul: (2 Sam. 12: 7.) and then godly sorrow, unfeigned submission, ingenuous confessions, and believing prayers for mercy and forgiveness, through the atoning blood of Christ, soon make way for hope, and peace, and joy: and the justified believer tastes a happiness, of which before he had no conception; while he expatiates in praise of his present consolations, as contrasted with his preceding anguish, in a strain not unlike the encomiums on health of one recovering from a dangerous disease. Yet even this man may relax his vigilance, and fall into grievous sins, nay, be led to 'keep silence,' in the same perverse and foolish manner, as he did before: so deceitful is the heart of man, and so powerful the influence of temptation operating on human depravity!—But God will continue to frown, to rebuke, and to correct, till his children kiss the rod, confess their sins, and implore forgiveness. Happy are they, who trust in the Lord, and uprightly walk with Him. (Is. 54:17.)

forgiveness with the sorrows of penitence, and the humble confession of iniquity before God.' MORISON.

Verses 6, 7.

The word rendered 'godly' is frequently translated 'a saint,' and seems to mean one whom God favors. All that fear Him, and in humble submission desire his mercy, show so far that right state of heart which springs from special grace: and such persons, hearing how readily God forgave the heinous guilt of David, when he was brought to ingenuous confession and deep repentance; would be encouraged to copy his example, and learn to pray in faith and hope, 'in a time when God might be found.'—While his Word is brought home to the conscience, and the Holy Spirit strives with the sinner, by painful convictions and terrors, or draws him to hope for mercy; it is especially 'a time of finding,' (marg.) 'an acceptable time,' 'a day of visitation,' a critical season in his experience. In some respects, this life is a 'time of finding,' except to such as are judicially hardened: but in another world, God will no more be found on a mercy-seat, waiting to be gracious; but as a [punishing] Judge to all the impenitent. (Is. 49 7,8. 55:6,7. Luke 13:22—30. 19:41—44. John 12:34—36. 2 Cor. 6:1,2 Heb. 3:7—13.)—They however, who, as David supposed, might by his example be animated to seize the invaluable opportunity, would be received into favor; and, secure of protection, (like Noah in the ark during the deluge,) could be approached by no overwhelming troubles, temptations, or enemies; or by those judgments and that vengeance which overtook the wicked and hurried them into destruction. (Matt 7:24—27. Luke 6:46—49.) In this happiness the Psalmist rejoiced and daily received so many mercies, which he celebrated with songs o deliverance, that he was wholly compassed about with them. SCOTT

PSALM XXXIII.

The righteous are called on to rejoice in God, and to praise his perfections as displayed in his word and works; and all men, to fear the great Creator and Governor of the world, 1—12. farther in their sinful courses. (2.) The reason for this caution, is, the way of sin ends in sorrow, v. 10. Many sorrows shall be to the wicked. Sin will have sorrow, if not repented of, everlasting sorrow. It was part of the sentence, I will greatly multiply thy sorrows. 'Be wise for yourselves, therefore, and turn from your wickedness, that you may prevent those sorrows, those many sorrows.'

2. A word of comfort to saints, and a good reason given for that too. (1.) If they will but trust in the Lord, and keep close to Him, mercy shall compass them about on every side, v. 10. so that they shall not depart from God, for that mercy shall keep them in, nor shall any real evil break in upon them, for that mercy shall keep it out. (2.) They are therefore commanded to be glad in the Lord, and to rejoice in Him, to that degree, as even to shout for joy, v. 11. Let them be so transported with this holy joy, as not to be able to contain themselves: and let them affect others with it, that they also may see, that a life of communion with God is the most pleasant and comfortable life we can live, in this world. This is that present bliss which the upright in heart, and they only, are entitled to, and qualified for.

Ps. XXXIII. V. 1—11. This is a Ps. of praise, probably David wrote it, but God would have us look above the penmen of sacred writ, to that blessed Spirit that moved and guided them. We need not be at a loss for proper thoughts in singing this Ps. which so naturally speaks the pious affections of a devout soul toward God. Four things the psalmist expresses in these vs.

I. The great desire he had that God might be praised: holy joy is the heart and soul of praise, and that is here pressed on all good people, v. 1. Rejoice in the Lord, ye righteous, so the foregoing Ps. concluded, and so this begins. Thankful praise is the breath and language of holy joy; and that also is here required, v. 2. Religious songs are the proper expressions of thankful praise, and these are here required, v. 3. a new song is most likely to move the affections, and on every new occasion, we should renew our songs, even every morning and evening. Music was then used, by the appointment of David, with the temple songs, that they might be the better sung: and this also is here called for, v. 2. Sing unto Him with the psaltery. Here is, 1. A good rule for this duty; 'Do it skilfully, [with a will,] intelligently, affectionately. 2. A good reason for it; praise is comely for the upright; well pleasing to God, and an excellent ornament to our profession; it becomes the upright, whom God has so much honored, to honor Him. The upright praise God in a comely manner, for they praise Him with warm hearts, that is praising Him with their glory. Whereas the praises of hypocrites are awkward and uncomely, like a parable in the mouth of fools, Prov. 26: 7.

II. The high thoughts he had of God, and of his infinite perfections, v. 4, 5. God makes Himself known to us, 1. In his Word; here put for all divine revelation, which is all right, and has nothing amiss in it: God's commands exactly agree with the rules of equity, and the eternal reasons of good and evil. His promises all are wise and good, and inviolably sure, and there is no iniquity in his threatenings, but even those are designed for our good, by deterring us from evil: therefore all our deviations from God's Word are wrong, and we are then in the right when we agree with it. 2. In his works, which are all done in truth, according to his counsels, called the Scriptures of truth, Dan. 10: 21. The copy in all God's works agrees exactly with the original plan laid in the Eternal Mind, and varies not in the least. God has made it to appear in his works, (1.) That He is a God of inflexible justice. He loveth righteousness and judgment. He never did or can do wrong to any of his creatures. He is Himself the righteous Lord, the Teacher and watchful Guide of all, who desire to walk in his ways. Some understand it, as the word of God to David, inducing him to repentance.—Obstinate sinners render sharp usage necessary, either to preserve them from ruin, or to restrain them from injuring others. So that their sorrows are multiplied, as the deliverances and praises of the righteous are enhanced. SCOTT.

NOTES.

Ps. XXXIII. The Sept. the Syr. and the Vulg. entitle this, 'A Ps. of David,' and in 8 of Kennicott's MSS. it is written as a part of Ps. 32. ED.—'From v. 1. to v. 19. it appears to have been sung by an individual, perhaps the high priest, or the leader of some procession of the Israelites. From v. 20. to the close, the use of plural pronouns intimates that the Ps. was sung by a band of the people.' MORISON.

Verse 1.

'God, and not the world, is the fountain of joy, which sinners talk of, but the righteous only possess.' Bp. Horne.—Joy and praise are becoming and beautiful, when united with piety and integrity; but the appearance of them, without soundness of character, is inconsistent and disgusting. SCOTT.

Verses 2, 3.

Instrumental, as well as vocal music, in the worship of God, preceded the ceremonial law: not being explicitly there appointed, it can be no part of it; and if properly conducted, it may be rendered greatly subservient to devotion. (M. R.—Ex. 15: 1,20,21. 1 Sam. 10: 5,6. 1 Chr. 15: 16,20,21. 16: 4—6.)—'Let not the ancient songs of praise suffice you; but endite a new hymn, to testify your singular love and gratitude; employ your best skill to make the sweetest music; and sing as cheerfully as you are wont to do at your most solemn feasts.' Patrick. (96:1. Rev. 5:8—10. 14:1—5, 2 col.) ID.

(2.) Harp.] 'A musical instrument invented by Jubal, Gen. 4: 21. used by the Jews only when feelings of mirth and joy were expressed. Ps. 137:1, 2. Isa. 24:8. Gen. 31:27. It is called a pleasant harp, Ps. 81: 2. as opposed to instruments of sorrow. David's skill in handling it was great, 1 Sam. 16:16,24. It was used, in connection with other instruments, to celebrate the goodness of Jehovah, in the service of his house. 1 Chron. 13:8, 15, 16, 28. 25:1. Neh. 12.27. Calmet thinks the ancient testudo, or lyre with 8 strings, is here meant.' Though the above guess is retained, it advances us little in the knowledge of Hebrew musical instruments. See notes, 1 Sam. 10: 5, and Ps. 150. and Pfeiffer on Heb. Music, in Bib. Repos. An investigation of the Egyptian music, (note, 1 Chr. 15: 16, &c.) would lend to greater certainty in determining these instruments. Such an investigation cannot be expected here. Psaltery.] 'It was made in the form of a leathern bottle, and turned round in playing. Bp. Horsley thinks it was an instrument with 10 strings: if so, the "and" here is improperly supplied; but in Ps. 92: 3. they appear to be distinguished.' Cott. Bib. A cut is given of a beautiful ancient harp with 11 strings, from the magnificent tomb, 5, ('of the harpers.') in the valley of Biban el Molook, at Thebes. Notes, Ps. 150. In so small a wood cut it has been impossible to preserve the graceful outline or nice workmanship of the original; indeed this may be said of most of these cuts from the Egyptian monuments, which do very little justice to the state of the arts among the ancient Egyptians.

and therefore loveth righteousness. (2.) That He is a God of inexhaustible bounty; the earth is full of his goodness, i. e. of the proofs and instances of it; the darkest, the coldest, hottest, and most dry and desert part not excepted: what pity that this earth, which is so full of God's goodness, should be so empty of his praises; and that, of the multitudes that live on his bounty, so few live to his glory!

III. The conviction he was under of the almighty power of God, evidenced in the creation of the world. We believe in God, therefore we praise Him as the Father Almighty, Maker of heaven and earth; so we are here taught to praise Him. What cannot that Power do, which, with a word, made a world? the Spirit is the Breath, Christ is the Word, so that God the Father made the world, as He rules it, and redeems it, by his Son and Spirit. How effectually it was done, v. 9. Eccl. 3: 14. It is by virtue of that command to stand fast, that they continue to this day according to God's ordinance, 119: 91. The everlasting Gospel gives this as the reason why we must worship God, because He made the heaven and the earth, and the sea, Rev. 14: 6, 7. Let us all fear Him, i. e. dread his wrath, and displeasure, and be afraid of having Him our enemy, and standing it out against Him. Let us not dare to offend Him, who, having this power, no doubt, has all power in his hand. Jer. 5: 22.

IV. The satisfaction he had in God's sovereignty and dominion, v. 10, 11. Through all the revolutions of time God never changed his measures, but in every event, the eternal counsel of God is fulfilled; nor can any thing prevent its being accomplished in its times. With what pleasure to ourselves may we, in singing this, give praise to God! How easy may this thought make us at all times, that God governs the world, that He did it in infinite wisdom before we were born, and will do it when we are silent in the dust.

V. 12—22. We are here taught to give to God the glory,

I. Of his common providence towards all men. Though He has endued man with understanding and freedom of will, yet He reserves to Himself the government of him, and even of those very faculties by which he is qualified to govern himself.

1. Men are all under his eye, even their hearts are so; and all the motions and operations of their souls, which none know but they themselves, He knows better than they themselves, v. 13, 14. Looks upon them, looks narrowly, so the word here used is sometimes rendered, so narrowly, that not the least thought can escape his observation.

2. Their hearts, as well as their times, are all in his hand; He fashions their hearts. He made them at first; hence He is called the Father of spirits: and this is a good argument to prove that He perfectly knows them; David uses it with application to himself, 139: 1, 14. He still moulds the hearts of men, turns them as He pleases, to serve his own purposes, darkens or enlightens men's understandings, stiffens or bows their wills, according as He is pleased to make use of them. He that fashions men's hearts fashions them alike; it is in hearts as in faces, though there is a great difference, and such a variety, as that no hearts are exactly of the same temper, yet there is such a similitude, that, in some things, all faces and all hearts agree. [All men, except the idiot, are born organized with like elementary animal, intellectual, and moral faculties, but these are in different force or relative proportion in each individual. Ed.] He fashions them together; so some read; as the wheels of a watch, though of different shapes, sizes, and motions, are yet all put together, to serve one and the same purpose, so the hearts of men and their dispositions, however varying from each other, and seeming to contradict one another, are yet all overruled, to serve the divine purpose, which is one.

3. They, and all they do, are subject to his judgment; for He considers all their works, not only knows them, but weighs them, that He may render to every man according to his works, now, in the judgment, and to eternity.

4. All the powers of the creature have a dependence on Him, and are of no account, of no avail at all, without Him, v. 16, 17. It is much for the honor of God, that not only no force can prevail in opposition to Him, but that no force can act but in dependence on Him, and by a power derived from Him. The strength of a giant, of a king, of an army, is nothing without God. Let not the strong then glory in strength, but let us all strengthen ourselves in the Lord our God, go forth, and go on, in his strength. In war, horses were then so highly accounted of, and so much depended on, that God forbade the kings of Israel to multiply horses, Deut. 17: 16. lest they should be tempted to trust to them, (v. 17.) and their confidence should thereby be taken off from God.

II. We are to give God the glory of his special grace. In the midst of his acknowledgments of God's providence, he pronounces those blessed that have Jehovah for their God, who governs the world, and has wherewithal to help them in every time of need; while they were miserable who had this and the other senseless, helpless Baal for their God, v. 12. It is their wisdom, that they take the Lord for their God, and their happiness, that they are the people whom God has chosen for his own inheritance, Deut. 32: 9. Now let us observe here, to the honor of divine grace,

1. The regard God has to his people, v. 18, 19. God beholds all men with an eye of observation, but his eye of favor and complacency is on them that fear Him; He looks on them with delight, as the father on his children, as the bridegroom on his spouse, Isa. 62: 5. If He do not deliver the body from temporal death, yet He will deliver the soul from spiritual and eternal death; their souls, whatever happens, shall live and praise Him, either in this world, or in a better. He does not say He will give them abundance, (they have no reason either to desire it, or to expect it,) but He will keep them alive, they shall not starve; and when destroying judgments are abroad, it ought to be reckoned a great favor, for it is a very striking one, and lays us under peculiar obligations, to have our lives given us for a prey. They that have the Lord for their God, shall find Him their Help and their Shield, v. 20.

2. The regard God's people have to Him, and which we all ought to have, in consideration of this. (1.) We must wait for God; we must attend the motions of his providence, and accommodate ourselves to them, and patiently expect the issue of them, v. 20. (2.) We must rely on God; (hope in his mercy, in the goodness of his nature though we have not an express promise to depend on;) they that fear God and his wrath must hope in God and his mercy. These pious dispositions will not only consist together, but befriend each other; a holy fear of God, and yet at the same time a hope in his mercy. This is trusting in his holy name, v. 21. (3.) We must rejoice in God,

The sublimity of this v. is admirable: 'He spake, and it was; He commanded, and it stood.' The transl. cannot equal the original; the emphatical pronoun rendered he, twice repeated, giving much additional energy. 'The counsels of states and empires are either directed to the accomplishment of the great counsel of Heaven; or, if they attempt to thwart it, are blasted and brought to nothing. History will force all who read it with this view, to acknowledge thus much. And with this view indeed it should always be read.' Bp. Horne. The nation, therefore, which was distinguished as the chosen inheritance of this almighty Creator and universal Sovereign, possessed inestimable advantages above the worshippers of idols, and should rejoice in them and improve them. Verses 13—15.

The Lord made the human species originally of the same nature; all are derived from the same stock, and all receive that nature impaired through the fall: and one heart (the same views, judgment, disposition, and affections) is given to all, who are renewed by the Holy Spirit, with merely circumstantial differences, in things of smaller consequence. PSALM XXXIV.

David praises God, and exhorts others, from his own experience, to bless and trust in Him, 1—10. He teaches the fear of God; and contrasts the privileges of the righteous with the miseries of the wicked, 11—22.

A Psalm of David, when he changed his behavior before * Abimelech; who drove him away, and he departed.

v. 21. Those do not truly rest in God, or do not know the unspeakable advantage they have by so doing, who do not rejoice in Him at all times; because they that hope in God hope for an eternal fulness of joy in his presence. (4.) We must seek to Him for that mercy which we hope in, v. 22. Our expectations from God are not to supersede, but to quicken and encourage, our applications to Him; He will be sought unto for that which He has promised, therefore the Ps. concludes with a short, but comprehensive prayer, 'Let thy mercy, O Lord, be upon us; let us always have the comfort and benefit of it, not according as we merit from Thee, but according as we hope in Thee, according to the promise Thou hast in thy Word given to us, and according to the faith Thou hast by thy Spirit and grace wrought in us.' If, in singing these vs. we put forth a dependence on God, and let out our desires towards Him, we make melody with our hearts to the Lord.

Ps. XXXIV. V. 1—10. The title of this Ps. tells us both by whom, and on what occasion it was penned. It has as much in it of the marks of a calm, sedate spirit, as any in all the book; and there is something curious too in the composition, for it is what is called an alphabetical psalm, that is, a psalm in which every v. begins with each letter in its order, as it stands in the Heb. alphabet. Happy they who can thus keep their temper, and keep their graces in exercise, even when tempted to change their behavior.

In this former part of the psalm,

I. David engages and excites himself to praise God. Though it was his fault that he changed his behavior, yet it was God's mercy that he escaped, and the mercy was so much the greater, in that God did not deal with him according to the desert of his dissimulation, and we must in every thing give thanks. He resolves, 1. That he will praise God constantly; at all times, on all occasions. If we hope to spend our eternity in praising God, it is fit we should spend as much as may be of our time in this work. 2. That he will praise Him openly; His praise shall continually be in my mouth. Thus he would show how forward he was to own his obligations to the mercy of God, and how desirous to make others also sensible of theirs. 3. That he will praise Him heartily; 'My soul shall make her boast in the Lord, in my relation to Him, my interest in Him, and expectations from Him.' It is not vain glory to glory in the Lord.

II. He calls on others to join him herein. He expects they will, v. 2. 'the humble shall hear thereof, both of my deliverance and of my thankfulness, and be glad that a good man has so much favor showed him, and God so much honor.' Those have most comfort in God's mercies, both to others and to themselves, that are humble, and have the least confidence in their own merit and sufficiency. It pleased David to think, that God's favors to him would rejoice the heart of every Israelite. Three things he would have us all concur with him in.

1. High thoughts of God, which we should express in magnifying Him, and exalting his name, v. 3. We cannot make God greater or higher than He is; but, if we adore Him as infinitely great, and higher than the highest, He is pleased to reckon this magnifying and exalting Him. We have reason to join in thanksgiving to God,

(1.) For his readiness to hear prayer, which all the saints have had the comfort of, for He never said to any of them, Seek ye Me, in vain. David, for his part, will testify, that he has found Him a prayer-hearing God, v. 4. Unbelieving, distrust-

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Rejoicing in the Lord, as our Father and Friend, is the genuine effect of humiliation and mourning for sin: for, being justified by faith, and walking uprightly before Him, joy is our privilege and duty. But the joy of the hypocrite springs from presumption, and his praises are an offence and affront to the Lord.—Every endowment which we possess should be employed, with all our skill and earnestness, in the service of the Giver; and we should be avowed in our worship: but well regulated and heavenly affections are most harmonious and acceptable. (Notes, Eph. 5: 15—20. Col. 3:16,17.)—Every part of his Word is holy, just, and good, and very useful to the upright; (Note, Mic. 2:6,7.) and all his works are done in truth, correspond to the prophecies and promises of the Scripture, and are, in one way or other, a fulfilment of them.—Though the Lord delights in righteousness and judgment, yet the earth, which is full of man's wickedness, is filled also with his goodness: yea, his most abundant mercy consists perfectly with his most awful justice. (Note, Matt. 25: 41—46. Luke 19: 11—27.)—All human power and policy are ineffectual against his omnipotent will: 'his counsel shall stand, and He will do all his pleasure;' and his vengeance against the ungodly will be everlasting.—But blessed are his people, who have Him for their Portion, and are his chosen inheritance: who worship and serve Him, live under his protection, and enjoy his favor! We possess the outward means of this blessing: may He visit our souls with salvation, and new create us unto holiness! For He who formed man's heart, cannot be imposed on by any appearances.—All confidence, except in his mercy, is vain. All human devices are ineffectual for the salvation of our souls: but the Lord's watchful eye is over those, who unite the conscientious fear of his name, with a believing hope in his mercy through the great Redeemer. May He teach us to say from our hearts, 'Our soul waiteth for the LORD, He is our Help and Shield.' Then shall 'we rejoice in Him, because we have trusted in his holy name:' for 'his mercy will surely be upon us, according as we hope in Him.' SCOTT.

God continues the same, in every age; and effects the same things, by ordinary means, as He did in former times by miracles, both against his powerful and haughty enemies, and for his humble, believing children. SCOTT.

NOTES.

Ps. XXXIV. Title. 'Some have doubted the authenticity of this title; but we think without sufficient reason.—Many expressions used in this Ps. may be applied to the Redeemer; and Horsley thinks v. 20. is applied to Him, John 19:36. but it is more generally thought John refers to the paschal lamb: nor can we by any means admit, with Hutchinson, cited by the Bp., that any one passage being applicable to the true David, i. e. Messiah, and to none else, determines the Ps. to that David. On the contrary, we believe few are confined to the Messiah only, or to any one single topic, it being common to these lyric odes generally to admit a variety of topics. In fact, it is the very nature of a typical dispensation, to advert sometimes to the typical things themselves, and sometimes to the sublimer objects they were intended to represent. So it is in typical prophecies. A spiritual Christian may see Christ in a thousand objects which surround, without excluding the moral improvement arising from their literal sense.' WILLIAMS.—This is the second of the acrostic, or alphabetic Pss. See Ps. 25. ED.

Verses 1, 2.

The event, during almost 3000 years, has fully verified this expectation.—The word rendered humble, is afterwards transl. poor. (6) It seems applicable either to poverty and affliction borne with meek submission; or to the lowly sense, which true believers have of their unworthiness; and the poverty in spiritual things, which renders them teachable, dependent, and thankful. ful fear of trouble, is our sin; nay, often more our torment, too, than the thing itself. David's prayers helped to silence his fears; having sought the Lord, and left his case with Him, he could with great composure wait the event. Others, too, have experienced the like benefit. Yes, many beside him have looked unto God by faith and prayer, and have been lightened by it, v. 5. When we look to the world, we are darkened, perplexed, at a loss; but when we look to God, from Him we have the light both of direction and joy, and our way is made both plain and pleasant. And if these also, (v. 5.) were persons of great eminency, like David himself, and, on that account, highly favored; or their numbers made them considerable; yet this poor man, a single person, mean and inconsiderable, whom no man respected or cared for, even he was as welcome to the throne of grace as David, or any of his worthies; the Lord heard him, took cognizance of his case and of his prayers, and saved him out of all his troubles, v. 6. God will regard the prayer of the destitute, 102: 17. See Isa. 57: 15.

(2.) For the ministration of the good angels about us, v. 7. The angel of the Lord, a guard of angels, so some, or a guardian angel, encamps round about them that fear God, as the life-guard about the prince, and delivers them. The holy angels do us more good offices, every day, than we are aware of. Though very much superior to us, though they retain their primitive rectitude, which we have lost, though they have constant employment in the upper world, yet, in obedience to their Maker, and in love to those that bear his Image, they condescend to minister to the saints, and stand up for them against the powers of darkness; they not only visit them, but encamp round about them, acting for their good as really, though not as sensibly, as for Jacob's, Gen. 32: 1. and Elisha's, 2 K. 6: 17. All the glory be to the God of the angels.

2. Kind and good thoughts of God, v. 8. The goodness of God includes both the beauty and amiableness of his being, and the bounty and beneficence of his providence and grace; and, accordingly, we must taste and relish the goodness of God in all his gifts to us; see that He is a beautiful Being, and delight in the contemplation of his infinite perfections. By taste and sight we both make discoveries, and take complacency; taste, and see, God's goodness; notice it, and take the comfort of it, 1 Pet. 2: 3. He is good, for He makes all those truly blessed that trust in Him; let us, therefore, be so convinced of his goodness, as thereby to be encouraged in the worst of times to trust in Him.

3. A resolution to seek God and serve Him, and continue in his fear; v. 9. when we taste and see that He is good, we must not forget that He is great, and greatly to be feared; nay, even his goodness is the proper object of a filial reverence and awe, Hos. 3: 5. Fear the Lord; worship Him, and make conscience of your duty to Him in every thing; not fear Him and shun Him, but fear Him and seek Him, v. 10. as a people seek unto their God; apply yourselves to Him, and portion yourselves in Him. To encourage us to fear God and seek Him, it is here promised that those that do so, even in this wanting world, shall want no good thing. [Note, Job 36: 8—14.] Heb. They shall not want all good things; they shall so have of all good things, that they shall have no reason to complain of the want of any. As to the things of the other world, they shall have grace sufficient for the support of the spiritual life, 2 Cor. 12: 9. Ps. 84: 11. And as to this life, they shall have what is necessary to the support of it from the hand of God; as a Father, He will feed them with food convenient; what farther comforts they desire, they shall have, as far as Infinite Wisdom sees good, and what they want in one thing shall be made up in another. What God denies them, He will give them grace to be content without, and then they do not want it, Deut. 3: 26. Paul had all, and abounded, because he was content, Phil. 4: 11, 18. Those that live by faith in God's all-sufficiency, want nothing; for in Him they have enough. They that trust to themselves, and think their own hands sufficient for them, shall want, for bread is not always to the wise; but verily they shall be fed that trust in God, [obey his laws,] and desire to be at his finding. They that are ravenous, and prey on all about them, shall want, but the meek shall inherit the earth; they shall not want, who with quiet obedience work, and mind their own business; plain-hearted Jacob has pottage enough, when Esau, the cunning hunter, is ready to perish.

V. 11—22. David, in this latter part of the Ps. undertakes to teach children; though a man of war, and anointed to be king, though now full of cares and business, yet he can find heart and time to counsel young people, from his own experience. It does not appear that he had now any children of his own, at least, any grown up to a capacity of being taught; but, by divine inspiration, he instructs the children of his people. Those that were in years would not be taught by him, though he had offered them his service, 32: 8. but he hopes children and young people will be more tractable; therefore he calls together a congregation of them, v. 11. Perhaps he intends especially neglected children; and it is as great a charity to teach children whose parents are not in a capacity to teach them, as to feed children whose parents have not bread for them. Observe, 1. What he expects, attention; 'Hearken unto me.' 2. What he undertakes to teach—The fear of the Lord, inclusive of all the duties of religion. He could have taught music, or war, or politics; but, no; 'I will teach you the fear of the Lord, which is better than all the arts and sciences, better than all burnt-offerings and sacrifices. That is it which we should be solicitous both to learn ourselves, and to teach our children.

I. He supposes we all aim to be happy, v. 12. What man is he that desireth life? that is, as it follows, not only to see many days, but to see good, comfortable days. Surely this must look farther than time and this present world. What man is he that would be eternally happy? Who would? Alas, very few have that in their thoughts; most ask, Who will show us any good? But few ask, What shall we do to inherit eternal life? This question implies that there are some such.

II. He prescribes the true and only way to happiness, both in this world and that to come, v. 13, 14. We must bridle our tongues, and be careful what we say; so great a way does this go in religion, that, if any offend not in word, the same is a perfect man; and so little a way does religion

The apostle applies this v. expressly to Christ. The believer tastes, and sees, that God is good, as he perceives that honey is sweet, the light pleasant, and the landscape beautiful. This is no longer a matter of reasoning or expectation; but of actual enjoyment, in which he cannot be deceived. (M. R.—63:5, 6. 119:103. 1 John 1:1—4. 5:9,10.) SCOTT.

The Psalmist having addressed 'the saints,' or such as were established in the way of holiness; next exhorts young persons, or new converts, as children, or sons, beloved sons. Youth is the learning and remembering season; what first occupies the mind lasts the longest.—True religion begins in the fear of God, in dread of his anger, and hope and desire of his favor; and it has the promise both of this world and the next. go without this, that it is said, of him who bridles not his tongue, His religion is vain. We must be upright and sincere, not double-tongued; our words must be the indications of our minds; our lips must be kept from speaking guile either to God or man. We must leave all our sins, and depart from evil, evil works and evil workers; nay, not only depart from evil, but do good; good for ourselves, especially for our souls, and, as we have ability and opportunity, to others also. Because nothing is more contrary to that love which never fails, which is the summary both of law and gospel, than strife and contention, which bring confusion and every evil work; we must seek peace and pursue it; show a peaceable disposition, study the things that make for peace, do nothing to break the peace, and to make mischief. If peace seem to flee from us, we must pursue it; spare no pains, no expense, to preserve and recover it, be willing to deny ourselves a great deal, both in honor and interest, for peace-sake. These excellent directions in the way to life and good, are transcribed into the N. T. and made part of our gospel-duty, 1 Pet. 3: 10, 11. And perhaps David, in warning us that we speak no guile, reflects on his own sin, in changing his behavior. They that truly repent of what they have done amiss, will warn others to take heed of doing likewise.

III. He enforces these directions, by setting before us the happiness of the godly in the love and favor of God, and the miserable state of the wicked under his displeasure. Here are life and death, good and evil, the blessing and the curse, plainly stated before us, that we may choose life, and live. See Isa. 3: 10, 11. It is very well observed by Dr. Hammond, that the evil here, which slays the wicked, (v. 21.) is the same word, in the singular number, that is used, v. 19. for the afflictions of the righteous, to intimate that godly people have many troubles; which yet do them no hurt, but are made to work for good to them; whereas, wicked people have fewer troubles, perhaps but one, and yet that one may prove their utter ruin. One trouble, with a curse in it, kills and slays; but many, with a blessing in them, are harmless, nay, gainful. The wicked often hate the righteous, name and thing; but shall be desolate, condemned as guilty, and laid waste for ever, forsaken and abandoned of God, and all good angels, and men; and those that are so are desolate indeed.

Yet, say to the righteous, it shall be well with them; all good people are under God's special favor and protection. We are here assured of that, under a great variety of instances and expressions, v. 15. to direct and guide them, to protect and keep them. Parents that are very fond of a child, will not let it be out of their sight; none of God's children are ever from under his complacent, tender eye. v. 15. His ears are open to their prayers, v. 16 open to them, as the tender mother's to the cry of her nursing child, which another would not notice, v. 17. This intimates the constant practice of good people, when in distress, to cry unto God, and their constant comfort that God hears them: He is nigh for relief to them that are of a broken heart, and saves them, v. 18. Note, Here we have the character of the righteous, whose prayers God will hear; they are of a broken heart and a contrite spirit, i. e. humbled for sin, and emptied of self; low in their own eyes, and have no confidence in their own merit and sufficiency, but in God only. Those who are so have God nigh unto them, to comfort and support them, that the spirit may not be broken, more than is meet, lest it should fail before Him. See Is. 57: 15.

They are taken under the special protection of the divine government, v. 20. He keepeth all his bones; not only his soul, but his body; not only his body in general, but every bone in it, not one of them is broken. One would not expect to meet with any thing of Christ here, yet this Scripture is said to be fulfilled in Him, John 19: 36. and the promises being made good to Christ, through Him, are sure to all the seed.

They are, and shall be, delivered out of their troubles. It is supposed they have their share, perhaps a greater share than others. In the world they must have tribulation, that they may be conformed both to the will of God, and to the example of Christ; v. 19. their God loves them, and therefore corrects them, so that, between the mercy of Heaven, and the malice of hell, their afflictions must needs be many. But God has engaged for their deliverance and salvation, v. 17, 19. He saves them, v. 18, 22. Whatever troubles befall them, they shall not hurt their better part. The Lord redeemeth the soul of his servants, 49: 15. He keeps them from sinning in trouble, which is the only mischief, and keeps them from despair, and from being put out of possession of their own souls Troubles shall not hinder their everlasting bliss; none that trust in Him shall be desolate; no man is desolate, but he whom God has forsaken, nor any undone till he is in hell. God's faithful [obedient] servants are safe, and shall be happy.

In singing these vs. let us be confirmed in the choice we have made of God, quickened in his

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

It is our duty to 'bless the Lord at all times,' in pain, sickness, poverty, persecution, and even in the agonies of death.—It encourages the humble believer, and silences the proud Pharisee, when the servants of God are enabled to rejoice, and make their boast in Him, under circumstances of [trial,] extreme danger, and the deepest distress: and if our faith were strong, we might thus call on all around us to magnify and exalt our God with us, extolling his glorious excellences, and celebrating the praises of his abundant mercy. — But we should especially look to Him, 'who, though He was rich, for our sakes became poor;' and remember how He suffered, and how He is glorified, in order to save all that trust in Him.—They must be safe and happy, 'who fear the LORD.' Oh, that sinners would but make trial of his love! But even the saints need exhortations to the reverential fear of God: the more humbly and obediently they walk with Him, the happier they are. Let then all, who have themselves 'tasted that the Lord is gracious,' take delight in leading others, and especially the young, into these happy ways: by no means thinking the instruction even of little children beneath them. Let young persons set out in life with learning the fear of the Lord, if they desire true comfort here, and eternal happiness hereafter; for they are the happiest, who begin the soonest to serve so good a Master.—Nothing is more essential to true godliness, than a contrite heart, broken off from every kind of self-confidence and self-preference, and crushed down into the dust of self-abasement [before God]: in this soil every grace flourishes; and to this contrite person nothing can give encouragement, but the free mercy of the Gospel of Jesus Christ. Verse 18.

The 'broken in heart' and 'contrite in spirit,' in the language of Scripture, are not those who, being weighed down by sorrows and sufferings, through impatience and despondency sink under them; but such as are broken-hearted under a sense of their sins, and led to renounce all self-confidence. Their hearts, naturally stout, hard, and unfeeling, are humbled, softened, and made sensibly alive to the feelings of remorse, fear, shame, godly sorrow, and self-abhorrence. Their self-will also is subdued; they submit to God without plea or hope, save in his mercy and grace. They are prepared to welcome his Gospel, and exclusively possess its blessings. service, and greatly encouraged by his assurances.

Ps. XXXV. David, in this Ps. appeals to the righteous Judge of heaven and earth, against his enemies, that hated and persecuted him. It is supposed Saul and his party are the persons meant, for with them he had the greatest struggles. In singing this, and praying over it, we must take heed of applying it to any little peevish quarrels and enmities of our own, and of expressing by it any uncharitable, revengeful resentments of injuries done to us; for Christ has taught us to forgive our enemies, and not to pray against them, but to pray for them, as He did; but, 1. We may comfort ourselves with the testimony of our consciences, concerning our innocency, with reference to those that are any way injurious to us, and with hopes that God will, in his own way, and time, right us, and, in the meantime, support us. 2. We ought to apply it to the public enemies of Christ, and his kingdom, typified by David and his kingdom, to resent the indignities done to Christ's honor, to pray to God to plead the just and injured cause of Christianity and serious godliness, and to believe that God will, in due time, glorify his own name in the ruin of all the irreconcilable enemies of his church, that will not repent, to give Him glory.

V. 1—10. In these vs. we have,

I. David's representation of his case to God, setting forth the restless, unwearied rage and malice of his persecutors; no less than his life, (v. 4.) would satisfy their bloody minds; they treated him as a dangerous beast of prey, digged a pit for him, and laid a net in it, v. 7. Saul, especially, was too strong for him, v. 10. having the army at his command, and carrying, not a sceptre, but a javelin, in his hand, to cast at any man that stood in his way; such was the manner of the king, and all about him were compelled to do as he bade them, right or wrong: comp. Saul's power, 1 Sam. 22: 7. with David's, 1 Sam. 22: 2. If the kings of the earth set themselves against the Lord and his Anointed, who can contend with them? Note, It is no new thing, for the most righteous men, and the most righteous cause, to meet with many mighty and malicious enemies: Christ Himself is striven with, and fought against, and war is made upon the holy seed; nor are we to marvel; it is a fruit of the old enmity in the seed of the serpent, against the seed of the woman.

II. His appeal to God concerning his integrity, and the justice of his cause. If a fellow subject had wronged him, he might have appealed to his prince, as Paul to Cæsar; but when his prince wronged him, he appealed to his God, who is Prince and Judge of the kings of the earth, v. 1. Note, A righteous cause may, with the greatest satisfaction imaginable, be laid before a righteous God. It will be a comfort to us, when men do us wrong, if our consciences can witness for us, that we have never done them any. It was so to Paul, Acts 25: 10. We are apt to justify our uneasiness at the injuries men do us by this, That we never gave them any cause; whereas this should, more than any thing, make us easy, for then we may the more confidently expect God will plead our cause.

III. His prayer to God to manifest Himself both for him, and to him, in this trial. 1. For him, v. 1, 2. This prayer we may put up against our persecutors, that God would restrain them, and stop their way. 2. To him; 'Say unto my soul, I am thy salvation; let me have inward comfort under all these outward troubles, to support my soul. Let God be my salvation, not only my Savior out of my present troubles, but my everlasting Bliss. And let me have the comfortable assurance of it in my own breast.' If God, by his Spirit, witness to our spirits, that He is our Salvation, we have enough, we need no more, to make us happy; and this is a powerful support in persecution.

IV. His prospect of the destruction of his enemies, which he prays for, not in malice or revenge; he who was so meek as to bear Shimei's curses, cannot be supposed to give vent to any intemperate heat or passion in his devotion; but, by the spirit of prophecy, he foretells the just judgments of God, that would come on them for their great wickedness, their malice, cruelty, and perfidiousness, and especially their enmity to the counsels of God, the interests of religion, and that reformation they knew David, if ever he had power, would be an instrument of. They seemed to be hardened in their sins, and to be of the number of those who have sinned unto death, and are not to be prayed for, Jer. 7: 16. 11: 14. 14: 11. 1 John 5: 16. As for Saul himself, David, it is probable, knew God had rejected him, and forbidden Samuel to mourn for him, 1 Sam. 16: 1. And these predictions look further, and read the doom of the enemies of Christ and his kingdom, as appears by comp. Rom. 11: 9, 10.

He here prays, 1. Against his many enemies, v. 4—6. Let them be confounded, &c. Or, as Hammond reads it, They shall be confounded, they shall be turned back. This may be taken as a prayer for their repentance, for all penitents are put to shame for their sins; turned back from them; or, that they might be defeated and disappointed in their designs against him, and so put to shame. Their way shall be dark and slippery, so the way of sinners is, and it will prove so at last, for their foot shall slide in due time, Deut. 32: 35. But this is not the worst; it is here foretold, the angel of the Lord shall chase them, v. 5. so that they shall find no rest; shall persecute them, v. 6. so that they cannot possibly escape the pit of destruction. God's angels encamp about them that fear him, and against them that fight against Him. They are the ministers of his justice, as well as of his mercy. 2. Against his one mighty enemy, v. 8. Let destruction come upon him: probably he means Saul. David vowed, his hand should not be upon him, he would not be judge in his own cause; but, at the same time, he foretold that the Lord the persons against whom he prays and offers his complaints.—The Syr. regards it as written on occasion of the attack of the Idumeans upon David, and the Arab. contemplates it as a prophecy of the incarnation. Others, as Morison, think there is nothing in the Ps. which may not have been applicable to David in the persecuting scenes through which he passed. Bp. Horsley thinks our Lord's sufferings are particularly pointed at in some passages, which, he says, can apply to no one else so literally and exactly. ED.

The abuses of this necessity are rife in all ages. The most enlightened, even, are prone to think God is too much like themselves. ED.]—SCOTT. Verses 4—9.

All the verbs, in these vs. in the original, are in the future, as a prediction; though they stand in most translations and paraphrases, ancient and modern, in the imperative, as an imprecation. No doubt, there are many instances, in which such denunciations stand in the form of petitions; and, considered as the language of inspired men, respecting the inveterate enemies of God, and Christ, and religion, no reasonable objection can be made against them.—It is not however desirable, to understand any passages in this sense, which more obviously express one of more general application. The vs. under consideration are simply a prediction, that David's enemies would, by their unprovoked, assiduous, and crafty devices to take away his life, bring on themselves the deepest infamy, along with unexpected and inevitable ruin; and that his trials would terminate in thanksgiving and rejoicing. (25—28. 5:10,11.)—(Note, 7:14—16.) In like manner, [as Saul,] Ahithophel and Absalom brought ruin on themselves by their counsel against David; (2 Sam. 15:31. 16:20—23. 17:1—14,23. 18:9—14.) and so did Judas, and the Jewish rulers, and the nation, by opposing Christ; of whom David, in this Ps. especially, seems to have spoken, as a type or representative. Indeed, the whole Scripture predicts the final ruin of all the impenitent enemies of God and religion, and that of Satan, their great leader: (Rev. 19:17—21. 20:1—3, 7—10.) and the intercession of Christ, the prayers of his church, and the ministration of angels, while they tend to complete the salvation and joy of his people, concur in accomplishing the prophecies which foretell the destruction of his enemies.—'A traveller, benighted in a bad road, is an expressive would smite him, 1 Sam. 26: 10. and here, that the net he had hid should catch himself; which was remarkably fulfilled in Saul's ruin, for, having laid a plot to make David fall by the hand of the Philistines, 1 Sam. 18: 25. under pretence of doing him honor, in that very net was he himself taken, when his day came to fall.

V. His prospect of deliverance, which, having committed his cause to God, he did not doubt, v. 9, 10. 1. He hoped for the comfort of it; 'My soul shall be joyful, not in mine own ease and safety, but in the Lord:' Joy in God, and in his salvation, is the only true, solid, satisfying joy. The sorrowful, who sorrow after a godly sort, shall in due time be joyful in the Lord. 2. He promised that then God should have the glory of it, v. 10. He will praise God with the whole man; praise Him as one of peerless and unparalleled perfection. Our formation so wonderful, so curious, Eccl. 11: 5. Ps. 139: 16. the serviceableness of our bones, and their preservation, constant renewal, and especially the life which we shall receive, at the resurrection, oblige every bone in our bodies, if it could speak, to say, Lord, who is like Thee? and willingly to undergo any services or sufferings for Him.

V. 11—16. Two very wicked things David here lays to the charge of his enemies, to make good his appeal to God against them; perjury and ingratitude.

I. Perjury, v. 11. False witnesses did rise up, who would swear any thing; they laid to my charge things that I knew not, nor ever thought of. Something of this kind may have taken place, when Saul wished to convict David of treason. See how much the honors, estates, liberties, and lives, even of the best men, lie at the mercy of the worst. This instance was typical, and had its accomplishment in the Son of David, against whom false witnesses did arise, Matt. 26: 60. If at any time charged with what we are innocent of, let us not think it strange, or new; so persecuted they the prophets, even the great Prophet.

II. Ingratitude. Call a man ungrateful, and you can call him no worse; David's enemies, v. 12. rewarded evil for good. Much good service he had done his king, witness his harp, Goliath's sword, the trophies from the Philistines. This is to the spoiling of his soul; this base, unkind usage robs him of his comfort, and cuts him to his heart, more than any thing else. He had not only deserved well of the public, but of those particular persons now most bitter against him. Probably, it was then well known whom he meant, it may be Saul himself for one; to others also of the courtiers, it is likely, he had showed his respect, while he lived at court, who now were most abusive. Herein he was a type of Christ, to whom this wicked world was very ungrateful, John 10: 32

1. David here shows, how much, when they were sick, he mourned for them, and sympathized with them in their grief. David was a man of war, and of a bold, stout spirit, yet was thus susceptible of the impressions of sympathy, love and pity; it was a rare composition of hardiness and tenderness, courage and compassion, in the same breast. Observe, He took on as for a brother or mother; which intimates our duty, to lay to heart the sickness, and sorrow, and death, of our near relations. Those that do not, are justly stigmatized as without natural affection. He prayed for them; he discovered not only the tender affection of a man, but the pious affection of a saint. He was concerned for their precious souls. With his prayers he joined humiliation and self-affliction; we ought to mourn for the sins of those that do not mourn for themselves. His fasting also put an edge on his praying, and was an expression of its fervor; he was so intent in his devotions, that he had no appetite to meat, nor would allow himself time for eating. 'My prayer returned into mine own bosom; I had the comfort of having done my duty, and of having approved myself a loving neighbor, though I could not thereby win on them, nor make them my friends.' We shall not lose by the good offices we have done to any, how ungrateful soever they are, for our rejoicing will be this, the testimony of our conscience

2. How basely and insolently, and with what a brutish enmity, and worse than brutish, they had carried it toward him, v. 15, 16. When he was banished the court, and persecuted as a criminal, they were pleased, and got together in their drunken clubs to make themselves merry with the disgrace of this great favorite. Well might he call them abjects, for nothing could be more vile and sordid, than to triumph in the fall of a man of such unstained honor, and consummate virtue. But this was not all; They tore him, rent his good name without mercy, said all the ill they could of him; They gnashed on him with their teeth; they never spoke of him but with the greatest indignation imaginable, as those that would have eaten him up, if they could. David was the fool in the play, and his disappointment the table-talk of the hypocritical mockers at feasts, the song of the drunkards, the comedians, whose comedies, it is likely, were acted at feasts, while the auditory, in token of their agreement with the plot, hummed. The apostles were made a spectacle to the world. David was looked upon with ill-will, for no other reason, than because he was caressed by the people. It is a vexation of spirit which

Verse 10.

(M. R. s.) Christ was raised from the dead, and not one of his bones was broken; every member of his mystical body shall be forthcoming at the general resurrection; and every believer now has, and shall then have, cause to praise the Lord for taking care of his soul and body, in every part, and in all respects. (22:16—18. 34:19, 20.)—Saul was too powerful for David in his poor and destitute condition; Christ was made poor, and a man of sorrows, and had no armed force to oppose to the power of the Jews and Romans; and Satan and other enemies are too strong for the afflicted and humble believer. SCOTT.

Verses 11, 12.

This was far more emphatically accomplished in the great Antitype. (M. R.) ID.

Verses 13, 14.

The nature of fasting, as an occasional, voluntary act of self-abasement, submission to God under adverse dispensations, sorrow for sin as the cause of sufferings, and [healthful] self-discipline in order to self-government, is illustrated by the expression, 'I humbled,' or afflicted, or chastened, 'myself with fasting.' (Lev. 16:29—31. Matt. 9:14, 15. P. O. 9—17.) [See Lloyd on rel. Fasting.] SCOTT (15.) Returned, &c.] The original is future; 'shall return:' and as David was still conflicting with trials, and anticipating deliverance, the future best suits his case.—He thus mourned over the afflictions of Saul and of Israel, with fasting and prayer: and Christ wept over Jerusalem, and fasted, prayed, and suffered for sinners, as for a friend, a brother, or a parent; and He prayed for his crucifiers, when about to expire amidst their cruelty and contempt! SCOTT.—My prayer returned into mine own bosom.] 'I. e. 1. I frequently, daily, fasted and prayed for them in secret, and with sincere affection: so what is said to be done in the bosom, is spoken of, see Num. 11:12. Ps. 89:50. Prov. 21:14. Or, 2. (which seems to be the truest sense,) Let it return upon myself; let the all-seeing, heart-searching God grant to me, when I come into their circumstances, the same things, good or evil, that I have begged for them. This sense agrees with the most common use of the phrase, where whatever is paid to a man, is said to be rendered into his bosom.' POOLE.—May it not allude merely to the peculiarly suppliant posture (bending the head into the bosom, as is an ancient and modern oriental custom) of ardent, importunate, long-continued, prayer. ED.

Verses 15, 16.

All this was far more emphatically true of Christ, and the treatment He met from the hypocritical Jews, and from the most abject persons, not excepting the crucified malefactors who reviled Him on the cross. (Is. 53:2, 3. Matt. 26:63—68. 27:27—31, 39—44.)—The hypocritical priests, and scribes, who mocked Jesus, were at the same time keeping the feast of unleavened bread. SCOTT attends even a right work, that for this a man is envied of his neighbor, Eccl. 4: 4. And who can stand before envy? Prov. 27: 4.

V. 17—28. In these verses, as before,

I. David describes the great injustice, malice, and insolence, of his persecutors, pleading this with God, as a reason why He should protect him from them, and appear against them. 1. They were very unrighteous; hated him without a cause; nay, for that for which they ought rather to have loved and honored him. This is quoted with application to Christ, and is said to be fulfilled in Him, John 15: 25. 2. They were very rude; could not find in their hearts to show him common civility; like Joseph's brethren, that could not speak peaceably to him. 3. They were very proud and scornful, v. 21. They shouted and huzzaed when they saw his fall; they bawled after him, when he was forced to quit the court, 'Aha, aha, this is the day we longed to see.' 4. They were very barbarous and base, and trampled on him when down, v. 26. Thus, when the Son of David was run upon by the rulers, the fickle people cried, Crucify Him, crucify Him. 5. They set themselves against all the sober, good people that adhered to David, v. 20. They devised deceitful matters, to trepan and ruin them that are quiet in the land. Note, (1.) It is the character of good people, that they are quiet; live in all dutiful subjection to government and governors, in the Lord, and endeavour, as much as in them lies, to live peaceably with all men, however they have been misrepresented as enemies to Cæsar, and hurtful to kings and provinces. I am for peace, 120: 7. (2.) Though the people of God are, and study to be, a quiet people, yet it has been the common practice of their enemies to devise deceitful matters against them, Dan. 6: 4, &c. They that hated David, thought scorn, like Haman, to lay hands on him alone, but contrived to involve all the religious people of the land in the same ruin.

II. He appeals to God against them, the God to whom vengeance belongs; appeals to his knowledge, v. 22. This Thou hast seen. They had falsely accused him, but God, who knows all things, knew he did not falsely accuse them, nor make them worse than really they were. They carried on their plots against him with great secrecy, v. 15 He appeals to God's justice, v. 23. See this explained by Solomon, 1 K. 8: 31, 32.

III. He prays earnestly to God, to appear graciously for him and his friends, against his and their enemies, that by his providence the struggle might issue to the honor and comfort of David, and to the conviction and confusion of his persecutors.

1. He prays that God would act for him, and not stand by as a spectator, v. 17. 'Lord, how long wilt Thou look on? how long suffer the wickedness of the wicked? It is my soul that is in danger, Lord, rescue it; it is thine, save it! Lord, keep not silence, as if thou didst consent to what is done against me! Lord, be not far from me, v. 22 as if I were a stranger that Thou art not concerned for; let not me be beheld afar off, as the proud are.'

2. He prays that his enemies might not have cause to rejoice, v. 19. and again, v. 24. not so much because it would be a mortification to him to be trampled on by the abjects, but because it would dishonor God, and reproach his confidence in God; harden them in their wickedness, and confirm them in their enmity to Him, and be a great discouragement to all the pious Jews that were friends to his righteous cause. He prays he might never be in such imminent danger, that they should say in their hearts, Ah, so would we have it, v. 25. much more that he might not be reduced to such extremity, that they should say, We have swallowed him up. But, on the contrary, that they might be ashamed and brought to confusion together, v. 26. as before, v. 4. he desires his innocency might be so cleared, and his interest so confirmed, that they might be ashamed of their designs and expectations; either brought to that shame which would be a step to their reformation, or [lasting misery.]

3. He prays that his friends might have cause to rejoice, and give glory to God, v. 27. notwithstanding. Note, God has pleasure in the prosperity of good people, both temporal and spiritual, and delights not in their griefs; He does not afflict at their feasts, by buffoons. Qu. were these, among the Hebrews, ever masked? Roberts says, on Job 16:9,10. (see note there,) that showing, and gnashing the teeth, like a wild beast, is a method of displaying anger still common in the E. May not the verse then allude to pantomimes of mock respect, grimaces, jests and songs of court buffoons, perhaps grotesquely masked, during hours of festal ribaldry, when the worst passions were excited by intemperance? ED.

(22:7—24. The exact agreement of the language used in these vs. with that of the passage referred to, favors the opinion that this Ps. also is a direct prophecy of the Messiah. SCOTT.

(17.) My soul—my darling.] 'If my soul denotes David's life, the life of his body; perhaps my darling may refer to the mind, as in a lonely, afflicted state, suffering grievously from the evil reproaches of men, relentless and powerful as lions. Or, perhaps, the rendering of GREEN may at once obviate all the difficulties. "How long, O Lord, wilt thou look on? Oh rescue my life from their destruction, And my helpless person from the lions."' MORISON.

(18.) 'If in this and the preceding vs. there is any distant prophetic allusion to the Messiah, it is more than probable that the scene here anticipated is the triumph of Christianity in the Roman Empire, after the resurrection of Christ, and the outpouring of the Spirit.' MOR. 'Is not this an indirect prediction of the establishment of Christianity among the mighty people—i. e. the Roman Empire?' HORSLEY.

V. 20. 'David would have lived quietly under the government of Saul: our Lord did not aim at temporal sovereignty; . . . nor did the primitive Christians desire to intermeddle with the politics of the world: yet all were betrayed, mocked, and persecuted, as rebels, and usurpers, and the pests of society.' Bp. Horne. SCOTT

Verses 21, 22.

They 'boldly accuse me as a traitor, . . . saying, So, so, we have found him out.' Patrick.—The appeal to God, the ever present Witness of his conduct, and the prayer grounded on it, have a peculiar energy, when viewed in connection with the preceding v. (40:13—17. Matt. 26:63—68.) ID.

(21.) Note, Job 16: 10. 'See that rude fellow who has triumphed over another, he distends his mouth to the utmost, then claps his hands, and bawls out that most provoking expression, "Aga! Aga! I have seen, I have seen."' Roberts. ED.

Verses 26—28.

These vs. (24 and 25 remaining in the imperative mood,) may be thus rendered, 'They shall be ashamed and confounded together, who rejoice in my shame. They shall be clothed with shame and dishonor, that magnify themselves against me. They will shout for joy and be glad, that favor my righteous cause, &c.' V. 28 is rendered in the future tense, and the two preceding vs. might, with equal propriety, and perhaps more energy, be tr. in the same manner. The clamor against David, as cursing his enemies, when considered as an objection to the Scriptures, is indeed irrational; for it assumes the point in question, and determines that he spake in his own spirit, and not 'as moved by the Holy Spirit;' yet it is not desirable to give needless occasion even to irrational and impious objections. (M. R.)—How applicable is the whole passage to the Savior's sufferings and triumphs, and to their consequences! (41:4—8. 56:1, 2.) SCOTT.

28 And [q] my tongue shall speak of thy righteousness and of thy praise all the day long.

PSALM XXXVI.

The corrupt principles and practices of wicked men, 1—4. An admiring view of the mercy and justice of God, and of the felicity of his people, 5—9. David prays for his brethren and himself; and in faith triumphs over the workers of iniquity, 10—12.

To the chief Musician, A Psalm of David, [a] the servant of the LORD.

[b] THE transgression of the wicked saith within my heart, that there is [c] no fear of God before his eyes.

2 For [d] he flattereth himself in his own eyes, * until his iniquity be found to be hateful.

3 [e] The words of his mouth are iniquity and deceit: [f] he hath left off to be wise, and to do good.

4 [g] He deviseth † mischief upon his bed; [h] he setteth himself in a way that is not good: he [i] abhorreth not evil.

willingly; we ought therefore to have pleasure in, and not envy, their prosperity, but acknowledge it, with thankfulness, to God's praise, saying, The Lord be magnified.

Lastly, The mercy he hoped to win by prayer, he promises to wear with praise, v. 18. and this, 1. Publicly, as one that took pleasure in owning his obligations; so far from being ashamed of them, he will do it in the great congregation, and among much people, that God might be honored, and many edified. 2. Constantly; he will speak God's praise every day, so it may be read, and all the day long, for it is a subject that will never be exhausted, no not by the endless praises of saints and angels.

Ps. XXXVI. It is uncertain when, and on what occasion, David penned this Ps. probably when struck at, either by Saul, or Absalom; for in it he complains of his enemies' malice, but triumphs in God's goodness. If, in singing it, our hearts be duly affected with hatred of sin, and satisfaction in God's loving kindness, we sing it with grace and understanding.

V. 1—4. David, in the title, is styled the servant of the Lord; why in this, and no other, except in 18. (title,) no reason can be given; but so he was, not only as every good man is, but as a king, as a prophet, as one employed in serving the interests of God's kingdom among men, more immediately, and more eminently, than any other in his day. He glories in it, 116: 16. It is the highest preferment a man is capable of in this world.

These vs. describe the wickedness of the wicked, whether his persecutors in particular, or all notorious, gross sinners, in general, is not certain. But we have here sin in its root, and in its branches.

I. The root.

1. Contempt of God, and want of a due regard to Him, v. 1. 'The transgression of the wicked, v. 3, 4. makes me to conclude, that there is no fear of God before his eyes, for if there were, he would not talk and act as he does. The wicked did not openly renounce the fear of God, but their transgression whispered it secretly to the minds of all that knew any thing of the nature of piety and impiety.

2. Conceit, and a cheat wilfully put on the soul, v. 2. While the wicked man goes on in sin, he thinks he does wisely and well for himself, calls evil good, and good evil. If his own conscience threaten him, he says, God will not require it, I shall have peace though I go on. Sinners are self-destroyers, by being self-flatterers; Satan could not deceive them, did they not deceive themselves. But the cheat will not last always. Iniquity is a hateful thing; that abominable thing the Lord hates, and which his pure and jealous eye cannot endure to look upon; hurtful to the sinner himself, and therefore ought to be hateful, though it is not; yet when conscience is convinced, and sin appears in its true colors, then their iniquity will be found hateful, and their self-flattery their unspeakable folly, and an aggravation of their condemnation.

II. The branches. The sinner defies God, and even defies himself, and then what can be expected, but that he should go all to naught? These two were the first inlets of sin. Men do not fear God, therefore they flatter themselves; and then, 1 They make no conscience of what they say, true or false, right or wrong, v. 3. It is no marvel, if those that deceive themselves contrive how to deceive all others; for whom will they be true to, that are false to their own souls? 2. What little good there has been in them is gone; they have left off to be wise, and to do good. They that leave off to do good, leave off to be wise. 3. PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The believer is admitted into a covenant of friendship with his God: and they who strive with him, fight against his omnipotent Ally; whose presence and assistance will effectually defend his servants.—We must not desire the ruin of any enemies, except our lusts, and those evil spirits who would compass our destruction: yet we ought fervently and constantly to pray for the desolation of all the inveterate enemies of Christ our anointed King. Assuredly, they will at length be thrown as chaff into the fire; yea, driven in a dark and slippery path, by the angels of God into the bottomless pit: and their crafty and unwearied enmity, against the Holy Jesus and his harmless followers, will involve them in unexpected and inevitable misery. Let then the persecuted and afflicted believer rejoice in the salvation of the Lord. His preservation is ensured by the Savior's resurrection and exaltation; who will shortly 'change our vile bodies, and make them like his own glorious body,' by his almighty power.—While in faith we anticipate this glorious event of our trials, let us prepare for the cross in this world. When we consider the ingratitude, contempt, and hatred, with which the holy Jesus was treated, in return for his unspeakable love; let us learn to possess our souls in patience and meekness; like Him, let us persevere in praying for our enemies, and attempting to do them good: and acting towards them with compassion and affection, in hopes of 'overcoming evil with good.' And let us chiefly fear lest they should rejoice at beholding us betrayed into sin, and disgracing our profession. Then indeed those, who hate us without cause, would wink with their eyes, encouraging each other's blasphemies; and open wide their mouths to proclaim our infamy, to the reproach of our religion. This the Lord knows, and as his glory is concerned, let us call upon Him, entreating Him not to be far from us; but constantly to uphold us, that Satan and his servants may not thus magnify themselves against us. In all things let us act conscientiously, and leave our cause with God. SCOTT.

NOTES.

Ps. XXXVI. This Ps., Rosenm. remarks, resembles the 12th and 14th, though not synchronical with them. The time and occasion of it seem not to be agreed upon. Most think it was on occasion of Saul's persecution of David, and Patrick supposes at the beginning of it. Dr A. Clarke, on the other hand, after Calmet, supposes it was written during the Babylonish captivity; but Morison justly observes, that it is wanting both in the pensiveness and national feeling which run through the ascertained compositions of that interesting period of Jewish history. He thinks it not without reason, therefore, that both the Syr. and Arab. connect it with the mournful event of Saul's persecution, though the particular occasion or time is not easily determined. Dr. A. Clarke says, it is one of the finest Pss. in the whole collection. Poole considers it as embracing in its view, not David merely, with Saul and his courtiers, but the state and condition of the world and of the church at that time, in which wickedness of all sorts greatly abounded and seemed to prosper. ED.

Verse 1.

The Ps. seems to have been written, soon after Saul began to show his hatred to David. SCOTT.—'The depravity here represented as uttering a distinct language, must not be supposed, as the text would suggest, to be speaking within the heart of the Psalmist.' MORISON.—But 'the meaning, if the present reading be the true one, must be this—The transgressions of a bad man show plainly, in the apprehension of a good one, that the former is destitute of a true fear of God.' Bp. HORNE. Morison, however, remarks, that we may, on the best authority, [that of the Sept. and several of the old trs.] substitute his for my before heart; and the meaning will be this—'Depravity, or wickedness in the heart of the ungodly, is ready to say, "there is nothing to fear in a course of rebellion against God." And thus it may be truly said, that "God is not before their eyes." ' So he would render it, "Depravity said to the wicked, within his heart. There is no fear: God is not before his eyes." ' ED.

Verse 2.

Thus Saul's self-flattery kept him from being aware of the malignity of his conduct, till he became odious in the open view of mankind. (1 Sam. 15:13—28. 22:6—19. 1 Chr. 10:13, 14.) SCOTT.

Verses 3, 4.

Saul, in the beginning of his reign, behaved wisely, and performed good services to his people: but he soon began to act foolishly, and to disobey God; and at length he entirely ceased to use his understanding to do good. (1 Sam. 11: 28:3—10.) He became a treacherous and cruel persecutor of David: and while he perhaps ascribed his conduct in throwing his javelin at him, to a sudden paroxysm of disease; David was aware that he most deliberately, and in his retired hours, plotted his destruction; and had no aversion in his heart to any wickedness, however abominable, though he tried to cloke his malice by plausible professions. that will be drawn, into sin, and with respect to those that will not, to draw them into trouble. It is bad to do mischief, but worse to devise it, to do it deliberately and with resolution, with plot and management; with the subtlety, as well as the malice, of the old serpent; to devise it on the bed, where we should be meditating on God and his Word, Mic. 2: 1. This argues the sinner's heart fully set in him to do evil. 4. Having entered the way of sin, they persist in it. 5. Doing evil themselves, they have no dislike at all of it in others, but, on the contrary, are glad to see others as bad as themselves. Or, this may bespeak their impenitency in sin; these hardened sinners have such seared, stupified consciences, that they never reflect on their sins afterward with any regret, abhorrence, or remorse, but stand to what they have done, as if they could justify it before God Himself.

Some think David, in all this, particularly means Saul, who had cast off the fear of God, and left off all goodness; who pretended kindness to him, when he gave him his daughter to wife, but, at the same time, was devising mischief. But we are under no necessity of limiting ourselves so in the exposition; there are too many among us to whom the description agrees, which is to be greatly lamented.

V. 5—12. I. David's meditations; having looked round with grief on the wickedness of the wicked, he here looks up with comfort to the goodness of God; a subject as delightful as the former was distasteful, and very proper to balance against it. However it be, yet Thou art good. He here acknowledges,

1. The transcendent perfections of the Divine Nature. Among men, we have often reason to complain, There is no truth or mercy, Hos. 4: 1. no judgment nor justice, Isa. 5: 7. But all these may be found in God, without the least alloy.

(1.) God's inexhaustible goodness; Thy mercy, O Lord, is in the heavens. How bad soever the world is, let us never think the worse of God, or of his government; but admire his patience, that He bears so much with those that so imprudently provoke Him; nay, and causes his sun to shine, and his rain to fall, on them. If God's mercy were not infinitely above the mercies of any creature, He would, long ere this, have drowned the world again. See Is. 55: 8, 9. Hos. 11: 9. (2.) God's inviolable truth; Thy faithfulness reaches unto the clouds. God suffers the wicked to do a great deal of mischief, yet He is, and will be, faithful to his threatenings against sin; He is faithful also to his covenant with his people, one jot or tittle of the promises of which can never be broken by all the malice of earth and hell. This is matter of great comfort, that the words of the Lord are pure. (3.) He is a God of incontestable justice and equity; Thy righteousness is like the great mountains, so immovable and inflexible itself; and so conspicuous and evident to all the world; no truth more certain or more plain, 97: 2. (4.) He is a God of unsearchable wisdom and design; 'Thy judgments are a great deep, not to be fathomed by any finite understanding.' As his power is sovereign, so his method is mysterious, and cannot be accounted for by us; His way is in the sea, and his path in the great waters. What He does, it is time enough to know hereafter.

2. The universal care and beneficence of Providence; 'Thou preservest man and beast, not only protectest, but suppliest them.' Let us not wonder God gives food to bad men, for He feeds the brute-creatures; and let us not fear but He will provide well for good men; He that feeds the young lions will not starve his own children.

3. The peculiar favor of God to the saints: such as are allured, by the excellency of God's loving-kindness, to put their trust under the shadow of his wings, v. 7. Those know not God, that do not admire his loving-kindness; and those know not themselves that do not earnestly covet it. It was the character of proselytes, that they came to trust under the wings of the God of Israel, Ruth 2: 12. and what more proper to gather proselytes, than the excellency of his loving-kindness? What more powerful to engage our entire confidence, our complacency to Him and on Him? Happy, thrice happy, the people whose God is the Lord, for in Him they have, or may have, or shall have, a complete happiness. Their desires shall be answered, v. 8. their capacities filled: in God all-sufficient they shall have enough, all that which an enlightened, enlarged soul can desire or receive. A gracious soul, though still desiring more of God, never desires more than God. The gifts of Providence so far satisfy them, that they are content with such things as they have, Phil. 4: 18. But the full, the abundant satisfaction is reserved for the future state. Every vessel will be full there. These pleasures are, as a river, full and constant: and being purely spiritual, they are of the same nature with those of the glorious inhabitants of the upper world, and bear some analogy even to the delights of the Eternal Mind. Rev. 22: 1. Ps. 16: 11.

God is the Fountain of eternal life; the happiness of glorified saints consists in the vision and fruition of Him, and in the immediate communications of his love, without interruption or fear of cessation, v. 9. In Him they have light in perfection, wisdom, knowledge, and joy; all included in this light: In thy light we shall see light, i. e. 'In the knowledge of Thee in grace, and the vision of Thee in glory, we shall have what will abundantly suit and satisfy our understandings.' 1 Cor 13: 12. 1 John 3: 2. 'In communion with Thee now, by the communications of thy grace to us, and the return of our devout affections to Thee, and in the fruition of Thee shortly in heaven, we shall have complete felicity and satisfaction.'

II. We have here David's prayers, intercessions, and holy triumphs, grounded on these meditations.

1. He intercedes for all saints, v. 10; (1.)

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Those who are advanced to eminent stations should glory to fill them up, as serving God and his church in them.—Men's actions speak more plainly than their words; and when they commit atrocious crimes without remorse, or habitually live in the practice of any sin, we may be sure, 'that there is no fear of God before their eyes;' and that they habitually despise his favor, and defy his wrath.—Let us then daily beg of God to preserve us from self-flattery, and to bring us acquainted with our own character, that we may judge and condemn ourselves, and not finally be condemned at his tribunal.—If we willingly banish holy meditations, in our solitary hours, nay, if we do not encourage them, Satan will soon occupy our minds with polluting and mischievous imaginations: and if any yield frequently to sudden temptations, they will at length deliberately 'devise mischief on their beds.'—Whatever be a man's outward conduct, if he do not 'abhor evil,' he is no true penitent: and if he do not set himself heartily to walk in the ways of godliness, he will soon return into the more direct road to temporal and eternal destruction.—They must be happy, who have access to 'the Fountain of life.' (Rev. 21:5—8. 22:1.) Indeed God is the Source of felicity; but fallen man has forsaken Him and is miserable. In Christ, however, this Fountain is accessible; 'wells of salvation' are opened for us by the Gospel; and sinners, returning to God according to it, see and enjoy light and felicity, in their Source and Perfection. (Is. 12:3.)—May we then know, and love, and uprightly serve the Lord!

Those that know God, are acquainted with Him, acknowledge Him, and avouch Him for theirs: (2.) He begs for them God's loving-kindness, i. e. the tokens of his favor; and his righteousness, i. e. the workings of his grace in them; or his loving-kindness and righteousness are his goodness, according to promise; they are mercy and truth. (3.) The manner in which he desires this blessing may be conveyed; Oh continue it, draw it out, to eternity itself; the happiness of the saints in heaven will be in perfection, and yet in continual progression, as some think; the fountain always full, and the streams always flowing. In these is continuance, Is. 64: 5.

'There where they thought to have gained the point against me, they are themselves fallen; there, in the other world, (so some,) there where the saints stand in the judgment, and have a place in God's house, the workers of iniquity are cast in the judgment; we are not to rejoice, when any particular enemy of ours falls; but the final overthrow of all the workers of iniquity, will be the everlasting triumph of glorified saints.

Ps. XXXVII. This Ps. is an excellent, useful sermon, calculated not (as most of the Ps.) for our devotion, but for our conversion; there is nothing in it of prayer or praise, but it is all instruction, Maschil, a teaching; it is an exposition of some of the hardest chapters in the book of Providence, the advancement of the wicked, and the disgrace of the righteous, a solution of the difficulties that arise thereupon, and an exhortation to conduct ourselves as becomes us, under such dark dispensations. The work of the prophets, (David was one,) was to explain the law. It had promised temporal blessings to the obedient, and denounced temporal miseries against the disobedient, which principally referred to the body of the people, the nation as a nation; for, when they came to be applied to particular persons, many instances occurred of sinners in prosperity, and saints in adversity; to reconcile those instances with the word God had spoken, is the scope of the prophet in this Ps. In which, I. He forbids us to fret at the prosperity of the wicked, in their wicked ways, v. 1, 7, 8. II. He gives very good reasons why we should not. 1. Because of their scandalous character, (v. 12, 14, 21, 32.) notwithstanding their prosperity; and the honorable character of the righteous, v. 21, 26, 30, 31. 2. Because of the destruction they are nigh to, (v. 2, 9, 10, 20, 35, 36, 39.) and the salvation and protection the righteous are sure of, from all their malicious designs, v. 13, 15, 17, 28, 33, 39, 40. 3. Because of the particular mercy God has in store for all good people, and the favor He shows them, v. 11, 16, 18, 19, 22, 25, 28, 29, 37. III. He prescribes very good remedies against this sin of envying the prosperity of the wicked, and great encouragement to use those remedies, v. 3, 6, 27, 34. In singing it, we must teach and admonish one another rightly to understand God's providence, and to accommodate ourselves to it; at all times carefully to do our duty, and then patiently leave the event with God, believing that, how black soever things may look for the present, it shall be well with them that fear God.

V. 1—6. The instructions here given are very plain; but a deal is to be done to reduce them to practice, and there they will look best.

I. We are here cautioned against discontent at the prosperity and success of evil-doers, v. 1,2. We may suppose, David preaches this first to his own heart, to suppress those corrupt passions he found working there, and then leaves it in writing, for instruction to others in the like temptation. That is preached best, and with most probability of success, to others, which is first preached to ourselves. Now, 1. When we look abroad, we see the world full of evil-doers, and workers of iniquity, that flourish and prosper, that have, and do, what they will, live in ease and pomp, and have power to do mischief to those about them. So it was in David's time; therefore, if it is so still, let us not marvel, as though it were some new or strange thing. 2. When we look within, we find ourselves tempted to fret at this—to fret at God, as if He were unkind to the world, and to his church, in permitting such men to live, and prosper, and prevail, as they do. We are apt to vex ourselves at their success in their evil projects, envy them the liberty they take in getting wealth, and in the indulgence of [other] lusts, and wishing we could shake off the restraints of conscience, as they do. We are tempted to think them the only happy people, and to incline to imitate them, and to join ourselves with them, that we may share in their gains, and eat of their dainties: this is what we are warned against; Fret not, neither be envious. Fretfulness and envy are sins that are their own punishments; it is therefore in kindness to ourselves, that we are warned against them. Yet that

NOTES.

Ps. XXXVII. 'This Ps. is by common consent attributed to David, but to what scene of his life, is next to impossible to tell. Delany in his "Life of King David," thinks it was written for the consolation of Mephibosheth, under the calumny of Ziba.' MORISON. Dr. A. Clarke, followed by Greenf. and cited in the Comp. Bib. regards it as belonging to the time of the captivity. Accordingly, the green bay tree, v. 35. is with him, Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon; and so wherever any thing occurs capable of a similar reference. But, as Morison finely as well as justly observes, 'the allusions are not sufficiently specific, nor is the tone sufficiently plaintive and tender.'—The Ps. is noted as the third of the alphabetic or acrostic Pss.—Henry calls it a sermon, but Bp. Horne, 'a collection of sacred aphorisms, rather than a continued discourse,' and so Hawker. Rosenm. thinks the Psalmist's object, undoubtedly, was, to console his countrymen under the oppression of tyrannical invaders, and, at the same time, to confirm and invigorate their minds with the hope that they should, notwithstanding, still possess the land, and possess it in perpetuity, if they continued faithful and pious; the promises to which effect, he says, the Psalmist illustrates from his own observation and experience, and from the events of common life.—Horsley thinks the Messiah principally, if not exclusively, the subject of the Ps. But he seems nearly alone, in his opinion. ED.

Verses 1, 2.

It is probable, this Ps. was written towards the close of David's life, as the result of his long experience and observation, for the instruction and encouragement of others, who might be called to pass through such trying scenes, as he had been conversant with.—Every other v. in the original, begins with a letter of the Heb. alphabet, nearly in regular order: and this arrangement, which, with some variations, is frequently adopted, might be intended as a help to those, who desired to commit to memory these sacred poems, for their comfort and benefit in silence and solitude.—The Mosaic dispensation engaged peculiar temporal blessings to the nation of Israel, while obedient: yet individuals frequently prospered in wickedness, while the righteous were afflicted and persecuted. (Ps. 73:1—17.) This seemed to imply an inconsistency between the word and the providence of God, and formed a great trial to ancient believers. To this difficulty the Psalmist here gives a copious solution, with many excellent cautions and counsels, which at the same time are equally suited, by varying a few expressions, to the case of Christians. (M. R.—73:18—22. Prov. 23:17, 18. 24:19, 20.) SCOTT.

Verse 3.

This v. may be rendered: 'Trust in the LORD, and do good; dwell in the land; and feed thou verily,' or, in confidence. All the verbs are imperative.—The union between entire dependence on God, and doing good, as the way to be comfortable and happy, is peculiarly to be noticed. [Comp. notes, Job 34:36.] The land of Canaan was considered as the sum of earthly, and the type of heavenly felicity: But the words may be considered as an exhortation to the people to dwell in the land, and not to remove on every difficulty among the surrounding Gentiles; with a promise that verily God would feed them there. (Ruth 1:1—10.) SCOTT.—Verily thou shalt be fed.] 'These words have been variously understood. Ainsworth reads, "Fed by faith;" Abp. Secker, "Fed in plenty;" Parkhurst, "Fed in security:" and Gesenius, deriving the word rendered "feed," from another root, signifying "to take delight," or "to follow after," reads, "Follow after truth:" or "seek to be faithful." This reading seems excellent.' MORISON.

Verse 4.

To 'delight,' not in earthly possessions, pleasures, and distinctions, but in God; in knowing, loving, and worshipping Him, [obeying his laws, physical, animal, intellectual, moral and scriptural,] and enjoying his love, and in contemplation, devotion, and admiring praise; is to be spiritually-minded, like the inhabitants of heaven, and qualified for their felicity.—He that seeks delight in worldly objects [alone, obtains not] the wishes of his heart; but the largest and most earnest desires and requests of those who delight in God [and obey Him] will be granted, nay, far exceeded. (M. R.—Is. 58:13, 14. Hab. 3:17—19. Rom. 5:11. 8:5—9. Phil. 4:4. Col. 3:1—4. 1 Pet. 1:8, 9.) SCOTT.

is not all, for, 3. When we look forward with an eye of faith, we shall see no reason to envy wicked people their prosperity, for their ruin is at the door, and they are ripening apace for it, v. 2. Their triumphing is short, but their weeping and wailing will be everlasting.

II. We are here counselled to live a life of [obedience,] confidence, and complacency in God, that will keep us from fretting at the prosperity of evil-doers. Here are three excellent precepts, which we are to be ruled by, and, to enforce them, three precious promises, which we may rely upon.

1. We must make God our Hope in the way of duty, [obedience,] and then we shall have a comfortable subsistence in this world, v. 3. The life of religion lies much in a believing reliance on God, his favor, his providence, his promise, his grace, and a diligent care to serve Him and our generation, according to his [whole] will. We must not think to trust in God, and then live as we list; no, it is not trusting, but tempting Him, if we do not make conscience of [obedient] duty to Him; nor must we think to do good, and then to trust to ourselves, and our own righteousness and strength; no, we must both trust in the Lord, and do good. And then it is promised we shall be provided for in this world; So shalt thou dwell in the land, and verily thou shalt be fed. He does not say, 'So shalt thou get preferment, dwell in a palace, and be feasted.' This is not necessary; a man's life consists not in the abundance of these things; but, 'Thou shalt have a place to live in, and that in the land, in Canaan, the valley of vision, and thou shalt have food convenient for thee.' This is more than we deserve,—as much as a good man will indent for, Gen. 28: 20. and enough for one that is going to heaven. Thou shalt have a quiet settlement, and a comfortable maintenance; Verily thou shalt be fed, (so some read it,) fed by faith, as the just are said to live by faith. 'Verily thou shalt be fed, as Elijah in the famine, with what is needful for thee.' God Himself is a Shepherd, a Feeder, to all those that trust in Him, 23: 1. [Note, Job 36: 8—14.]

2. We must make God our heart's delight, then we shall have our heart's desire; v. 4. we must not only depend on God, but solace ourselves in Him. We were commanded, v. 3. to do good, and then follows the command, to delight in God, which is as much a privilege as a duty: with this promise annexed; He shall give thee the desires of thy heart; not gratify all the [depraved] appetites of the body, and the humors of the fancy, but all the cravings of the renewed, sanctified soul. A good man's heart's desire is, to know, [obey,] and love, and live to, God, to please Him, and to be pleased in Him.

3. We must submit in every thing to God's guidance and disposal; and then all our affairs shall issue well, v. 5, 6.

(1.) The duty is very easy; and if we do it aright, it will make us easy; Commit thy way unto the Lord; roll thy way upon the Lord, so the marg. Prov. 16: 3. Ps. 55: 22. Cast thy burden upon the Lord, the burden of thy care, [after having done our duties,] 1 Pet. 5: 7. We must roll it off ourselves, so as not to afflict and perplex ourselves with thoughts about future events, Matt. 6: 25. not be cumbered and troubled either with the means, or end, but [having done our best] refer it to God, by his wise and good providence to order and dispose of all our concerns, as He pleases; Reveal thy way unto the Lord, so the LXX. i. e. 'By prayer spread thy case, and all thy cares about it, before the Lord,' as Jephthah uttered all his words before the Lord in Mizpeh, Judg. 11: 11. 'and then trust in Him to bring it to a good issue, with a full satisfaction that all is well that God does.' We must do our duty, that must be our care, and then leave the event with God; Sit still, and see how the matter will fall, Ruth 3: 18. We must follow Providence, not force it.

(2.) The promise is very sweet. 'He shall bring that to pass, whatever [good thing] it is, which thou hast committed to Him, if not to thy contrivance, yet to thy content.' In particular, 'He will take care of thy reputation, and bring thee out of thy difficulties, not only with comfort, but with credit and honor, v. 6. 'He shall make it to appear, that thou art an honest man, and that is honor enough.' The righteousness and judgment of good people, may, for a time, be clouded and eclipsed, but God will, in due time, roll away their reproach, clear up their innocency, and bring forth their righteousness, to their honor; perhaps in this world, at farthest, in the great day, Matt. 13: 43. Note, If we take care to keep a good conscience, we may leave it to God to take care of our good name.

V. 7—20. In these verses, we have,

I. The foregoing precepts inculcated.

1. Let us compose ourselves by believing in God, v. 7. be well reconciled to all He does, and acquiesce in it, for that is best that is, because it is what God has appointed; and be well satisfied that He will still make all to work for good to us, though we know not how or which way. 'Be silent to the Lord,' so the word is; not with a sullen, but a submissive silence.

2. Let us not discompose ourselves at what we see in this world. 'If thy heart begins to rise at it, stroke down thy folly, and cease from anger, v. 8. check the first stirrings of discontent and envy, and do not harbor any hard thoughts of God and his providence; be not angry at any thing that God does, but forsake that worst kind of wrath. Fret not thyself in any wise to do evil.' Note, A fretful, discontented spirit lies open to many temptations; and those that indulge it [do evil, and] are in danger of doing [more].

II. The foregoing reasons, taken from the approaching ruin of the wicked, notwithstanding their prosperity, and the real happiness of the righteous, notwithstanding their troubles, are here much enlarged upon, and the same things repeated in a pleasing variety of expression. We are cautioned, v. 7. not to envy the wicked either worldly prosperity, or their success against the righteous. The reasons here given respect these two temptations severally.

1. Their worldly prosperity. (1.) Because it will soon end, v. 9. What they have got by sin, will not only flow away from them, Job 20: 28. but they shall be carried away with it, v. 10. 73: 17. they are brought into desolation in a moment, 83: 19. Have then a little patience, the Judge stands before the door, Jam. 5: 8, 9. Moderate your passion, for the Lord is at hand, Phil. 4: 5. To the same purport, v. 20. The wicked shall perish; their death is their perdition, the period of all their joy, and a passage to endless misery. Their prosperity, which gratifies their sensuality, is like the fat of lambs, not solid or substantial; and when their ruin comes, they shall fall as sacrifices to the justice of God, and be consumed as the fat of the sacrifices was on the altar. Is. 34: 6. Mark 9: 49. This is a good reason; while fed to the full, they are but in the fattening for the sacrifice, like a lamb in a large place, Hos. 4: 16. and the more they prosper, the more will God be glorified in their ruin. (2.) Because the condition of the righteous, even in this life, is every way better, and more desirable, v. 16. Observe, The wealth of the world is so dispensed by the Divine Providence, that it is often the lot of good people to have but a little of it, and of wicked people to have abundance of it; but [cares and wants increase in proportion as wealth increases, and] a godly man's little is really better than a wicked man's much; see Prov. 15: 16, 17.—16: 8.—28: 6. It is better, for it comes from a better hand, is better enjoyed and by a better title; God gives it to them by promise, Gal. 3: 18. it is theirs by virtue of their relation to Christ, who is the Heir of all things; and it is put to a better use; [being applied with wiser economy to the gratification of nobler wants,] it is sanctified to them by the blessing of God; unto the pure all things are pure, Tit. 1: 15.

The promises here to the righteous, secure such a happiness that they need not envy them.

[1.] They shall inherit the earth, so far as Infinite Wisdom sees good for them, 1 Tim. 4: 8. All is theirs, 1 Cor. 3: 21, 22. They have it by inheritance, a safe and honorable title, not by permission only and connivance: the wealth of the sinner is laid up for the just, Job 17: 17. Prov. 13: 22. This promise is here made, 1st. To those that live a life of [obedient] faith, v. 9. that wait on the Lord, as dependants on Him, expectants from Him, and supplicants to Him. 2dly. To those that live a quiet and peaceable life, v. 11. The meek shall inherit the earth. They are in least danger of being injured and disturbed in the possession of what they have; and have most satisfaction in themselves, and consequently the sweetest relish of their creature-comforts. Our Savior has made this a gospel promise, and a confirmation of the blessing He pronounced on the meek, Matt. 5: 5.

[2.] That they shall delight themselves in the abundance of peace, v. 11. inward peace and tranquility of mind, peace with God, and then peace in God, that great peace which they have that love God's law, whom nothing shall offend, 119: 165. that abundance of peace which is in the kingdom of Christ, 72: 7. that peace which the world cannot give, John 14: 27. and which the wicked cannot have, Isa. 57: 21. In this they shall have a continual feast; while they that have abundance of wealth do but cumber and perplex themselves with it, and have little delight in it.

[3.] That God knows their days, v. 18. He takes particular notice of them, all they do, all that happens to them. He knows their fair days, and has pleasure in their prosperity; knows their dark days of affliction, and, as the day is, so shall the strength be. [4.] That their inheritance shall be for ever. God gives them the blessings of every day in its day; but it was never intended their inheritance should be confined within the limits of their days on earth; no, it must be the portion of an immortal soul, and therefore must last as long as that lasts, and run parallel with eternity itself. They that are sure of an everlasting inheritance in the other world, have no reason to envy the wicked their transitory possessions and pleasures in this. [5.] That, in the worst of times, it shall go well with them, v. 19. They shall not be ashamed of their hope and confidence in God, nor of their profession of religion; for the comfort of that will stand them in stead, and be a real support to them, in evil times. If they should be hardly bestead and hungry, they shall not, as the wicked do, fret themselves, and curse their being and their God, Isa. 8: 21. but rejoice in God as the God of their salvation, even when the fig-tree does not blossom, Hab. 3: 17, 18.

2. The good have no reason to fret at the occasional success of the designs of the wicked against the just; though they bring some, which makes us fear they will bring them all to pass, yet let us cease from anger, and not think of giving up. For,

(1.) Their plots will be their shame, v. 12, 13. It is true, there is a rooted enmity in the wicked against the righteous; their aim is, if they can, to destroy their righteousness; if that fail, then to destroy them. With this in view, they plot, they practise against the just; but by all this they do but make themselves ridiculous; the Lord shall laugh at them, 2: 4, 5. Men have their day now; this is your hour, Luke 22: 53. But God will have his day shortly, a day of recompenses, a day which will set all to rights, and render that ridiculous which now passes for glorious, 1 Cor. 4: 3.—Isa. 37: 22.

(2.) Their attempts will be their destruction, v. 14, 15. Barbarous are their designs against good people. Uprightness itself is no fence against their malice. But, how justly their malice recoils on themselves; their sword shall turn into their own heart; which implies the preservation of the righteous from them, and the filling up of the measure of their own iniquity by it. Sometimes that very evil design they projected, proves their own destruction; however, God's sword, which their provocations have drawn, will give them their death's wound.

(3.) Those that are not suddenly cut off, shall yet be so disabled to do farther mischief, that the interests of the church shall be effectually secured; v. 15. the instruments of their cruelty shall fail them, and they shall lose those whom they had made tools of, to serve their bloody purposes with; nay, their arms shall be broken, so that they shall not be able to go on with their enterprises. But the Lord upholds the righteous, so that they neither sink under their afflictions, nor are crushed by the violence of their enemies. He upholds them, both in their integrity, and in their prosperity; and they that are so upheld by the Rock of ages, have no reason to envy the wicked the support of their broken reeds.

V. 21—33. These verses are much to the same purport with the foregoing. Observe,

I. What is required of us, as the way to our happiness; which we may learn both from the characters, and the directions here given.

1. We must make conscience of giving every body his own; for the wicked borroweth, and payeth not again, v. 21. It is the first thing God requires of us, that we do justly, and render to all their due. It is not only a shameful, paltry thing, but a sinful, wicked thing, not to repay what we have borrowed. Some make this an instance, not so much of the wickedness of the wicked, as of the misery and poverty to which they are reduced by the just judgment of God, that they shall be necessitated to borrow for their supply, and then be in no capacity to repay again, and so lie at the mercy of their creditors. Whatever some seem to think of it, as it is a great sin for those that are able, to deny the payment of their just debts, so it is a great misery not to be able to pay them.

2. We must be ready to all acts of charity and beneficence; for as it is an instance of God's goodness to the righteous, that He puts it into the power of his hand to be kind, and to do good, (so some understand it,) so it is an instance of the goodness of the righteous man, that he has a heart

Some savages have been said to sit on the ground, and bending their bow with their feet raised in the air, to use both hands, to poise the arrow and draw the string; thus availing themselves of the 'full strength' of all their limbs. Verses 16, 17.

The little, which is allotted to the righteous, comes from special covenanted love, and is secured by faithful promises; it is given in answer to their prayers, and in the use of lawful means; it is received with thankfulness, and used with temperance and charity; and being attended with a blessing, it subserves the salvation of their souls: and in all these, and many other respects, it is far more comfortable and profitable, than the ill-gotten or abused riches of ungodly men: (Prov. 30:7—9. Matt. 6:11. 1 Tim. 6:6—10.)—'The great question is, whether God be with us, or against us; and the great misfortune is, that this question is seldom asked.' *Bp. proportionable to his estate; he shows mercy, and gives, v. 21. Giving and lending are then acceptable to God, when from a merciful disposition in the heart, which, if it be sincere, will be constant, and keep us from being weary of well-doing. He that is truly benevolent will be ever so.

3. We must leave our sins, and engage in the practice of serious godliness, v. 27. Depart from evil, and do good; cease to do evil, and abhor it; learn to do well, and cleave to it. This is true religion.

4. We must abound in good discourse, with our tongues glorify God, and edify others. It is part of the righteous man's character, see v. 30. that his mouth speaketh wisdom; not only he speaks wisely, but wisdom, like Solomon himself, for the instruction of those about him. Out of the abundance of a good heart will the mouth speak what is good, and to the use of edifying.

5. We must have our wills brought into entire subjection to God's will and word, v. 31. in vain do we pretend God is our God, if we do not receive his laws into our hearts, and resign ourselves to their government. It is but a jest and mockery to speak wisdom, and talk of judgment, v. 30. unless we have the law in our hearts, and [act and] think as we speak. The law of God must be a commanding, ruling principle in the heart; a light, a spring there; and then the conversation will be regular and uniform, none of his steps will slide; it will effectually prevent backsliding into sin, and the consequent uneasiness.

II. What is assured to us, as instances of our happiness and comfort, on these conditions.

1. The blessing of God, and that blessing the spring, sweetness, and security, of all our temporal comforts and enjoyments, v. 22. Creature-comforts are then comforts indeed, when we see them flowing from God's blessing, favor, promise, and covenant with us; and if sure of God's blessing, we are sure not to want any thing good for us in this world.

2. God will direct and dispose of our actions and affairs, so as may be most for his glory, v. 23. The steps of a good man are ordered by the Lord; by his grace and holy Spirit, He directs the thoughts, affections, and designs, of good men; by his providence he overrules the events that concern them, so as to make their way plain before them, both what they should do, and may expect. Observe, God orders the steps of a good man; not only his way in general, by his written Word, but his particular steps, by the whispers of conscience; for the Lord knows with favor the way of the righteous.

3. God will keep us from being ruined by our falls either into sin or into trouble, v. 24. A good man may be overtaken in a fault, but the grace of God shall recover him to repentance; he may, for a time, lose the joys of God's salvation, yet they shall be restored; and though he may be in distress, his affairs embarrassed, his spirits sunk, yet he shall not be utterly cast down; God will be the Strength of his heart, and uphold him with his comforts.

4. He shall not want the necessary supports of this life, v. 25. David had himself begged his bread of Ahimelech the priest, but it was when Saul hunted him; and our Savior has taught us to except the case of persecution for righteousness-sake out of all the temporal promises, Mark 10:30. because that has such peculiar honors and comforts attending it, as make it rather a gift, as the apostle reckons it, Phil. 1:29. than a loss or grievance. But there are very few instances of good men, or their families, that are reduced to such extreme poverty, as many wicked people bring themselves to by their wickedness. [Notes, Job 36:8—14. 34:1.] He had not seen the righteous forsaken, nor his seed begging their bread; forsaken, so some. Some make this promise relate especially to those that are charitable and liberal to the poor, and to intimate that David never observed any that brought themselves to poverty by their charity; it is withholding more than is meet that tends to poverty, Prov. 11:24.

5. God will not desert us, but graciously protect us in our difficulties and straits, v. 28. The Lord loves judgment; He delights in doing justice Himself, and in those that do it; therefore He forsakes not his saints in affliction, when others make themselves strange to them; but takes care that they be preserved for ever, from age to age; and that particular saints be preserved from all the temptations, and through all the trials, of this present time, to that happiness which shall be for ever. He will preserve them to his heavenly kingdom; that is a preservation for ever, 2 Tim. 4:18. Ps. 12:7.

6. We shall have a comfortable settlement in this world, and in a better when we leave this: dwell for evermore, v. 27. and not be cut off, as the seed of the wicked, v. 28. That we shall inherit the land our God gives us, and dwell therein for ever, v. 29. They shall not be tossed that make God their Rest, and are at home in Him. But, it is in heaven only, the righteous shall dwell for ever.

7. We shall not become a prey to our adversaries, [within or without,] that seek our ruin, v. 32, 33. There is an adversary that takes all opportunities to do us mischief, and wicked men that are very subtle, and very spiteful: nay, it may very well be applied to the wicked one, the devil, that old serpent, who has his wiles to entrap the righteous, his devices which we should not be ignorant of. But he shall not prevail, nor his instruments. (1.) He shall not prevail. As a field-adversary; a good man may fall into the hands of a messenger of Satan, and be sorely buffeted, but God will not leave him in his hands, 1 Cor. 10:13. Nor, (2.) As a law-adversary; God will not condemn him when he is judged, though urged to it

Verses 23, 24.

Our translators here insert the word good; and no doubt the pious man, the true believer, is exclusively meant. SCOTT.—'There is no word in the original for good; this circumstance has led Green to adopt the following reading: "The steps of a man are firmly fixed By the Lord, when He delighteth in his way." ' MORISON.—(147:10, 11. 1 Sam. 2:9. Jer. 9:23, 24. Zeph. 3:14—20. Phil. 4:14—20. Heb. 13:15, 16.) SCOTT.

Verses 25, 26.

There is not indeed an absolute promise in Scripture that no righteous man shall ever want bread, or his seed become beggars: but the Psalmist had never, during a long course of observation, known an instance of the kind. It is, no doubt, a very rare case in any age, but was peculiarly so under the Mosaic dispensation.—Yet times of persecution seem excepted, from general rules concerning temporal things, having so many particular promises relating to them. But in general the godly man will best secure himself and his children from want: and that gennine liberality to the poor, in giving or lending, according as circumstances may require, which men think will impoverish their families, is in fact by far the best way of laying up a provision for them. (112:5—10. [Job 34:1.] Prov. 11:24—26. 13:22, 23. 19:17. Ec. 11:1—6.) ID.

(25.) 'Isa. 33:6. is a precious promise of bread and water, upon which multitudes have relied, and have not been disappointed: still it does not disclose the manner in which the supply is to come.' Cott. Bib.—'General declarations, even of Scripture, admit of individual exceptions. . . . It may also be noticed, that it is not necessity simply that is spoken of, but actual beggary from door to door; and very few [if any] of the seed of the righteous, who walk in the footsteps of their fathers, are thus humbled. Moreover, possibly a supplement is here required: "Nor his seed begging bread;"—i. e. asking it in vain. And, finally, it might be observed, that David does not state a general proposition, but only the result of his own observation and experience.' MORISON, after Poole. Perhaps many will be better satisfied with the explanation, at Job 36:8—14. Should, however, a supplement be admitted, the word though before 'begging bread,' would give the emphasis of David's remark to the term 'forsaken,' as if he had said, 'even when most reduced.' ED.

Verses 27, 28.

This general counsel for present and future happiness is here again inculcated, (34:11—14.) in a manner which shows, that none but the saints, the regenerate and believing who have obtained mercy, do thus 'depart from evil and do good:' and the final preservation of the saints is most expressly maintained, and grounded on the Lord's love of judgment, and faithfulness to his promises.—Some think this doctrine is to be found nowhere, except in Paul's epistles; and then they endeavor to explain away his language: but not one sentence in his writings is more explicit, than this declaration of the inspired Psalmist. (1 Pet. 1:3—5.) SCOTT.

Verses 29—31.

(9—11.)—'The righteous man, whose mouth speaketh wisdom, whose tongue talketh of judgment, and in whose heart is the law of his God, shall not slide in any of his steps.' Thus some render these vs. which strongly mark the character of those saints, 'who are preserved for ever.' (40:6—8. Jer. 31:33, 34. Rom. 7:22—25.)—Wise and pious conversation, when it comes from the abundance of the heart, and is enforced by a holy example, is one grand mean of communicating the savor of divine truth around, in families and neighbor-

30 [q] The mouth of the righteous speaketh wisdom, and his tongue talketh of judgment.

31 [r] The law of his God is in his heart; [s] none of his * steps shall slide.

32 The wicked [t] watcheth the righteous, and seeketh to slay him.

33 The LORD [u] will not leave him in his hand, [x] nor condemn him when he is judged.

34 [y] Wait on the LORD, and [z] keep his way, and he shall [a] exalt thee to inherit the land: [b] when the wicked are cut off, thou shalt see it.

35 [c] I have seen the wicked in great power, and spreading himself like † a green bay-tree.

36 Yet [d] he passed away, and, lo, he was not: yea, I sought him, but he could not be found.

37 [e] Mark the perfect man, and behold the upright: for the end of that man is peace.

38 But [f] the transgressors shall be destroyed together; the end of the wicked shall be cut off.

39 But [g] the salvation of the righteous is of the LORD, he is [h] their Strength in the time of trouble.

40 And [i] the LORD shall help them, and deliver them; he shall deliver them [k] from the wicked, and save them, [l] because they trust in him.

PSALM XXXVIII.

The Psalmist deprecates the wrath of God, and describes the sufferings to which his sins had exposed him, 1—10. He complains that his friends deserted him, while persecuted by his foes, 11, 12. He resigns himself to God, and hopes in Him; while he confesses his sins, shows the character of his enemies, and pleads for deliverance, 13—22.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

It is of vast importance to understand the present and future condition of the righteous and the wicked, that we may know what to choose and to expect. The workers of iniquity, even monsters of wickedness, often prosper for a time, succeed in their projects, flourish in wealth, pomp, and mirth, and seem to enjoy happiness. (Job 21: 7—16.) But their flourishing resembles that of the grass, and they will be soon cut down and withered. Then their power of doing mischief will be at an end, and their injurious swords will pierce their own souls, with inexpressible anguish. As they are now under the wrath and curse of the Almighty, their plenty and prosperity only pamper them for destruction; and the wealth they leave behind them proves a snare, and often a curse, to their posterity; while terrors of conscience, dread of death, and furious passions, mar their precarious enjoyments, and give them a sad foretaste of the wrath to come.—But the righteous bear another character, meet with other treatment, have other supports, and will experience a contrary end. They [subordinate their lower to their higher nature] 'trust in the LORD,' walk in his ordinances and commandments, and imitate Him who went about doing good to the bodies and souls of men. Yet must Christians expect tribulation in the world. In general they are poor and afflicted, and Satan distresses, as much as he can, those whom he is not able to deceive, defile, or destroy: their endeavors to do good are often unsuccessful, and ingratitude proves their only recompense. They therefore have need of faith and patience, of hope and love: but, observing the directions and pleading the promises of God, they find inward comfort to counterbalance their outward trials.—The Lord will also vindicate their characters, and give them peace of conscience. Even in this world it is evident, that the afflicted righteous man is far happier than the most prosperous of the wicked.—Let sinners then be counselled to 'depart from evil, and to do good,' to repent, and forsake sin, to trust in the mercy of God through Jesus Christ, and take his yoke upon them, and learn of Him, that they may dwell for evermore in heaven. Let us all watch against impatience, envy, and despondency, and look more to the wretched end of wicked men, than to their present state; committing all we are, and have, and do, to the Lord's disposal, being assured that He will order that which is best for us; [especially] let us mark the closing scenes of different characters; and thus, keeping our eyes fixed on eternal things, and depending on God's mercy, we may pass safely into his kingdom. Bay-tree.] See cut. 'Heb. æsrach, occurs here only. Aben Ezra, Jarchi, Kimchi, Jerome, and some others say, that the original may mean only "a native tree," i. e. growing in its own soil. The Sept. and Vulg. r. "cedars;" but Luther's bib., the old Saxon, the French, Spanish, Italian of Diodati, and Ainsworth's vers. make it the laurel; and Sir T. Browne says: "as the sense of the text is sufficiently answered by this, we are unwilling to exclude that noble plant from the honor of having its name in Scripture. The word flourishing is also more applicable to the laurel, which in its prosperity abounds with pleasant flowers."' HARRIS.—The text of our tr. gives, as the emblem of a wicked man's prosperity, an ever-green, flourishing and beautiful to look upon, but bearing no fruit, or only such as is poisonous. But most expositors suppose that a tree, growing in its native soil and never transplanted, is meant: and in these circumstances, trees acquire their largest and most luxuriant growth. (M.)—Thus Saul, Doeg, and Ahithophel, in David's time, had flourished; and thus they had vanished.—The vision of Nebuchadnezzar, and Daniel's interpretation, form a striking illustration of these vs. (Dan. 4:1—33.) 'I looked about me to see what was become of him, and whether he might not be removed (as a tree sometimes is) to another place, but there was no such man . . . to be found.' Patrick. (Job 5 3—5. 18:5—21.) NOTES.

Ps. XXXVIII. Title.] This Ps. is the third of those called penitential; and describes among the Psalmist's other trials some grievous diseases, with which he was visited for his sins; or, as some think, his inward trials represented by language, taken from enfeebling and loathsome sickness. Probably the calamities which befell David, after his sin in respect of Bathsheba and Uriah, gave occasion to its doleful complaints. (6: 32:) SCOTT.—Considerable variety obtains in the ancient versions respecting the title of this Ps. but nothing of importance to be noted here in addition to Henry and Scott.—Lowth suggests that the disease spoken of may be understood of all sin generally, and adds, that it could be no less absurd to inquire what river David complained that he was plunged in, when he said 'the deep waters have gone over my soul,' than it would to inquire into the nature of the disease here complained of. And Rosenm. argues against the [common] supposition that David's sin of adultery is referred to; for when he committed that sin he was in general acceptance with the people, or, at least, not persecuted by his enemies, as when he wrote this. (v. 12,18,19.) The Assemb. (Ann.) though inclined, from the title, to think it may be his adultery, yet confess, 'there be no words in the whole Ps. but may admit of a metaphorical interpretation, warrantable by other places of Scripture, where the miserable condition of a sinner is set out by corporal diseases.' Rosenm. says, some think the Psalmist wrote it about the beginning of Absalom's sedition; and Theodoret (in Patrick) 'supposes he reflects, not only on Absalom's rebellion, but on other disastrous things that befell him after he came to the crown; by the murder of his son Amnon, the falseness of Ahithophel, the abusive reproaches of Shimei, and all the afflictions mentioned in his history, which were sent for the cure of his sins.' And De Wette (in Rosenm.) notices the resemblance between this and Ps. 6. ED

17. there he understands their end, and thence gives us to understand it, and by comparing that with the end of the righteous, baffles and silences the temptation. Observe,

1. The misery of the wicked, at last, however they may prosper awhile, v. 38. Some instances of the remarkable ruin of wicked people David had himself observed, v. 35, 36. I have seen a wicked man, (the word is singular,) suppose Saul, or Ahithophel, (for David was an old man when he penned this,) in great power, formidable, (so some,) the terror of the mighty, carrying all before him with a high hand, and seeming to be firmly fixed, and finely flourishing, like a green bay-tree, all leaves and no fruit; like a native, home-born Israelite, (so Hammond,) likely to take root. But what became of him? Eliphaz, long before, had learned, when he saw the foolish taking root, to curse his habitation, Job 5: 3. And David saw cause for it; for this bay-tree is withered away as soon as the fig-tree Christ cursed; he passed away as a dream, as a shadow; he was gone in an instant, he was not; he had acted his part, and then quitted the stage, and there was no miss of him. The total and final ruin of sinners, of all sinners, will shortly be made as much a spectacle to the saints, as saints are now sometimes made a spectacle to the world, v. 34. The transgressors shall be destroyed together, v. 38. In this world, God singles out here one sinner, and there another, out of many, to be made an example—as a warning; but in the day of judgment will be a general, total destruction. They that have sinned together shall be damned together; Bind them in bundles, to burn them.

2. The blessedness of the righteous, God's poor, despised people, at last. (1.) Preferment; v. 34. dignity, honor, and true wealth, in the New Jerusalem. (2.) Peace, v. 37. Let all people mark the perfect man, and behold the upright; notice him to admire and imitate him, keep your eye on him to observe what comes of him, and you will find that the end of that man is peace. Sometimes his latter end proves more comfortable to him than his beginning was; however, if all his days continue dark and cloudy, perhaps his dying day may prove comfortable, and his sun set bright; or, if it should set under a cloud, yet his future state will be peace, everlasting peace, Isa. 57: 2. A peaceful death has concluded the troublesome life of many a good man; and all is well that thus ends everlastingly well. (3.) Salvation, v. 39, 40. The salvation of the righteous, is (1 Pet. 1: 10.) of the Lord; it will be the Lord's doing.

Ps. XXXVIII. This is one of the penitential psalms; it is full of grief, and complaint, from beginning to end. David's sins and afflictions are the cause of his grief, and the matter of his complaints. It should seem, he was now sick and in pain, which reminded him of his sins, and helped to humble him for them; he was, at the same time, deserted by his friends, and persecuted by his enemies; so the Ps. is calculated for the depth of distress, and a complication of calamities. In singing it, we ought to be much affected with the malignity of sin; and if we have not such troubles as are here described, we know not how soon we may have, and therefore must sing of them by way of preparation; or, knowing others have them, we must sing of them by way of sympathy.

V. 1—11. This title is very observable; it is a psalm to bring to remembrance; the 70th, likewise penned in affliction, is so entitled. It is designed,

1. To bring to his own remembrance; times of sickness are times to bring to remembrance, to awaken our consciences, and set our sins in order before us, for our humiliation. In a day of adversity, consider. Or, if penned after his recovery, it was designed as a record of the workings of his heart when in affliction, that, on every review of it, he might call to mind the good impressions then, and make a fresh improvement of them. So the writing of Hezekiah, when he had been sick. Thus he would,

2. Remind others of the same things he was himself mindful of, and so teach them what to think, and say, when sick and in affliction.

I. He deprecates God's displeasure in his affliction, v. 1. O Lord, rebuke me not in thy wrath. With this same petition he began another prayer, for the visitation of the sick, 6: 1. This was most on his heart, and should be most on ours, when in affliction, that, however God rebukes and chastens us, it may not be in displeasure. Those that would escape God's wrath, must pray against that, more than any outward affliction, and be content to bear any outward affliction, while it comes from, and consists with, the love of God.

II. He bitterly laments the impressions of God's displeasure on his soul, v. 2. Thine arrows stick fast in me. Let Job's complaint, ch. 6: 4. expound David's here. He was under a very melancholy, frightful apprehension of the wrath of God against him for his sins, and thought he could look for nothing but judgment and fiery indignation to devour him. This will be the everlasting misery of the damned. He complains of God's wrath, as that which inflicted his bodily distemper, v. 3. And what was worse, it caused disquietude of heart, by reason of which he forgot the courage of a soldier, the dignity of a prince, and all the cheerfulness of the sweet psalmist of Israel, v. 8. Nothing will disquiet the heart of a good man so much, as the sense of God's anger. The way to keep the heart quiet, is, to keep ourselves in God's love, and do nothing to offend Him.

III. He acknowledges his sin to be the procuring, provoking cause of all his troubles, and groans more under the load of guilt than any other load, v. 3. If our trouble be the fruit of God's anger, we may thank ourselves; our sin causes it. Are we restless? Sin makes us so. If sin [disobedience] were not in our souls, there would be no pain in our bones, no illness in our bodies.

It is sin, therefore, that this good man complains most of, 1. As a burden, a heavy burden, v. 4. The power of sin dwelling in us is a weight, Heb. 12: 1. it keeps men from soaring upward and pressing forward; all the saints are complaining of it, as a body of death they are loaded with, Rom. 7: 24. It is a burden to God, Am. 2: 13. a burden to the whole creation, Rom. 8: 21, 22. It will, first or last, be a burden to the sinner himself, a burden of repentance, or of ruin to sink him; it will be a talent of lead on him, Zech. 5: 8. Sinners are said to bear their iniquity. Threatenings are burdens. 2. As wounds, dangerous wounds, v. 5. Sins are wounds, Gen. 4: 23. painful, mortal wounds. Our wounds by sin are often in a bad condition, owing to the sinner's foolishness, in not confessing sin, 32: 3, 4. A slight sore neglected may prove of fatal consequence, and so may a slight sin, slighted and left unrepented of.

IV. He bemoans himself because of his afflictions, and eases his grief, by giving it vent, and pouring out his complaint before the Lord.

1. He was troubled in mind, and had no rest in his spirit, v. 6. He was always pensive and melancholy, which made him a burden and terror to himself. His spirit was feeble and sore-broken, and his heart disquieted, v. 8. Herein David's sufferings were a type of Christ's, who cried out, My soul is exceeding sorrowful. This is a sorer affliction than any other in this world; we have no reason to complain of affliction, as long as God preserves to us the use of our reason and the peace of our consciences.

2. He was sick and weak in body; his loins filled with a loathsome disease, some swelling, or ulcer, or inflammation; some think a plague-sore, like Hezekiah's boil; and there was no soundness in his flesh, like Job. David himself, though so great a prince, and so great a saint, was not exempt from the most grievous diseases; there was no soundness even in his flesh; probably this was after his sin in the matter of Uriah, and thus did he smart in his flesh for [disobedience, through] his fleshly lusts. When, at any time, distempered in our body, we ought to remember how God has been dishonored in and by our bodies. He was feeble and sore-broken, v. 8. His heart panted, and was in a continual palpitation, v. 10. His strength and limbs failed him; as for the light of his eyes, that was gone from him, either with much weeping, or by a defluxion of rheum on them, or through the lowness of his spirits, and the frequent returns of fainting. Sickness will tame the strongest body, and the stoutest spirit. Therefore let not the strong man glory in his strength, nor any man set grief at defiance, however it may be thought at a distance.

3. His friends were unkind to him, v. 11. Luke 10: 31. Even his kinsmen stood afar off. See what little reason we have to trust in man, or to wonder if we be disappointed in our expectations of kindness from men. Adversity tries friendship, and separates between the precious and the vile. It is our wisdom then to make sure a Friend in heaven, who will not stand aloof from our sore, and from whose love no tribulation or distress can separate us. David, in his troubles, was a type of Christ in his agony, on his cross, feeble and sore-broken, and then deserted by his friends and kinsmen, who beheld afar off.

Lastly, In the midst of his complaints, he comforts himself with the cognizance God graciously took both of his griefs and of his prayers, v. 9. The groanings which cannot be uttered are not hid from Him that searches the heart, and knows what is the mind of the Spirit, Rom. 8: 26, 27. In singing this, and praying it over, whatever burden lies on our spirits, we should by faith cast it on God, and all our care concerning it, and then be easy.

V. 12—22. In these vs.

I. David complains of the power and malice of his enemies, who, it should seem, not only took occasion, from the weakness of his body, and the trouble of his mind, to insult over him, but to do him mischief. He has a great deal to say against them, which he humbly offers as a reason why God should appear for him, as 25: 19. Consider mine enemies.

1. 'They are very spiteful and cruel; seek my hurt; nay, my life,' v. 12. such is the enmity of the serpent's seed. It thirsts after the blood of the saints.

2. 'They are very subtle, unwearied and politic. Mischief, covered and carried on by deceit, may well be called a snare.'

3. 'They are very insolent and abusive; when my foot slips, when I fall into any trouble, make any mistake, misplace a word, or take a false step, they magnify themselves against me, are pleased, and promise themselves my ruin.'

4. 'They are not only unjust, but very ungrateful; hate me wrongfully, v. 19. nay, render evil for good,' v. 20. 109: 4. Such a rooted enmity is there in wicked hearts to goodness for its own sake, that they hate it, even when they themselves have the benefit of it; they hate prayer, even in those that pray for them; and hate peace, even in those that would be at peace with them; but very ill-natured are those whom no courtesy will oblige, but rather exasperate.

5. 'They are very impious and devilish; they are my adversaries merely because I follow the thing that good is.' If we suffer ill for doing well, we must not think it strange; from the beginning it was so; Cain slew Abel, because his works were righteous; nor must we think it hard, because it will not always be so; for so much the greater will our reward be.

6. They are many and mighty; lively, strong, multiplied, v. 19. Lord, how are they increased that trouble me? 3: 1. Holy David was weak and faint, melancholy, of a sorrowful spirit, and persecuted by his friends; at the same time, his wicked enemies were strong, lively and increased in number; let us not therefore pretend to judge of men's characters by their outward condition; none knows love or hatred by all that is before them. It should seem that David, in this, as in other complaints he makes of his enemies, has an eye to Christ, whose persecutors were such as are here described, perfectly lost to all honor and virtue. None hate Christianity, but such as have first divested themselves of the first principles of humanity, and broken through its most sacred bonds.

II. He reflects, with comfort, on his own peaceable and pious behavior, under all the injuries and indignities done him. It is then only that our enemies do us a real mischief, when they provoke us to sin, Neh. 6: 13. when they prevail to put us out of the possession of our own souls, and drive us from God and our duty; if by divine grace we are enabled to prevent this mischief, we quench their fiery darts, and are saved from harm; if still we hold fast our integrity and our peace, who can hurt us? This David did here.

1. He kept his temper, and was not ruffled or discomposed by any of the slights put on him, or the mischievous things said or done against him, v. 13, 14. 'I, as a deaf man, heard not; I took no notice of the affronts put on me, did not resent them, nor was put into disorder by them, much less did I meditate revenge, or study to return the injury.' Note, The less notice we take of the unkindness and injuries done us, the more we consult the quiet of our own minds. Being deaf, he was dumb, as a man in whose mouth there are no reproofs; though they sought after his life, and his silence might be taken for a confession of his guilt, yet he opens not his mouth. Note, When our enemies are most clamorous, it is, generally, our prudence to be silent, or to say little, lest we make bad worse. David could not hope by his mildness to win on his enemies, or by his soft answers to turn away their wrath, for they were men of such base spirits, that they rendered him evil for good; and yet he carried it thus meekly toward them, that he might prevent his own sin, and might have the comfort of it in the reflection. Herein David was a type of Christ, who was as a sheep dumb before the shearer, and, when He was reviled, reviled not again; and both are examples to us, not to render railing for railing.

2. He kept close to his God by faith and prayer, and so both supported himself under these injuries, and silenced his own resentments [sense] of them, v. 15. His lovers and friends, that should have owned him and stood by him, and appeared as witnesses for him, withdrew from him, v. 10. But God is a friend that will never fail us, if we hope in Him. Note, It is a good reason why we should bear reproach and calumny with silence and patience, because God is a Witness to all the wrong done us, and, in due time, will be a Witness for us, and against those that do us wrong; therefore let us be silent, because if we be, then we may expect God will appear for us, for this is an evidence we trust in Him; but if we undertake to manage for ourselves, we take God's work out of his hands, and forfeit the benefit of his appearing for us. Our Lord Jesus, when He suffered, therefore threatened not, because He committed Himself to Him that judges righteously, 1 Pet. 2: 23. It is a great support to us, when men are false and unkind, that we have a God to go to, whom we may be free with, and who will be faithful to us.

Verse 15.

The translation of the last clause of this v. in the book of common prayer, contains an important instruction: 'Thou shalt answer for me, O Lord, my God.' (M.) SCOTT.

Verses 19, 20.

The humble spirit of a penitent pleading guilty before God; and the consciousness, at the same time, of being wrongfully hated, and ungratefully and basely used, by men, not for the sins into which he had fallen in particular instances, but for the general tenor of a holy and useful life; are strongly marked in this passage. This shows, that the most decided rejoicing in the testimony of a man's conscience, respecting his conduct towards men, in those things of which he has been unjustly condemned, is perfectly consistent with the deepest humiliation as a sinner in the sight of God. III. He here bewails his own follies and infirmities. 1. He was very sensible of the present workings of corruption in him, and that he was now ready to repine at the providence of God, and to be put into a passion by the injuries men did him; I am ready to halt, v. 17. This will best be explained by a reflection like this which the psalmist made on himself in a like case, 73: 2. Good men, by setting their sorrow continually before them, have been ready to halt, who, by setting God always before them, have kept their standing. 2. He remembered against himself his former transgressions, acknowledging that by them he had brought these troubles on himself, and forfeited the divine protection; though he could justify himself, before God he will judge and condemn himself, v. 18. and this helped to make him silent under the rebukes of Providence, and the reproaches of men. If we be truly penitent for sin, that will make us patient under affliction, and particularly under unjust censures. Confession and contrition accompany true repentance, v. 18.

IV. He concludes with very earnest prayers to God, for his gracious presence with him, and seasonable, powerful succor in his distress, v. 21, 22. Nothing goes nearer to the heart of a good man in affliction, than to be under the apprehension of God's deserting him in wrath; nor does any thing therefore come more feelingly from his heart than this prayer, 'Lord, be not Thou far from me; make haste for my help.' Is any afflicted, let him thus pray, let him thus plead, let him thus hope, in singing this psalm.

Ps. XXXIX. David seems to have been in a great strait, when he penned this, and with difficulty composes himself to take that good counsel he had given to others, (37.) to rest in the Lord, and wait patiently for Him, without fretting: it is easier to give the good advice, than the good example, of quietness under affliction. What the particular trouble was which occasioned his conflict, does not appear—perhaps it was the death of some dear friend or relation; and, at the same time, it should seem too, himself was weak and ill, and under some prevailing distemper. His enemies likewise were seeking advantages against him, and watched for his halting, that they might have something to reproach him for. This is a funeral Ps. and very proper for the occasion; in singing it, we should get our hearts duly affected with the brevity, uncertainty, and calamitous state, of human life; and those on whose comforts God has, by death, made breaches, will find this Ps. of great use, to their obtaining, what we should aim at under such an affliction, spiritual benefit, and reconcilement to the holy will of God.

V. 1—6. David here recollects, and leaves on record, the workings of his heart under his afflictions; and it is good for us to do so, that what was thought amiss, may be amended, and what was well thought of, may be improved the next time.

I. He remembered the covenants he had made with God, to walk circumspectly, and to be very cautious both of what he did, and what he said. When, at any time, tempted to sin, we must call to mind our solemn vows against sin, against the particular sin we are on the brink of. God can, and will, remind us of them, Jer. 2: 20. therefore we ought to remind ourselves of them. 1. He remembers he had resolved, in general, to be very cautious and circumspect in his walk, v 1 This is the great concern of every one of us, while others walk at all adventures. We ought steadfastly and frequently to resolve we will take heed to our ways; and, on all occasions, remind ourselves of our resolution. 2. He remembers he had in particular covenanted against tongue-sins It is not so easy as we could wish, not to sin in thought; but if an evil thought should arise in his mind, he would suppress it; which, for any one to do, is so great an attainment, that if any offend not in word, the same is a perfect man; and so needful, that he who seems to be religious, but bridles not his tongue, his religion is vain: see Jam. 3: 3. Watchfulness in the habit, is the bridle on the head; in the act and exercise, it is the hand on the bridle; by particular, steadfast resolution, corruption is muzzled, restrained from breaking out at the lips. David resolved he would double his guard, when there was most danger of scandal; when the wicked is before me. If good men fall into bad company, they must take heed what they say. Or, when the wicked is before me, in my thoughts; when contemplating their pride and power, prosperity and flourishing estate. The stronger the temptation to a sin, the stronger the resolution must be against it.

II. Pursuant to these covenants, he, with much ado, bridled his tongue, v. 2. His silence was commendable; and the greater the provocation, the more praise-worthy his silence. Watchfulness and resolution, in the strength of God's grace, will do more toward bridling the tongue than we can imagine, though it be an unruly evil. But what shall we say of his keeping silence even from good? Was it his wisdom, because he would not cast pearls before swine? I rather think it his weakness; because he might not say any thing, he would say nothing, but ran into an extreme, which was a reproach to the law, for that prescribes a mean. The same law which forbids all corrupt communication, requires that which is to the use of edifying, Eph. 4: 29.

III. The less he spake, the more he thought, and the more warmly. Binding the distempered

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

God often sees good, in order to warn others, to silence the reproaches of scoffers, to vindicate the honor of religion, and for his own glory, to make the afflictions of his offending children very sharp, complicated, and permanent; and to extort from them many doleful groans and lamentations. In such circumstances, when the correction begins to produce its salutary effects, they readily trace their sorrows to the fatherly displeasure of the Lord; and humbly acknowledge their sins to be the cause of his anger. [Comp. Note, Job 34: 1.]—Pride, covetousness, envy, malice, and lust, are diseases of the soul of far greater malignity, than fevers, dropsies, palsies, gout, or stone, are of the body: yet numbers feel not their sickness, till it be too late to apply the remedy. But, when we perceive our true condition, the good Physician is valued, resorted to, and obeyed: (Matt. 9: 10—13.) though even they, who are in this sure way of an effectual cure, often retard it, through their foolishness; and would we not prolong our own miseries, when conscious of having offended, we should immediately approach the mercy-seat with penitent confessions and believing prayers; that without delay our sins may be pardoned, our strength renewed, and our enemy prevented from rejoicing over us.—While the hypocrite takes encouragement from David's sins to transgress, he is a perfect stranger to David's ingenuous anguish of spirit under the consciousness of his guilt.—In the true believer's case, however, all this trouble will be useful: nay, should [he, with all his other troubles] be attended with the unkindness and inconstancy of lovers, friends, and relatives; still that consciousness of guilt which forms his heaviest load, will keep down indignation, silence murmurs and reproaches, and produce meek and quiet submission. For, if Jesus bore all this, without complaint or reproof; what reason can a sinner think he has for impatience or anger, when mercifully corrected for his sins, whatever rod God is pleased to employ? SCOTT.

NOTES.

Ps. XXXIX. The occasion of this Ps. is thought generally to be similar to that of the preceding. Rosenm. says, the ancient Hebrews, according to Jarchi, maintain, that it refers to decrees and judgments made with regard to the Israelites in circumstances of affliction.—Jeduthun is variously understood. Jewish commentators understand by it a musical instrument, or the first word of a song to the tune of which this Ps. was to be sung. Others think it the name of one of David's principal musicians, perhaps Ethan, mentioned among the sons of Merari. 1 Chr. 6:44. 9:16. and 16:33, 41, 42. So Dr. A. CLARKE and MORISON. Rosenm. favors the latter opinion. ED.

part, did but draw the humor to it; My sorrow was stirred, my heart was hot, v. 3. He could bridle his tongue, but could not keep his passion under: Note, The fretful and discontented ought not to pore much, [but change the subject of thought,] for, while they suffer their thoughts to dwell on the causes of their calamity, the fire of their discontent is fed with fuel, and burns the more furiously. Impatience is a sin that has its ill cause within ourselves, and that is musing; and has its ill effects on ourselves, and that is no less than burning. If therefore we would prevent the mischief of ungoverned passions, we must redress the grievance of ungoverned thoughts.

IV. When he did speak, at last, it was to the purpose, v. 3. some make it the breach of his good purpose, and that, in what he said, he sinned with his tongue; so they make what follows, a passionate wish, that he might die like Elijah; 1 K. 19: 4. and Job, ch. 6: 8, 9. But I rather take it to be, not the breach of his good purpose, but the reformation of his mistake in carrying it too far; he had kept silence from good, but now he would do so no longer. He had nothing to say to the wicked that were before him, for to them he knew not how to place his words, but, after long musing, the first word he said was a prayer, and a devout meditation on a subject, which it will be good for us all to think much of.

1. He prays to God to make him sensible of the shortness and uncertainty of life, and the near approach of death, v. 4. He does not mean, 'Lord, let me know how long I shall live, and when I shall die;' but, 'Lord, give me wisdom and grace to consider mine end, Deut. 32: 29. and to improve what I know concerning it.' The living know that they shall die, Eccl. 9: 5. but few care for thinking of it; we have therefore need to pray, that God by his grace would conquer that aversion, which is in our corrupt hearts, to the thoughts of death. 'Lord, make me to consider,' (1.) 'What death is; it is my end, the end of my life, and all the employments and enjoyments of life; it is the end of all men,' Eccl. 7: 2. It is a final period to our state of probation and preparation, and an awful entrance on a state of recompense and retribution. To the wicked man, it is the end of all his joys, to a godly man, the end of all his griefs. (2.) How near it is. When we look upon death as at a distance, we are tempted to adjourn the necessary preparations for it; but when we consider how short life is, [that our day is determined,] we see ourselves concerned to do what our hand finds to do, not only with all our might, but with all possible expedition. (3.) That it is continually working in us. We find, by daily experience, the earthly house of this tabernacle mouldering and going to decay; 'Lord, make us to consider this, that we may secure mansions in the house not made with hands.'

2. He meditates on the brevity and vanity of life, pleading it with God for relief under the burdens of life, as Job often, and pleading it with himself, for his quickening to the business of life.

Man's life on earth is of no continuance, and that is a reason why we should sit loose to it, and prepare for the end of it, v. 5. Behold, Thou hast made my days as a hand-breadth; the breadth of four fingers, a measure we have always about us; we need no rod, no pole, no measuring line, wherewith to take the dimension of our days, nor any skill in arithmetic wherewith to compute their number. All time is nothing to God's eternity, much less our share of time. Man's life on earth is vain, and of no value, and therefore it is folly to be fond of it, and wisdom to make sure of a better. He is vanity; mortal, mutable. Observe how emphatically this truth is expressed here, 1. Every man is vanity, without exception; high and low, rich and poor, all meet in this. 2. He is so at his best estate, when young, strong, and healthful, in wealth and honor, and the height of prosperity; when most easy, merry, and secure. 3. He is altogether vanity, as vain as you can imagine. All man is all vanity, so it may be read; every thing about him uncertain, nothing substantial and durable, but what relates to the new man. 4. Verily he is so. A truth of undoubted certainty, but which we are very unwilling to believe, and need to have solemnly attested to us, as indeed it is by frequent instances. 5. Selah is annexed, as a note commanding observation. 'Stop here, take time to consider and apply this truth.'

For the proof, he here mentions three things, and shows the vanity of each, v. 6. 1st. Our joys and honors: Surely every man walks in a shadow, an image, a vain show. When he makes a figure, his fashion passes away, and his great pomp is but great fancy, Acts 25: 23. It is but a show, therefore vain like the rainbow, the gaudy colors of which must needs vanish and disappear quickly, when the substratum is but a cloud, a vapor; such is life, Jam. 4: 14. therefore such are all the gaieties of it. 2dly. Our griefs and fears; Surely they are all disquieted in vain. Our disquietudes are often groundless; we vex ourselves without any just cause, and the occasions of our trouble are often the creatures of our own fancy and imagination: and always fruitless; we disquiet ourselves in vain, for we cannot, with all our disquietment, alter the nature of things, nor the counsel of God; things will still be as they are. 3dly. Our cares and toils. He takes great pains to heap up riches, but they are like heaps of manure in the furrows of the field, good for nothing, unless they be spread. But when he has filled his treasuries with trash, he knows not who shall gather them, nor to whom they shall descend when he is gone: for he [does not use them during his life, nor provide effectually for their proper use at his death, nor] shall he take them away with him. He asks not, For whom do I labor? and that is his folly, Eccl. 4: 8. But if he did ask, he could not tell whether he should be a wise man or a fool, a friend or a foe, Eccl. 2: 19. This is vanity.

V. 7—13. The psalmist, having meditated on the shortness and uncertainty of life, and the vanity and vexation of spirit that attend all the comforts of life, here, in these vs. turns heaven-ward; and expresses,

I. His dependence on God, v. 7. The consideration of the vanity and frailty of human life, should deaden our desires to the things of this world, and

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—6. The presence of the wicked, especially if powerful and prosperous, exposes us to many temptations, either by enticing or terrifying us into improper compliances, or by exciting our indignation or envy. When we are not able wholly to separate from them, we should double our watchfulness, and especially impose a strict restraint on our tongues; remembering that they will criticise every expression, and turn it, if they can, to our disadvantage, and to the discredit of religion. Sometimes it may be necessary to keep silence even from good words, when they are likely to excite profane contempt or rage; yet in general we run into an extreme, when backward to engage in edifying discourse. (Jam. 1: 26.) But even if we be enabled to bridle our tongues, we shall often find ourselves incapable of repressing our passions. In this case, it is our wisdom to retire, and pour out our hearts before God, and to utter our complaints, sorrows, and desires to Him alone. It is also very composing to the believer's mind, under sore trials and temptations, to know and consider his end, and the measure of his days: but we are never suitably affected with such subjects, except we pray over them, and are inwardly taught by the Spirit of God.—How absurd are the perplexing anxieties, and the incessant fatigues, of the most successful worldling, who pursues shadows to the marring of his present comfort, and the ruin of his immortal soul! Indeed the believer's disquietudes about the difficulties of his path, and the treatment that he meets with, are not much more rational.

PSALM XL.

David praises God for deliverance out of deep distress, and shows the benefit which would thence be derived to numbers; and the happiness of such as trust in God, 1—5. As a type of Christ, (or, Christ speaking by him,) he states the inefficacy of legal sacrifices, and the efficacy of the Redeemer's obedience, 6—8. He declares that he had published God's righteousness and salvation; and pleads for deliverance from urgent troubles, and for the confusion of his enemies, with the triumphing of the righteous, 9—17.

To the chief Musician, A Psalm of David.

* I [a] WAITED patiently for the LORD; and [b] he inclined unto me, and heard my cry.

of conscience, and for grace, that God would never leave him to himself, so far as to do any thing that might make him a reproach to bad men. This is a good reason why we should both watch and pray against sin, because the credit of our profession is nearly concerned in the preservation of our integrity.

2. For the removal of his affliction, that he might speedily be eased of his present burdens, v. 10. Note, when under the correcting hand of God, our eye must be to God Himself, and not to any other, for relief; and we may then, in faith, and with satisfaction, pray that our afflictions may be removed, when our sins are pardoned, Is. 38: 17. and when, as here, the affliction is sanctified, and has done its work, and we are humbled under the hand of God.

(1.) He pleads the great extremity he was reduced to, which made him the proper object of God's compassion; I am consumed by the blow of thy hand. His sickness prevailed to that degree, that his spirits failed, his strength was wasted, and his body emaciated. When God, at any time, with rebukes corrects us, [1.] We must acknowledge He is righteous in it; for, whenever He corrects man, it is for iniquity. It is the yoke of our transgressions, though it be bound with his hand, Lam. 1: 14. [2.] We cannot oppose the effects of his controversy. Some make the moth here to represent man, who is as easily crushed as a moth with the touch of a finger, Job 4: 19. Others make it to represent the divine rebukes, which lower our expectations from it. 'I have sometimes foolishly promised myself this and the other, from the world; now, I am of another mind, but what wait I for?' He takes hold of happiness and satisfaction in God; My hope is in Thee. When creature-confidences fail, it is our comfort that we have a God to go to, a God to trust to, and we should thereby be quickened to take so much the faster hold of Him by faith.

II. His cheerful acquiescence in God's holy will, v. 9. 'I was dumb, I opened not my mouth, in a way of complaint and murmuring.' He now again recovered that serenity and sedateness of mind which were disturbed, v. 2. Whatever comforts he is deprived of, whatever crosses he is burdened with, he will be easy; 'because Thou didst it; it did not come to pass by chance, but according to thine appointment.' All that God does is well done.

III. His desire toward God, and prayers,

1. For the pardon of his sin, and preventing his shame, v. 8. Before he prays, v. 10. Remove thy stroke from me, he prays, v. 8. 'Deliver me from all mine offences, the guilt I have contracted, the punishment I have deserved, and the power of corruption I have been captivated by.' When God forgives our sins, He delivers us from them, from them all. He pleads, Make me not a reproach to the foolish. Wicked people are foolish; and they show their folly most, when they think to show their wit, by scoffing at God's people. When David prays that God would pardon his sins, and not make him a reproach, it is to be taken as a prayer for peace silently and insensibly waste and consume us, as the moth does the garment. All which abundantly proves what he had said before, that surely every man is vanity, weak and helpless; so he will be found when God comes to contend with him.

(2.) He pleads the good impressions made on him by his affliction. He hoped the end was accomplished for which it was sent, and that therefore it would be removed in mercy; and unless an affliction has done its work, though it may be removed, it is not removed in mercy. He hoped God would notice his weeping; when the Lord God called to mourning, he accommodated himself to the dispensation, and therefore could, in faith, pray, Lord, hold not thy peace at my tears, v. 12. His afflictions had stirred him up, too, to prayer. If they have that effect, and, when we are afflicted, we pray more, and better, than before, we may hope God will give ear to our cry; for the prayer which, by his providence, He gives occasion for, and by his Spirit of grace, indites, shall not return void. They had helped to wean him from the world; now he began, more than ever, to look upon himself as a stranger and sojourner here, and would never reckon himself at home till he came to heaven.

Lastly, He prays for a reprieve yet a little longer, v. 13. 'O spare me.' Some make this a passionate wish, that God would send him hel quickly, or it would be too late, like that, Job 10: 20, 21. But I rather take it as a pious prayer, that God would continue him here, till by his grace He had made him fit to go hence, and that he might finish the work of life, before his life was finished; Let my soul live, and it shall praise Thee.

Ps. XL. It should seem, David penned this Ps. on occasion of his deliverance, by God's power and goodness, from some great and pressing trouble, by which he was in danger of being overwhelmed; probably, some trouble of mind, arising from a sense of sin, and of God's displeasure against him for it; whatever it was, the same Spirit that indited his praises for that deliverance, was in him, at the same time, a Spirit of prophecy, testifying of the sufferings of Christ, and the glory that should follow; or, ere he was aware, he was led to speak of the discharge of his undertaking, in words that must be applied to Christ only; therefore how far the praises that here go before that illustrious prophecy, and the prayers that follow, may safely and profitably be applied to Him, it will be worth while

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 7—13. It is worthy of notice, that, in fact, we become happy in exact proportion, as we despair of happiness from this changing, sinful world; and wait and hope for it, from the mercy and all-sufficient love of God our Savior. Instead of being much concerned about temporal things, let us earnestly pray to be 'delivered from all our transgressions;' and that we may not be made a reproach to those, who, being foolish at all times, never so much expose their folly, as when they deride the hopes, or insult over the falls, of the righteous. We should look above instruments, and view the hand of God in all our afflictions: and then faith in his wisdom, justice, truth, and love; united with consciousness that He rebukes us for our iniquity; will render us silent and submissive, because He has done it. Then our prayers for the removal of his stroke, even when we 'are consumed with the blow of his hand,' will be offered with resignation to his will, and hope in his mercy.—The Christian's sorrows are all sanctified; the gracious Lord will wipe away his tears, and answer all his prayers: he cannot but feel his afflictions; yet, as a stranger and a pilgrim on earth, he hopes for a better and more enduring habitation in heaven, where his heart and his treasure are already. He only desires to be spared, till his measure of service on earth be finished, and his title to heaven clear; and that he may depart in that vigorous exercise of faith and grace, which may be honorable to God, encouraging to his brethren, and comfortable to himself. Then going hence, and being no more on earth, he enters on his perfect and eternal rest; and leaves his pious friends consoled with the joyful hope of a blessed re-union; and instructed by his words and actions, how to live, to suffer, and to die. (Prov. 14: 32. 1 Thes. 4: 13—18.) SCOTT.

and they confessed themselves to be strangers and pilgrims in the land: but David ruled, as a powerful monarch and a renowned conqueror, over the people of Israel, now fully settled in their promised inheritance. When, however, he considered the shortness and vanity of life, and looked forward to a future and permanent state; he too owned, that he was a stranger and pilgrim on earth, even as they also had been. SCOTT.

Verse 13.

If this Ps. was composed during Absalom's usurpation, David might mean, that he was desirous, before he left the world, to recover his peace of mind, to be reinstated in his authority, and to retrieve his character. He however prayed, that his faith, hope, and love, might recover strength; that he might be enabled to do some further service to his people, before his death; and have inward comfort, when about to depart. His prayer in all these respects was completely answered. (1 Chr. 29:) ID.

NOTES.

Ps. XL. Greenf. thinks this Ps. was composed about the same time and on the same occasion as the two preceding Pss.—The subject, many, with Henry and Scott, consider as relating primarily to David, but secondarily, and, in parts, exclusively, to the Messiah. So Morison; who thinks it, in an extraordinary degree, prophetic, yet doubts if it be so altogether. Prof. Stuart understands it wholly of the Messiah; so also Doddridge, apparently; see his note on volume of the book, Heb. 10:7.—Some find a difficulty in applying the whole Ps. to Christ, on account of v. 12. yet, as Christ bore our sins by way of atoning for them, most see no impropriety in applying that v. to Him. ARCHIBALD M'LEAN, in Morison, defends the application on the ground that, while all the sin-offerings appointed by the law were perfectly free from all iniquity or moral guilt, and indeed incapable of it, they yet had the sins of the people confessed over, and laid upon them, in order to expiation; and that such being the case as to these, the types, there was thus a propriety in speaking prophetically in this manner of Christ as the Antitype. And if it be said that iniquities here mean the punishment and sufferings Christ endured as a substitute for the iniquities of his people, it comes, he argues, (and so Stuart,) to the same thing; since the original word in v. 12. frequently signifies the punishment of sin; as, Gen. 4:13. 19:15. Lev. 1:5. Job 21:19. 2 K.7:

2 [c] He brought me up also out of an [*] horrible pit, out of [d] the miry clay, and [e] set my feet upon a rock, and [f] established my goings.

to consider. If, in singing this Ps. we mix faith with the prophecy of Christ, and join in sincerity with these praises and prayers, we make melody with our hearts to the Lord.

V. 1—5. In these vs. we have,

1. The great distress and trouble the psalmist had been in, v. 2. and in which he found himself sinking yet further. He says nothing of sickness, or the insults of his enemies, therefore we have reason to think, some inward disquiet was now his greatest grievance. Despondency of spirit, under the sense of God's withdrawings, and prevailing doubts and fears about the eternal state, are indeed a horrible pit and miry clay, and have been so to many a dear child of God.

2. His humble attendance on God, and his believing expectations from Him in those depths, v. 1. Waiting I waited. Those whose expectation is from God may wait with assurance, but must wait with patience. This is very applicable to Christ, both in the garden, and on the cross. Then was his soul troubled and exceeding sorrowful; but then He prayed, Father, glorify thy name; Father, save Me; and thus waited patiently.

3. His comfortable experience in his distress, which he records for the honor of God, and his own and others' encouragement. (1.) God answered his prayers; He inclined unto me, and heard my cry. Those that wait patiently for God, though they may wait long, do not wait in vain. Our Lord Jesus was heard, in that He feared, Heb. 5: 7. Nay, He was sure the Father heard Him always. (2.) He silenced his fears, stilled the tumult of his spirits, and gave him a settled peace of conscience, v. 2. Those that have been under the prevalency of [desponding apprehensions, constitutional, or accidental, or] a religious melancholy, and by the grace of God have been relieved, may apply this very feelingly to themselves; they are brought up out of a horrible pit. Christ is the Rock on which a poor soul may stand fast, and on whose mediation alone between us and God we can build any solid hopes or satisfaction. Where God has given a steadfast hope, He expects there should be a steady, regular conversation; and if that be the blessed fruit of it, we have reason to acknowledge, with abundance of thankfulness, the riches and power of his grace. (3.) He filled him with joy, as well as peace, in believing; 'He has put a new song in my mouth; He has given me cause to rejoice, and a heart to rejoice.' Fresh mercies, especially such as we never before received, call for new songs. This is applicable to our Lord Jesus, in his reception to paradise, his resurrection from the grave, and his exaltation to the joy and glory set before Him.

4. The good improvement of it.

(1.) David's experience would encourage many to hope in God, and, for that end, he leaves it here on record, Many shall see, and fear, and trust in the Lord. There is a holy, reverent fear of God, which is not only consistent with, but the foundation of, our hope in Him. God's dealings with our Lord Jesus, are our great encouragement to trust in God; and what greater encouragement can we have to his fear and worship? See Rom. 4: 25. 5: 1, 2. The psalmist invites others to make God their Hope, as he did, by pronouncing those happy that do so, v. 4. This is applicable, particularly, to our faith in Christ.

(2.) The joyful sense he had of this mercy, led him to observe, with thankfulness, his many other favors from God, v. 5. When God puts new songs into our mouth, we must not forget our former songs, but repeat them. Many are the benefits we are daily loaded with, both by providence, and grace. They are God's works; not only the gifts of his bounty, but the operations of his power; his wonderful works; the contrivance of them is admirable, and his condescension in bestowing them, admirable. All his wonderful works are the product of his thoughts to us-ward. He does all, according to the counsel of his own will, Eph. 1: 11. the purposes of his grace which He purposed in Himself, Eph. 3: 11. They are the projects of Infinite Wisdom, the designs of everlasting love, 1 Cor. 2: 7. Jer. 31: 3. thoughts of good only, Jer. 29: 11. His gifts and callings will therefore be without repentance, because they are not sudden resolves, but the result of his thoughts, his many thoughts, to us-ward. They are innumerable, and eternity itself will be too short to reckon them; they are in order, but so many, that we know not where to begin, nor which to name next; their order, references and dependencies are a mystery we shall not be able to account for, till the veil be rent, and the mystery of God finished: when we have said the most we can, of the wonders of divine love to us, we must conclude with an et cætera, and adore the depth, despairing to find the bottom.

V. 6—10. The psalmist, being struck with amazement at the wonderful works God had done for his people, is strangely carried out here to foretell that work of wonder which excels all the rest, and is the foundation and fountain of all, that of our redemption by our Lord Jesus Christ. God's thoughts concerning that work, were the most curious, the most copious, the most gracious, and therefore to be most admired. This paragraph is quoted by the apostle, Heb. 10: 5, &c. and applied to Christ, and his undertaking for us. As in the institutions, so in the devotions of the O. T. there is more of Christ than perhaps the O. T. saints were aware of. Observe,

1. The utter insufficiency of the legal sacrifices to atone for sin, in order to our peace with God and our happiness in Him; Sacrifice and offering Thou didst not desire; Thou wouldest not have the Redeemer to offer them; something He must have to offer, but not these, Heb. 8: 3. therefore He must not be of the house of Aaron, Heb. 7: 14. Or, In the days of the Messiah, burnt-offering and sin-offering will be no longer required, but all those ceremonial institutions will be abolished. But that is not all; even while the law concerning them was in full force, it might be said, God did not desire them, nor accept them, for their own sake; they could not take away the guilt of sin by satisfying God's justice; the terror of sin, by pacifying the conscience; nor the power of sin, by sanctifying the nature; it was impossible, Heb. 9: 9.—10: 1—4. What in them was valuable, resulted from their reference to Christ, of whom they were types. The Substance must come, who must bring that glory to God, and that grace to man, it was im-

9.—Morison pronounces this 'clear, sound reasoning,' and says, this, if any thing short of 'express divine authority,' would reconcile him to the view in question. Yet he inclines to the view of Dathe, 'that vs. 7—11. only belong strictly to the Messiah.'—Williams, in Cott. Bib. divides the Ps. after Kennicott, into three parts, the first of which vs. 1—5. he applies, primarily to David, and typically to the Redeemer; the second, vs. 6—10. to the incarnation and to that only; and the third, vs. 11—17. again to David: the second he regards as 'a kind of parenthesis, though an important one.'—Kennicott considers the Ps. as closing with v. 10. and thinks the remainder, with Ps. 70. which is manifestly incomplete, should form another Ps.; as Ps. 14. and Ps. 53. are different editions of the same Ps.; this Dr. J. P. Smith highly approves. ED.

Verses 1—5.

In this Ps. David seems to have intended to speak of his own case and experience; but the Holy Spirit led him to use language, which in its full meaning can be applied to none but the Lord Jesus Himself. The whole indeed may be accommodated to Him, yet some passages are more suited to the case of the type, than of the Antitype.—These vs. may be interpreted of the Redeemer's deep and dreadful sufferings, and the happy effects which followed his deliverance out of them.—Yet the passage may also be explained of David; and answers to some parts of the believer's experience. V. 3. and 4. may be connected as follows: 'Many shall see it, and fear, and shall trust in the LORD: Saying, Blessed is the man, &c.' (M. R.) SCOTT.

Verses 6—8.

It is uncertain, whether David had in these vs. any intention of declaring, that cheerful and prompt obedience to the precepts of the moral law, proceeding from faith and love, was more acceptable to God than legal sacrifices: (50:7—15. 1 Sam. 15:22.) but it is evident that the Holy Spirit foretold the obedience of the promised Messiah.—The apostle, in quoting this passage, follows nearly the translation of the LXX. which gives an interpretation, rather than a translation, of the words rendered, 'Mine ears hast thou opened.' But, as this variation did not at all affect his argument, or alter the meaning of the passage, it was not necessary, he should interrupt his subject by noticing it. (Heb. 10:5—10.) ID.

(6.) Mine ears, &c.] The apostle, Heb. 10:5. quotes from the Sept. 'a body,' &c. Kennicott supposes the original Heb. read, as some MSS. and versions 'body,' for ears. The word rendered 'opened,' means also 'to prepare' or 'obtain,' Deut. 2:6. 2 K. 6:23. and Hos. 3:2.; and 'ears,' by synecdoche, are taken for the whole body. So Rosenm.

possible those sacrifices should ever do.

2. The designation of our Lord Jesus to the work and office of Mediator; Mine ears hast Thou opened; God the Father disposed Him to the undertaking Isa. 50: 5, 6. and then obliged Him to go through with it. Mine ear hast Thou digged, is supposed to allude to binding servants to serve for ever, by boring their ear to the door post, Ex. 21: 6. Our Lord Jesus so loved, that he would not go out free from, his undertaking, therefore engaged to persevere for ever in it; and, for this reason, He is able to save us to the uttermost, because He has engaged to serve his Father to the uttermost, who upholds Him in it, Isa. 42: 1.

3. His own voluntary consent to this undertaking; 'Then said I, Lo, I come; then, when sacrifice and offering would not do, rather than the work should be undone, I said, Lo, I come, to enter the lists with the powers of darkness, and to advance the interests of God's glory and kingdom.' This bespeaks, (1.) That He freely offered Himself to this service, which He was under no engagement at all to, prior to his own voluntary susception: had He not been perfectly voluntary in it, He could not have been a Surety, for it is by this will, this mind of the Offerer, that we are sanctified, Heb. 10: 10. (2.) That He firmly obliged Himself to it; 'I come; I promise to come in the fulness of time.' Therefore the apostle says, 'It was when He came into the world that He had an actual regard to this promise, by which He had engaged his heart to approach unto God. (3.) That He frankly owned Himself engaged; He said, Lo, I come, said it all along to the O. T. saints, who therefore knew Him by the title of Ho Erchomenos, He that should come. This word was the foundation of their faith and hope, and which they looked and longed to have accomplished.

4. The reason why He came, in pursuance of his undertaking; because, in the volume of the book, the close-rolls of the divine decree and counsel, in the letters patent of the O. T. it was written of Him; Moses and all the prophets testified of Him; in all the rolls, volumes, of that book, something or other was written of Him, which He had an eye to, that all might be accomplished, John 19: 28.

5. The pleasure He took in his undertaking, v. 8, 9. I delight to do thy will, O my God; it was, to Christ, his meat and drink to go on with this work appointed to Him; John 4: 34. and the reason here given, is, Thy law is within my heart; it is written there, it rules there, it is an active commanding principle there. It is meant of the law, concerning the work and office of the Mediator, what He was to do and suffer; this law was dear to Him, and had an influence on Him in his whole undertaking. Note, When the law of God is written in our hearts, our duty will be our delight.

6. The publication of the Gospel to the children of men, even in the great congregation, v. 9, 10. The same that, as a Priest, wrought out redemption for us, as a Prophet, by his own preaching first, then by his apostles, and still by his Word and Spirit, makes it known to us. Observe, (1.) What is preached; righteousness, v. 9. God's righteousness, v. 10. the everlasting righteousness Christ has brought in, Dan. 9: 24. comp. Rom. 1: 16, 17. It is God's faithfulness to his promise, and the salvation long looked for; God's loving-kindness and truth, his mercy according to his Word. Note, In the work of our redemption, we ought to notice how bright all the divine attributes shine, and give to God the praise of each. (2.) To whom? the great congregation, v. 9. and again, v. 10. When Christ was here on earth, He preached to multitudes, thousands at a time. The Gospel was preached both to Jews and Gentiles, to great congregations of both. Solemn, religious assemblies are a divine institution, and in them the glory of God, in the face of Christ, ought to be both praised, to the glory of God, and preached for the edification of men. (3.) How? freely and openly; I have not refrained my lips, I have not hid it, I have not concealed it. This intimates, that whoever undertook to preach the Gospel of Christ, would be in great temptation to hide it and conceal it, because it must be preached with great contention, and in the face of great opposition; but Christ Himself, and those whom He calls to that work, set their faces as a flint, Isa. 50: 7. and were wonderfully carried on in it: and well for us they were so; thus our eyes come to see this joyful light, and our ears to hear this joyful sound; which otherwise we might for ever have perished in ignorance of.

V. 11—17. The psalmist, having meditated on the work of redemption, and spoken of it in the person of the Messiah, now comes to make improvement of the doctrine of his mediation between us and God, and therefore speaks in his own person. Christ having done his Father's will, and finished his work, and given orders for the preaching of the Gospel to every creature, we are encouraged to come boldly to the throne of grace, for mercy and grace.

1. This may encourage us, to pray for the mercy of God, and to put ourselves under the protection of that mercy, v. 11. Rom. 8: 32. The best saints are in continual danger, and see themselves undone, if not continually preserved by God's grace; and the everlasting loving-kindness and truth of God are what we have to depend on for our preservation to the heavenly kingdom, 61: 7.

2. This may encourage us, in reference to the guilt of sin, that Jesus Christ has done that towards our discharge from it which sacrifice and offering could not do. See here, (1.) The frightful sight he had of sin, v. 12. This was it that made the discovery he was now favored with, of a Redeemer, very welcome. Convinced, awak-

(Edit. 1831.)—The whole expression, 'mine ears hast thou opened,' is equivalent to, 'Thou hast made me to hear thy will'—'Thou hast revealed Thyself to me'—'Thou hast rendered me obedient.' So Morison, Stuart, Rosenm.' Dr. J. P. Smith, and the commentators generally.—That the expression has reference to the boring of the ear by way of indenture for perpetual servitude, as suggested by Henry, seems not generally approved. Dr. J. P. Smith says, the word rendered 'opened' is 'never used' in passages where the law is given relating to that ceremony. See Bush's Ill. on this and the next v. Ed.

(7.) Volume [Roll] of the book.] 'What book? Some say, the book of the divine decrees—the book of eternity; but this is a mere conceit in theology. Nor is it quite satisfactory to refer it to the Pentateuch, as do others; for though much is written in the Pentateuch concerning Christ and his work, it seems unnatural to restrict the record of Him to this particular portion of the O. T. I would therefore suggest, that the whole O. T. is referred to—all in fact written concerning Him, in the "Law of Moses, in the prophets, and in the Psalms," Luke 24:25—27, 44—46. Acts 3:18. 1 Pet. 1:11. True, no other part [?] of the ancient Scriptures was, at the time when this Ps. was penned, committed to writing, save the five books of Moses; yet, as the expression under consideration is a part of an acknowledged prophecy of the Messiah, it may be carried down to that period in the Redeemer's history, in which the prophetic testimony concerning Him was complete. Moreover, the apostle, in illustrating and applying this very prophecy, fixes the period of its reference to the time when the Messiah "cometh into the world," Heb. 10:5. at which time Moses, the Prophets, and the Psalms were all complete, and were all collected into one uniform record.' MORISON.

Verses 9, 10.

When David avowed the earnestness and boldness, with which he had celebrated the works and ways of God, he typified Christ in the performance of his prophetical office. (1—5. 22:22—25. 35:17—19. Heb. 2:10—13.)—The connection of the term, 'thy righteousness,' with loving-kindness, mercy, faithfulness, and salvation, and the evident subject of the passage, warrants this interpretation, and shows, that 'the righteousness of God, which is unto all and upon all that believe,' was primarily meant. (Rom. 3:21—26.) SCOTT.

(9.) Preached.] The Heb. word, tr. by the Sept. Evangelisamen, in the O. T. seems precisely to signify, preaching the Gospel, proclaiming glad tidings; as a similar word does in the Arabic. ID.

Verses 11, 12.

David might be here pleading for an interest in those mercies and that salvation, which he proclaimed to others; when he was struggling with those complicated evils, which were consequent to his iniquities in the matter of Uriah. These called his other sins to remembrance, which took such hold on him, and so discouraged him, that he should not have dared to look up, if it had not been for his belief of the infinite mercies of God. But some think, that Christ may be supposed to speak, in the depth of his humiliation, when our innumerable iniquities met upon Him, in his agony in the garden, and his sufferings on the cross. (69:4. Is. 53:4—7. Matt. 26:36—39. 27:46.)—The original of v. 11. is simply future: 'Thou wilt not withhold, &c.' ID.

(12.) 'I am not without suspicion, sustained by the opinion of some of the most distinguished biblical critics that ever lived, that the theme is here changed, and that David speaks in his own person, and expresses his own experience, and that of the church.' MORISON.

Verses 13—15.

(Ps. 70:) V. 13. is imperative, in which the Psalmist simply prays for deliverance: the others are throughout in the future, and naturally express the language of lively faith and hope, rather than that of wish-

PSALM XLI.

David shows the blessedness of those who consider the poor, 1—3. He prays for mercy, and complains of the treachery and malice of his enemies, and the ingratitude of one who had been his friend, 4—10. He expresses confidence in God, and praises Him, 11—13.

ened consciences are apprehensive of danger from their numberless sins of infirmity. The sight of sin so oppressed him, that he could not hold up his head; much less his heart. Note, The sight of our sins, in their own colors, would drive us to distraction, if we had not at the same time some sight of a Savior. (2.) The careful recourse he had to God, under the sense of sin; v. 10. seeing himself brought by his sins to the very brink of ruin, eternal ruin, with what a holy passion does he cry out, 'Be pleased, O Lord, to deliver me, v. 13. from the wrath to come, and my apprehensions of that wrath. In a case of this nature, where the bliss of an immortal soul is concerned, delays are dangerous; therefore, O Lord, make haste to help me.'

3. This may encourage us to hope for victory over our spiritual enemies, that seek after our souls to destroy them, v. 14. If Christ has triumphed over them, we, through Him, shall be more than conquerors. In the belief of this, we may pray, with humble boldness, as David in v. 14, 15. Both the conversion of a sinner, and the glorification of a saint, are great disappointments to Satan, who does his utmost to hinder both; now, our Lord Jesus having undertaken to bring about the salvation of all his chosen, we may in faith pray, that that great adversary may be confounded.

4. This may encourage all that seek God, and love his salvation, to rejoice in Him, and to praise Him, v. 16. See here, The character of good people. All that shall be saved love the salvation, not only as a salvation from hell, but from sin. And they that love his salvation shall be filled with the joy of his salvation, and shall say continually, The Lord be magnified; thus they shall have a heaven on earth; blessed are they that are thus still praising God.

Lastly, this may encourage the saints, in distress and affliction, to trust in God, and comfort themselves in Him, v. 17. David was a king, perhaps, now on the throne, yet, being troubled in spirit, he calls himself poor and needy, lost and undone, without a Savior; in want and distress, yet the Lord thinketh upon me, in and through the Mediator, by whom we are made accepted. Men forget the poor and needy, and seldom think of them; but God's thoughts toward them, which he had spoken of, v. 5. are their support and comfort, [and if they trust in Him and do good, He will in due time come to their deliverance, and not tarry].

Ps. XLI. God's kindness and truth have often been the support and comfort of the saints, when they have had most experience of men's unkindness and treachery. David here found it so on a sick bed. Is any afflicted with sickness? let him sing the beginning of this Ps. Is any persecuted by enemies? let him sing the latter end of it; and we may any of us, in singing it, meditate on both the calamities and comforts of good people in this world.

V. 1—4. In these verses, we have, I. God's promises of succor and comfort to those that consider the poor; and we may suppose David mentioned these, with application, either, To friends who were kind to him, and very considerate of his afflicted case: or, To himself; he had the testimony of his conscience, that he had considered the poor. Here is a comment on that promise; Blessed are the merciful, for they shall obtain mercy. Observe,

1. The mercy required; to consider the poor or afflicted, whether in mind, body, or estate: we must notice their affliction, inquire into their state; sympathize with them, judge charitably concerning them; wisely consider the poor; be ourselves instructed by the poverty and affliction of others; it must be Maschil to us, that is the word here.

2. The mercy promised. He that considers the poor, shall be considered by his God: not only be recompensed in the resurrection of the just, but be blessed on the earth; this branch of godliness, as much as any other, has the promise of the life that now is, and is usually recompensed with temporal blessings. Liberality to the poor is the surest and safest way of thriving; such as

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

We are here again called upon to contemplate the intense sufferings, into which our sins plunged the divine Savior, when He willingly gave Himself for us a sacrifice to God: the new song, which was put into his mouth, was intended for our use, that we may render praises unto our God: (Rev. 5: 8—10.) and the whole interesting scene, and all the mediatorial power and grace of our exalted Savior, were designed to warn sinners to flee from the wrath to come, and to put their entire trust in the mercy of the Lord. Happy are all they, who renounce every lying vanity and carnal confidence, thus to depend on the living God: they shall continually experience the faithfulness of his promises; and contemplate with admiring gratitude all the counsels of his love, and his wonderful works in behalf of his redeemed people: nor will they be able to eternity to exhaust the subject, or to recount all the particular instances of his mercy to them. Yet the incarnation and suretiship, the obedience and sufferings, of the Son of God, are the centre and the means of all other mercies to us. (John 3: 16. 14: 6. 1 John 4: 9—12.) Thus God is glorified, and sinners are saved: no costly sacrifices, nor even moral righteousness, can be acceptable from sinners to a holy God, except as they stand in relation to the person and atonement of his beloved Son. In his obedience unto death, the eternal purposes of JEHOVAH were accomplished; the types and prophecies of the O. T. were fulfilled; the law of God was magnified, and the demands of justice were satisfied. Had it not been for his voluntary sufferings, our sins would have taken such hold on us, that we should never have been able to look up: our hearts must indeed have failed, and in the horrible pit, whence there is no escape, our hopes would for ever have expired. Of this believers are fully convinced; and this should teach them patient submission under every trial. And if any are struggling with remorse of conscience, and fears of wrath, and, to their own apprehension, sinking in a deep and horrible pit; let them [repent, and believe on the Lord Jesus, and] cry humbly unto God, and He will hear and help them, and turn their fears and sorrows into joyful praises ing or desiring the destruction foreseen and predicted; and the transition is worthy our notice. A regard to the Sept. and other ancient vers. seems to have induced our venerable translators generally to put such passages in the imperative, which, at first view at least, gives them an appearance of harshness, not so congenial to the spirit of devotion. The two vs. however, viewed as predictions of the destruction, which awaits the obstinate enemies of Christ and his church, have been wonderfully accomplished in the dire end of many traitors and persecutors, and in the condition of the Jews to this day. 'All those who seek Thee shall be glad and rejoice in Thee; such as love thy salvation, shall say continually, The LORD be magnified.' 'I am confident, that this eventually will be the case; notwithstanding present temptations and sufferings.'—The clause, 'love thy salvation,' exactly discriminates a true believer from all other men. NOTES.

Ps. XLI. 'The title to this Ps. in the Syr. corresponds in a remarkable degree with the general character and spirit of the composition: "A Ps. of David, when he appointed overseers to take care of the poor." The Arab. recognises the mystical and prophetic bearings of the Ps: "A prophecy concerning the incarnation and the kiss of Judas." From the use made by our Lord of v. 9. (John 13.18.) we may fairly conclude it partakes of the spirit of prophecy, though I rather agree with Dr. Clarke, that the only prophetic allusion is in v. 9.' MORISON. Yet others, as Gill, think we may safely explain the whole, of Christ. ID.

practice it may be sure of seasonable and effectual relief from God. (1.) In all troubles; He will deliver them in the day of evil, so that, if any be hid in the day of the Lord's anger, they shall. Are they in danger? He will preserve and keep them alive. Do their enemies threaten them? God will not deliver them unto the will of their enemies; and the most potent enemy we have can have no power against us, but what is given him from above. The good-will of God is sufficient to secure us from the ill-will of all that hate us, men or devils! and that good will we may promise ourselves an interest in, if we have considered the poor, and helped to relieve and rescue them. (2.) Particularly in sickness, v. 3. This is a very condescending expression, alluding to the care of those that nurse and tend sick people, especially of mothers for their children when sick, which is to make their beds easy for them. He will turn his bed, (so the word is,) to shake it up, and make it very easy; or, he will turn it into a bed of health. Note, God has promised his people that he will strengthen them, and make them easy, under their bodily pains and sicknesses. He has not promised they shall never be sick, nor that they shall not lie long languishing, nor that their sickness shall not be unto death; but He has promised to enable them to bear their affliction with patience, and cheerfully to wait the issue; the soul shall by his grace be made to dwell at ease, when the body lies in pain.

II. David's prayer, directed and encouraged by these promises, v. 4. I said, Heal my soul. It is good to keep some account of our prayers, that we may not unsay, in our practices, any thing we said in our prayers. He appeals to mercy, as one that knew he could not stand the test of strict justice. The best saints must throw themselves on mercy. Sin is the sickness of the soul, pardoning mercy and renewing grace heal it; and this spiritual healing we should be more earnest for, than for bodily health. He penitently confesses; 'I have sinned against Thee, therefore my soul needs healing; I am a sinner, a miserable sinner, therefore, God be merciful to me,' Luke 18: 13. It does not appear that this has any reference to any particular, gross act of sin, but, in general, to his many sins of infirmity, which his sickness set in order before him.

V. 5—13. David often complains of the insolent conduct of his enemies toward him, when he was sick, which was very barbarous in them, and grievous to him. They were not, indeed, arrived at that modern [?] pitch of wickedness, to poison his meat and drink, or give him something to make him sick; but, when he was sick, they insulted over him, v. 5. designing thereby to grieve his spirit, to ruin his reputation, and so to sink his interest.

1. They longed for his death; When shall he die, and his name perish with him? We ought not to desire the death of any; but to desire the death of useful men, for their usefulness, has much in it of the venom of the old serpent. They envied him his name, and honor, and doubted not but, if he were dead, that would be laid in the dust with him; yet, see how they were mistaken; when he had served his generation, he did die, Acts 13: 36. but did his name perish? No, it lives and flourishes, to this day, in the sacred writings, and will, to the end of time; for the memory of the just is, and shall be, blessed.

2. They picked up every thing they could, to reproach him with, v. 6. 'If he come to see me,' (it has always been reckoned a neighborly kindness to visit the sick,) 'he speaks vanity; he pretends friendship, tells me he is very sorry to see me so much indisposed, and wishes me my health; but it is all flattery and falsehood.' David's friends were all compliment, nor was that the worst of it; they came to see him on a mischievous design, that they might make invidious remarks on every thing he said or did, and represent it as they pleased to others, so as to render him odious or ridiculous; His heart gathereth iniquity to itself, puts ill constructions on every thing; and then, when he goes among his companions, he tells it them, that they may tell it others; Report, say they, and we will report it, Jer. 20: 10. If he complained much, they would reproach him for his pusillanimity; if scarcely at all, for his stupidity. If he prayed, or gave them good counsel, they would banter it, and call it canting; if he kept silence from good, when the wicked were before him, they would say he had forgotten his religion, now he was sick. There is no fence against those whose malice thus gathers iniquity.

3. They promised themselves he would never recover, nor ever wipe off the odium they had loaded him with; they whispered together against him, v. 7. speaking that secretly, to one another, which they could not for shame speak out, and which, if they did, they knew would be confuted; whisperers and backbiters are put together among the worst of sinners, Rom. 1: 29, 30. and there is seldom whispering, (we say,) but there is lying, or some mischief on foot. Those whisperers devised evil to David; concluding he would die quickly, they contrived how to undo all he had hitherto been doing for the public good: this he calls devising hurt against him; and they doubted not but to gain their point; reproach, they hoped, would cleave so fast to him, that his name would perish with him, and then they should gain their point; they went by a modern maxim, Fling abundance of calumny, and part will be sure to stick. The disease he is now under will certainly end him; for it is the punishment of some enormous crime, he will not repent of, and proves him, however he has appeared, a son of Belial; or, it is inflicted by Satan, who is called Belial, the wicked one, 2 Cor. 6: 15. We are not to think it strange, if, when good men are sick, there be those that hope for their death, as well as those that fear it, which makes the world not worthy of them, Rev. 11: 10.

4. There was one particularly, in whom he had reposed great confidence, that took part with his enemies, and was as abusive to him as any of them, v. 9. My own familiar friend; probably, he means Ahithophel, who had been his bosom friend, and prime minister of state; those are wicked indeed, whom no courtesy done them, nor confidence reposed in them, will oblige; yet let us not think it strange, if we receive abuses from such: David did, and the Son of David; for of Judas the traitor David here, in the Spirit, spake; our Savior Himself so expounds this, and therefore gave Judas the sop, that the Scripture might be fulfilled, John ness: or rather he had previously been visited with some dangerous disorder, from which his enemies hoped he would not recover; and this emboldened them in their treasonable practices. (4—8. 30:1,2. 38:3—10.) Finding his own afflictions aggravated by their cruelty and perfidy; he was led to commend that temper of mind, which disposed a man to consider, and compassionate and relieve, the poor and afflicted; and to declare him happy who possessed it. Some render the first clause, 'Blessed is he that judgeth wisely of the poor:' not condemning him as accursed whom God doth visit,' (as Job's friends did him;) 'knowing that there are divers causes why God layeth his hand upon us, yea and afterward He restoreth us.' It is, however, generally understood to refer to the considerate, active, and liberal kindness, shown to the poor and afflicted, from genuine faith and love. (M. R. a.)—It is astonishing to the student of Scripture, in reading the most admired writings of pagan moralists, to observe, how entirely this branch of morality is omitted! Certainly it is peculiar to the Scriptures, and to writings formed on them. (P. O. Deut. 15: concl.) SCOTT.

Verse 9.

As David was a type of Christ, so was Ahithophel in some respects of Judas. The latter clause of this v. was fulfilled in Judas's ungrateful and cruel treachery. But Christ never trusted in him, as David had confided in Ahithophel; and therefore the former part was more suited to the type than to the Antitype. (55:12—15. 20, 21. 109 2—5. 2 Sam. 15:12, 31. 16:20—23. 17:1—4. John 13:18—30.)—'The sufferings of the church, like those of her Redeemer, generally begin at home; . . . and, unnatural as it may seem, they, who have waxed fat upon her bounty, are sometimes the first to 'lift up the heel' against her.' Bp. Horne. (Deut. 32:15.) SCOTT.—Mine own familiar friend.] 'Either Ahithophel' or some other perfidious counsellor or courtier, who was a type of Judas, as David was of Christ.—These words were literally fulfilled in David, yet the Holy Ghost looked further in them, even to Christ and Judas.' POOLE.—'It is somewhat difficult to determine the principle on which this v. is applicable to the Messiah. Some think, as Dr. A. Clarke, our Lord may have selected some scene in David's life similar to the treachery of Judas, and applied it to his own case, John 13:18, 26. others, that a prophetic spirit pervades this v. and Christ determined its distinct bearing on Himself, as betrayed into the hands of wicked men: others still consider David as speaking in the person of Christ. The second opinion appears most reasonable.' [Note. 49: 5.] MORISON.

PSALM XLII.

13: 18, 26. Nay, have not we ourselves carried it thus perfidiously and disingenuously toward God? We eat of his bread daily, and yet lift up the heel against Him, as Jeshurun, Deut. 32: 15.

How did David bear this insolent, ill-natured carriage?

1. He prayed to God that they might be disappointed. He said nothing to them, but turned himself to God, v. 10. He had prayed in reference to the guilt of his sins, v. 4. Lord, be merciful to me; and now again, in reference to the insults of his enemies, Lord, be merciful to me, for that prayer will suit every case. God's mercy has in it a redress for every grievance. 'They endeavor to run me down, but, Lord, do thou raise me up, that I may requite them, that I may render them good for evil;' so some; for that was David's practice, 7: 4. 35: 13. A good man will wish to make it appear, that he bears no malice to those that have been injurious to him, but, on the contrary, is ready to do them any good office. Or, 'That, as a king, I may put them under the marks of my just displeasure, banish them the court, and forbid them my table for the future;' which would be a necessary piece of justice, for warning to others. Perhaps in this prayer is couched a prophecy of the exaltation of Christ, whom God raised up, that He might be a just Avenger of all the wrongs done to Him and to his people, particularly by the Jews, whose utter destruction followed, not long after.

2. He assured himself they would be disappointed, v. 11. 'By this I know that Thou favorest me and my interest, because mine enemy doth not triumph over me.' They hoped for his death, but he found himself, through mercy, recovering; and this would add to the comfort of his recovery, that it would be a disappointment to his adversaries, a token of God's favor to him, and a certain evidence that He did favor him, and would continue to do so. Note, When we can discern the favor of God to us, in any mercy personal or public, that doubles it, and sweetens it: we may take pleasure in the designs of our enemies being frustrated, though not in their fall.

3. He depends on God, who had thus delivered him from many an evil work, to preserve him to his heavenly kingdom, as blessed Paul, 2 Tim. 4: 18. Note, (1.) When at any time we suffer in our reputation, our chief concern should be about our integrity, and then we may cheerfully leave it to God to secure our reputation. David knows, that if he can but persevere in his integrity, he needs not fear his enemies' triumphs over him. (2.) The best man in the world holds his integrity no longer than God upholds him in it; for by his grace we are what we are; if we be left to ourselves, we shall not only fall, but fall away. (3.) It is a great comfort to us, that, however weak we are, God is able to uphold us in our integrity, and will do it, if we commit the keeping of it to Him. (4.) If the grace of God did not take a constant care of us, we should not be upheld in our integrity; his eye is always upon us, else we should soon start aside from Him. (5.) Those whom God now upholds in their integrity, He will set before his face for ever, and make happy in the vision and fruition of Himself; He that endures to the end, shall be saved.

4. The Ps. concludes with a solemn doxology, or adoration of God as the Lord God of Israel, v. 13. It is not certain whether this v. pertains to this particular Ps.; if so, it teaches us this, That a believing hope of our preservation through grace to glory, is enough to fill our hearts with joy, and our mouths with everlasting praise, even in our greatest straits; or, this v. may have been added as the conclusion of the first book of Psalms, which is reckoned to end here; the like being subjoined to 72: 89: 106: and then it teaches us to make God the End, who is the Beginning, of every good work. We are taught, (1.) To give glory to God as the Lord God of Israel, a God in covenant with his people; who has done great and kind things for them, and has more and better in reserve. (2.) To give Him glory as an eternal God, that has both his being and his blessedness from everlasting and to everlasting. (3.) To do this with great affection and fervor of spirit; intimated in the double seal set to it; Amen and Amen; Be it so now, be it so to all eternity. We say, Amen to it, and let all others say, Amen, too.

Ps. XLII. If the book of Pss. be, as some have styled it, a looking-glass of pious and devout affections, this psalm, in particular, deserves, as much as any one psalm, to be so entitled, and is as proper as any other to kindle and excite such in us: gracious desires are here strong and fervent; gracious hopes and fears, joys and sorrows, are here struggling, but the pleasing passion comes off a conqueror. Or we may take it for a conflict between sense and faith: sense objecting, and faith answering. Faith begins with holy desires toward God, and communion with Him, v. 1, 2. Sense complains of the darkness and cloudiness of the present condition, aggravated by the remembrance of the former enjoyments, v. 3, 4. Faith silences the complaint with the assurance of a good issue at last, v. 5. Sense renews its complaints of the present dark and melancholy state, v. 6, 7. Faith holds up the heart, notwithstanding, with hope that the day will dawn, v. 8. Sense repeats its lamentations, (v. 9, 10.) and sighs out the same remonstrance it had before made of its grievances. Faith gets the last word, (v. 11.) for the silencing of the complaints of sense, and now it prevails and carries the day. Most probably David penned the psalm; and, we may conjecture, at a time when, either by Saul's persecution, or Absalom's rebellion, he was driven from the sanctuary, and cut off from the privilege of waiting on God in public ordinances. The strain of it is much the same with 63, and therefore we may presume it was penned by the same hand, and on the same or a like occasion. In singing it, if we be either in outward affliction, or in inward distress, we may accommodate to ourselves the melancholy expres-

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The people of God are not exempted from poverty, sickness, or any external affliction: but He considers their case and wants, and vouchsafes them relief proportioned to the exigency.—After the Lord's example of kindness and compassion, the believer has also learned to consider his poor and afflicted brethren. In them he sees the once suffering Savior; and gratitude to Him unites with love to his people, in disposing him to alleviate their sorrows, and supply their wants, according to his opportunity and ability: nor does he exclude any other sufferers from his deep compassion, and such relief as he can afford them; or decline labor and self-denial in order to confer it. Thus he evidences the reality of his faith, and obtains the assurances of gracious supports from God, when afflictions fall to his lot. SCOTT.

Verse 13.

'There is some probability this v. was added by the original collector of the book, and similar additions will be found to have been made to the other three divisions.—The word "AMEN" is used in Greek, Eng. and [most] other languages, and generally denotes, as Ainsworth observes, unity of faith and spirit. It implies both a wishing of any thing so to be, and a persuasion by faith that so it shall be.' MORISON.

NOTES.

Ps. XLII. Title.] Rendered in the old tr. 'A Psalm to give instruction, committed to the sons of Korah.' SCOTT.—Sons of Korah.] 'Perhaps a society, (so Mudge,) of musicians, who derived their name from Korah its president or founder; or perhaps the descendants of that Levite who rebelled against Moses, Num. 16. some of whose sons died not with their father. Num. 26:11. 16:24, 26. Samuel the prophet was one of the race of Korah, and Heman his nephew was a singer, 1 Chr. 6:33. Whoever they were, the Pss. characterized by reference to them, seem to have been only dedicated to them. They are, in general, rich in consolation to the sorrowing and afflicted, and partake more of the spirit of the man after God's own heart than of any other of all Israel's prophets.' MOR.—Dr. A. Clarke supposes them to have been written during the Bab. captivity, with how much probability of truth the reader must judge.—Rosenm. thinks, none of the Pss. whose titles have 'for the sons of Korah' were written by David. sions we find here; if not, we must, in singing them, sympathize with those whose case they speak too plainly, and thank God it is not our own case; but those passages in it, which express and excite holy desires toward God, and dependence on Him, we must earnestly endeavor to bring our minds up to.

V. 1—5. Holy love to God, as the Chief Good, and our Felicity, is the power of godliness, the very life and soul of religion, without which, all external professions and performances are but a shell and carcass: now here we have some of the expressions of that love.

I. Holy love, thirsting; love on the wing, soaring upward in holy desires toward the Lord, and toward the remembrance of his name, v. 1, 2. Observe,

1. When it was that David thus expressed his vehement desire toward God. (1.) He was now debarred from outward opportunities of waiting on God; banished to the land of Jordan, a great way off from the courts of God's house. Note, Sometimes God teaches us effectually to know the worth of mercies by the want of them. The manna that we loathe when plenty, will be very precious, when scarce. (2.) He was deprived, in a great measure, of the inward comfort he used to have in God; now he went mourning, but panting. Note, Lamenting after God is as sure an evidence that we love Him, as rejoicing in God.

2. The Object of his desire, and what he thus thirsts after. (1.) God. Not the ordinances themselves, but the God of the ordinances. A gracious soul can take little satisfaction in God's courts, if it do not meet with God Himself there; 'Oh that I knew where I might find Him! That I might have more tokens of his favor, the graces and comforts of his Spirit, and the earnests of his glory!' (2.) The living God, that has life in Himself, and is the Fountain of life and all happiness to those that are his; the living God, not only in opposition to dead idols, but to all the dying comforts of this world, which perish in the using. Living souls can never take up their rest any where short of a living God. (3.) To come and appear before God; to make himself known to Him, as conscious of his own sincerity; to attend Him as a servant his master, to pay his respects to Him, and receive his commands; to give an account to Him, as one from whom our judgment proceeds. To appear before God is as much the desire of the upright, as the dread of the hypocrite. The psalmist knew he could not come into God's courts, but he must incur expense, for so was the law, that none should appear before God empty; yet he longs to come, and will not grudge the charges.

3. The degree of this desire. It is very importunate, it is his soul that pants, and thirsts, which bespeaks not only the sincerity, but the strength, of his desire. He compares it to the panting of a hart, or deer, naturally hot and dry, especially of a hunted buck, after the water-brooks. Thus earnestly does a gracious soul desire communion with God; thus impatiently want that; so impossible does it find it to take up in any thing short of that; and so insatiable is it in taking the pleasures of that communion, when the opportunity returns, still thirsting after the full enjoyment of Him in the heavenly kingdom.

II. Holy love, mourning for God's present withdrawings, and the want of the benefit of solemn ordinances, v. 3. His circumstances were sorrowful, and he accommodated himself to them, received the impressions, and returned the signs, of sorrow; even the royal prophet was a weeping prophet, when he wanted the comforts of God's house. It was a satisfaction to him, that he found his heart so much affected with a grievance of this nature. Observe, He did not think it enough to shed a tear or two, at parting from the sanctuary, but, as long as he continued under a forced absence, he never looked up, but wept, day and night. Note, Those that are deprived of the benefit of public ordinances, constantly miss them, and therefore should constantly mourn the want of them, till restored again.

Two things aggravated his grief:

1. The reproaches his enemies teased him with, v. 4. (1.) Because he was absent from the ark, the token of God's presence; judging of the God of Israel by the gods of the heathen, they concluded he had lost his God. But, though we are bound to ordinances, when they are to be had, God is not; we know where our God is, though we know not where his ark is; wherever we are, there is a way open heaven-ward. (2.) Because God did not immediately appear for him, they concluded He had abandoned him; but herein also they were deceived: however, nothing is more grievous to a gracious soul, than that which is intended to shake its hope and confidence in God.

2. The remembrance of his former liberties and enjoyments, v. 4. Son, remember thy good things, is a great aggravation of evil things; so much do our powers of reflection and anticipation add to the grievance of the present. But what occasioned this painful melting of spirit? Not the remembrance of court pleasures, or the entertainments of his own house, from which he was now banished; but the remembrance of his former free access to God's house, and pleasure in attending the sacred solemnities there. In his time it was but a tent; nay, if this Ps. was penned, as many think, at the time of his being persecuted by Saul, the ark was then in a private house; 2 Sam. 6: 3. yet this did not lessen his esteem of that sacred symbol of the divine presence. David was a courtier, a prince, a man of honor, a man of business, yet very diligent in attending God's house, and joining in public ordinances; even in the days of Saul, when he and his great men inquired not at it, 1 Ch. 13: 3. Whatever others did, David and his house would serve the Lord. He went with the multitude, thought it no disparagement to his dignity, to head a crowd in attending on God. Nay, this added to the pleasure of it, therefore it is twice mentioned, as what he greatly lamented the want of now. The more the better, in the service of God; it is more like heaven, and a sensible help to our comfort in the communion of saints. He went with the voice of joy and praise; not only with joy and praise in his heart, but with the outward expressions of it, proclaiming his joy, and speaking forth the high praises of his God. Note, When we wait on God in public ordinances, we have reason to do it both with cheerfulness and thankfulness, to take to ourselves the comfort, and give to God the glory, of our liberty of access to Him. He went also to keep holy-days, not in vain mirth and recreation, but in religious exercises. Solemn days are spent most comfortably in solemn assemblies.

III. Holy love, hoping, v. 5. Why art thou cast down, O my soul? His sorrow was on a very good account, yet it must not exceed its due limits, nor prevail to depress the spirits; he therefore communes with his own heart, for his relief. This may be taken as an inquiring question; 'Let the cause of this uneasiness be duly weighed; is it a just cause?' Our disquietudes would often vanish before a strict scrutiny into the grounds and reasons of them. Or, it may be taken as an expostulating question; those that commune much with their own hearts, will often have occasion to chide them, as David did here. 'Why do I thus dishonor God by my melancholy dejections? Why discourage others, and so much injure myself? Can I give a good account of this tumult?' But whatever the cause, here we have the cure of his disquietude; Hope thou in God, for I shall yet praise Him. A believing confidence in God is a sovereign antidote against prevailing despondency, and disquiet of spirit. Therefore, when we chide ourselves for our dejections, we must charge ourselves to hope in God; when the soul embraces itself, it sinks; if it catch hold on the power and promise of God, it keeps the head above water. Hope in God, 1. That He shall have glory from us; 'I shall yet praise Him.' It is the greatest honor and happiness of a man, and the greatest desire and hope of every good man, to be unto God for a name and a praise. What is the crown of heaven's bliss but this, that there we shall be for ever praising God? And what is our support under our present woes but this, that we shall yet praise God, that they shall not prevent, or abate, our endless hallelujahs? 2. That we shall have comfort in Him. We shall praise Him for the help of his countenance; for his favor, and the support we have by it, and satisfaction in it. Those that know how to value and improve the light of God's countenance, will find in that a suitable, seasonable, and sufficient help, in the worst of times, furnishing them with constant matter for praise. David's believing expectation of this kept him from sinking, nay, from drooping; his harp was a palliative cure of Saul's melancholy, but his hope an effectual cure of his own.

Land of Jordan.] 'The country E. of Jordan embracing Reuben, Gad, and the Half Tribe of Manasseh. The country W. of the Jordan only was properly called Canaan. Into this region David had betaken himself in flight from his son, 2 Sam. 17:22.—Of the Hermonites.] This describes his situation more precisely. Hermon is the name of the eastern Anti-Lebanon range of mountains, which bounds the land of Israel on the N. [Note, Josh. 12:3.] The term Hermonites, like Alps and Apennines, has its origin from the circumstance, that the mountain has a number of summits.—Mahanaim was at the foot of Mount Hermon.' V. 6—11. Complaints and comforts here, as before, take their turn, like day and night, in nature.

I. He complains of the dejections of his spirit, but comforts himself with the thoughts of God, v. 6. It is a great support to us, when on any account we are distressed, that we have liberty of access to God, and may open to Him the causes of our dejection. David had communed with his own heart, and had not as yet found relief; therefore he turns to God. Note, When we cannot get relief for our burdened spirits, by pleading with ourselves, we should try what we can do, by praying to God, and leaving our case with Him. Finding the disease very painful, David had recourse to devotion as a sovereign remedy. Note, The way to forget the sense of our miseries, is, to remember the God of our mercies. It was an uncommon case, when the psalmist remembered God, and was troubled, 77: 3. He had often remembered God, and was comforted, therefore he had recourse to that expedient now. He was now driven to the utmost borders of Canaan, to shelter himself there from his persecutors; sometimes to the country about Jordan, when discovered there, to the land of the Hermonites, or to a hill called Mizar, or the little hill; but, wherever he went, he remembered God, and kept up his secret communion with Him; and wherever he was, he retained his affection for the courts of God's house; from the land of Jordan, or from the top of the hills, he used to take a long, a longing look, toward the place of the sanctuary, and wish himself there. Distance and time could not make him forget what his heart was so much upon, and what lay so near it.

II. He complains of the tokens of God's displeasure against him, but comforts himself with the hopes of the return of his favor in due time.

1. He saw his troubles coming from God's wrath, and that discouraged him, v. 7. 'Deep calls unto deep, one affliction on another, as if called to hasten after it;' and by water-spouts may be meant the terrors and tosses of his mind, under the apprehensions of God's anger: a deluge of grief. Or, it is an allusion to a ship at sea, in a great storm, tossed by the roaring waves, which go over it, 107: 25. Whatever waves and billows of affliction go over us at any time, we must call them God's waves and his billows; for the waves and billows are under a divine check. Let not good men think it strange, if they be exercised with many and various trials; God knows what He does, and so shall they shortly. Jonah, in the whale's belly, made use of these words of David, Jon. 2: 3. they are exactly the same in the original, and of him they were literally true, All thy waves and thy billows are gone over me; for the book of Psa. is contrived so as to reach every one's case.

2. He expected his deliverance to come from God's favor, v. 8. Observe, (1.) What he promised himself from God; The Lord will command his loving-kindness. He eyes the favor of God, as the fountain of all the good he looked for: God's conferring of his favor, is called his commanding it; this intimates its freeness and efficacy. He commands deliverance, 44: 4. commands the blessing, 133: 3. as one having authority. (2.) What he promised for himself to God. If God command his loving-kindness for him, he will welcome it with his best affections and devotions. [1.] He will rejoice in God; In the night, his song shall be with me. The mercies we receive in the day, we ought to return thanks for at night; see 119: 62. At midnight, will I rise to give thanks. In silence and solitude, when retired from the hurries of the world, we must be pleasing ourselves with the thoughts of God's goodness. Or in the night of affliction; 'Before the day dawns, in which God commands his loving-kindness, I will sing songs of praise in the prospect of it.' Even in tribulation, the saints can rejoice in hope of the glory of God, Rom. 5: 2, 3. It is God's prerogative to give songs in the night, Job 35: 10. [2.] He will seek to God in a constant dependence on Him; My prayer shall be to the God of my life. Our believing expectation of mercy must not supersede, but quicken, our prayers for it. And from God what good may not we expect? It would put life into our prayers, in them to eye God as the God of our life; for then it is for our lives, and the lives of our souls, that we stand up to make request.

III. He complains of his enemies' insolence, yet comforts himself in God as his Friend, v. 9—11.

1. It must needs grieve a man that truly loves his country, and seeks the good of it, to see himself persecuted and hardly used, as an enemy to it. Yet David ought not hence to have concluded that God had forgotten him, (v. 9.) and cast him off, nor thus to have expostulated with God, as if He did him as much wrong in suffering him to be trampled on, as they did that trampled on him. We may complain to but not of God. They reproached him so cuttingly, it was a sword in his bones, v. 10. He had mentioned before what the reproach was, and here he repeats it, They say daily unto me, Where is thy God? A reproach which was therefore very grievous, because it reflected dishonor on God, and was intended to discourage his hope in God, which he had enough to do to keep alive, and which was but too apt to fail of itself.

2. His comfort is, that God is his Rock, v. 9. A Rock to build upon, to take shelter in; the Rock of ages, in whom is everlasting strength. To Him he had access with confidence; therefore he repeats what he had said, v. 5. and concludes with it, v. 11. Why art thou cast down, O my soul? Note, It may be of great use to us, to think our good thoughts over again, and if we do not gain our point with them at first, perhaps we may the second time; however, where the heart goes

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The believer, in proportion to the degree in which he is spiritually-minded, will continually either be rejoicing in the living God, or mourning after Him; and he looks especially with longing expectation for that season, when He shall appear before Him in the temple above, and be for ever satisfied in his favor, and in that joy with which his manifested glory fills every enraptured beholder. (Matt. 5: 8.)—We may have great cause to mourn for sin, and to pray against prevailing impiety: but our great dejection, even under the severest outward afflictions or inward trials, springs from unbelief and a rebellious will: we should therefore strive and pray against it, and endeavor to hope in God, persuaded that we shall 'yet praise Him for the salvation of his countenance.' And if one trouble follow hard after another, let us remember that they all are appointed and over-ruled by the Lord, and that we deserve more than all we endure on earth: let us recollect how Jesus said, 'My soul is exceeding sorrowful even unto death;' and how He suffered both from the cruelty of man, the rage of Satan, and the justice of the Father: yet was He heard and delivered. In his name, let us hope and pray: one word from Him will calm every storm, turn the midnight darkness into the light of noon, and the bitterest complaints into joyful praises. SCOTT.

(7.) Water-spouts.] Some, as Boothr. refer this to mountain cataracts, others to water-spouts occasioned by a whirlwind formed by opposing currents of air, on the water. 'From a dense cloud a cone descends in the form of a trumpet, with the small end downwards: at the same time, the surface of the sea under it is agitated and whirled round, the waters are converted [in consequence of the rarefaction of the air above?] into vapor, and ascend, with a spiral motion, till they unite with the cone from the cloud: frequently, however, they disperse before this junction. [Electricity, also, is thought greatly to influence these phenomena.] Both columns diminish towards their point of contact, where they are not above 3 or 4 ft. in diam. In the middle there is a white, transparent tube, less distinct on approaching it; and it is then discovered to be a vacant space, in which none of the small particles of water ascend; and in this, as well as around the outer edges, of the water-spout, large drops of rain precipitate themselves. Water-spouts sometimes continue a quarter of an hour.' Enc. Am. Travellers state, that they are common on the coasts of Syria. On our own Lake Champlain, they have been noticed: and may perhaps occur on the Sea of Galilee, (near which David was,) surrounded as it is by mountains, through whose narrow gorges gusts of wind are ever coming to disturb the water. The Dead Sea, too, may perhaps be exposed to such whirlwinds and their consequences. Roberts says of one he saw, 'The noise the water made in rushing from the water-spout, and again dashing into the sea, strongly recalled the expression, "Deep calleth unto deep," &c.' The expression is singularly beautiful and sublime; mark, too, the Psalmist, though speaking to 'ears polite,' refers all to God, they are not Nature's water-spouts, but 'Thy water-spouts,' God's water-spouts. A popular, cant phraseology, which estranges us from God, should be discountenanced by the Christian. Notes, Ruth 2 4. ED.

PSALM XLIII.

The Psalmist prays, that God would judge his cause, and restore him to his sanctuary, 1—3. He anticipates his joy and praise which should then take place, and encourages himself to hope in God, 4, 5.

along with the words, it is no vain repetition. We have need to press the same thing over and over again on our hearts, and all little enough. but now he adds one word to it; there, he hoped to praise God for the salvation that was in his countenance; here, 'I will praise Him,' says he, 'as the Salvation of my countenance, from the present cloud that is upon it; if God smile on me, that will make me look pleasant, look up, look forward, look round, with pleasure.' He adds also, and my God, 'related to me, in covenant with me; all that He is, all that He has, is mine, according to the true intent and meaning of the promise;' this thought enabled him to triumph over all his griefs and fears; God's being with the saints in heaven, and being their God, is that which will wipe away all tears from their eyes, Rev. 21: 3, 4.

Ps. XLIII. V. 1—5. This Ps. it is likely, was penned on the same occasion with the former, and, having no title, may be looked upon as an appendix to it; the malady presently returning, he had immediate recourse to the same remedy. V. 2. of this Ps. is almost the very same with v. 9. of the foregoing, as the 5th of this is exactly the same with the 11th of that. Christ Himself, who had the Spirit without measure, when there was occasion, prayed a second and third time, saying the same words, Matt. 26: 44. David here makes his application to God by faith and prayer, as his Judge, his Strength, his Guide, his Joy, his Hope, with suitable affections and expressions.

I. As his Judge, v. 1. There were those that impeached him, against them he appeals to the court of heaven, the supreme judicature; praying to have their judgment against him reversed, and his innocency cleared. There were those that had injured him, against them he exhibits his complaint to Him, who is the Avenger of wrong, praying for justice for himself, and on them. Observe, 1. With whom he had this struggle. A body of sinful men, whom he calls an ungodly or unmerciful nation; their head was a deceitful, unjust man; most probably, Saul, who not only showed no kindness to David, but dealt most perfidiously and dishonestly with him. If Absalom was meant, his character was no better. Some think David, by the spirit of prophecy, calculated this Ps. for the use of the Jews in their captivity in Babylon, and that the Chaldeans are the ungodly nation here meant; to them it was very applicable, but only as other like scriptures, none of which are of private interpretation. God might design it for their use, whether David did or no. 2. His prayer with reference to them; Judge me. As to the quarrel God had with him for sin, he prays, 'Enter not into judgment with me, for then I shall be condemned;' but as to the quarrel his enemies had with him, he prays, 'Lord, judge me, for I know that I shall be justified, plead my cause against them, take my part, and in thy providence appear on my behalf.' He that has an honest cause may expect that God will plead it. We must reckon our cause sufficiently pleaded, if we be delivered, though our enemies be not destroyed.

II. As his Strength, v. 2. David now went mourning, destitute of spiritual joys, yet he found God to be the God of his strength If we cannot comfort ourselves in God, we may stay ourselves on Him, and have spiritual supports when we want spiritual delights. David here pleads this with God; 'Thou art the God on whom I depend as my Strength; why then cast me off?' This was a mistake; for God never cast off any that trusted in Him, whatever their melancholy apprehensions. 'Thou art the God of my strength; why then is mine enemy too strong for me, and why go I mourning because of his oppressive power?' It is hard to reconcile the mighty force of the church's enemies with the almighty power of the church's God; but the day will reconcile them, when all his enemies shall become his footstool.

III. As his Guide, v. 3. He prays, 1. That God by his providence would bring him back from his banishment, and open a way for him again to the free enjoyment of the privileges of God's sanctuary. His heart is only on the holy hills and the tabernacles, nothing so amiable in his eyes as those; thither he would be brought back. In order to this, he prays, 'Send out thy light and thy truth; let me have this as a fruit of thy favor, which is light, and the performance of thy promise, which is truth.' We need desire no more to make us happy, than the good that flows from God's favor, and is included in his promise. Note, Those whom God leads, He leads to his holy hill, and to his tabernacles; those therefore who pretend to be led by the Spirit, and yet turn their backs on instituted ordinances, certainly deceive themselves. 2. That God by his grace would bring him into communion with Himself, and prepare him for the vision and fruition of Himself in the other world. Some Jewish writers by light and truth here understand Messiah the Prince, and Elias his forerunner; these are come in answer to the prayers of the O. T.; but we are still to pray for God's light and truth, the Spirit of light and truth, who supplies the want of Christ's bodily presence, to lead us into the mystery of godliness, and to guide us in the way to heaven. When God sends his light and truth into our hearts, those will guide us to the upper world in all our devotions, as well as in all our aims and expectations; and if we conscientiously follow that light and that truth, they will certainly bring us to the holy hill above.

IV. As his Joy, v. 4. He will get as near as he can to God, his exceeding Joy. Note, 1. Those that come to the tabernacles, should come to the altar; those that come to ordinances, should qualify themselves to come, and then come to special ordinances, to those that are most affecting and most binding. The nearer we come, the closer we cleave, to God, the better. 2. Those that come

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Under the returns of distress and disconsolation, we should, again and again, have recourse to the effectual and only remedy of faith and prayer.—No eminence or usefulness can exempt any pious man from the contempt or injuries of the wicked; whether he have to do with collective bodies, or individuals. But we should commit our cause to God, and He will plead it, and deliver us from every unrighteous and treacherous assault. And though inward temptations often concur with outward afflictions, yet God will never cast off those, who trust in Him as their Protector and Strength, according to his merciful and faithful promises. We should therefore discard such dishonorable fears, and resolve still to 'hope in God.' SCOTT.

NOTES.

Ps. XLIII. 'The subject of this Ps. assimilates so closely to that of the 42d, that many have regarded it as originally belonging to it, and as only separated by the act of transcribers. Except in the Syr. and Arab. it has no title. The former speaks of it as "composed by David, when Jonathan told him Saul intended to slay him;" and the latter represents it as "a prayer for the backsliding Jews." In 46 of the MSS. of Kennicott and De Rossi, it stands as a part of Ps. 42.' MORISON.

Verse 1.

This is evidently a continuation of the preceding Ps. and was written before David had obtained deliverance. Every day brought him fresh intelligence concerning the ungodly, ungrateful, and unmerciful conduct of Israel in general; the bulk of the nation having joined the conspirators, and being ready to proceed to all lengths against the life of their aged king, which the deceit and iniquity of Absalom or Ahithophel could suggest against him. SCOTT.

Note, 42:9, 10.—Thy light. (3) 'Thy favor, which appeareth by the performance of thy promises.' Perhaps the Psalmist also meant, the light of heavenly wisdom, teaching him how to act in such trying circumstances, so as to wait in the path of duty for the performance of God's promises. SCOTT.

(3). Tabernacles.' There were at this time two tabernacles, or sacred tents; that erected by Moses at Gibeon, and the ark of the covenant stationed on mt. Zion, in a tent David had prepared for it. (1 Chr. 16:37—43.) SCOTT.—'Probably he alludes to the different parts of the tabernacle. There was, first, the holiest of all, then the sanctuary, and then the tabernacle of the convocation. Heb. 9:1—8.' Morison. Comp. too, the cut, 1 K. 7:2—12. ED.

p 20:7. 33:16,17. Hos. 1:7.

to the altar of God, must see to it that therein they come unto God, and draw near to Him with a true heart: we come in vain to holy ordinances, if we do not in them come to the holy God. 3. Those that come unto God, must come to Him as their exceeding Joy, not only as their future Bliss, but as their present Joy; and that not a common, but an exceeding joy, far exceeding all the joys of sense and time. The phrase, in the original, is very emphatical—unto God the Gladness of my joy, or of my triumph. Whatever we rejoice or triumph in, God must be the Joy of it; all our joy in it must terminate in Him, and must pass through the gift to the Giver. 4. When we come to God as our exceeding Joy, our comforts in Him must be the matter of our praises to Him as God, and our God. Upon the harp will I praise Thee, O God, my God. David excelled at the harp, 1 Sam. 16: 16, 18. and with that in which he excelled he would praise God; for God who is the Best is to be praised with the best we have.

V. As his never failing Hope, v. 5. Here, as before, David quarrels with himself for his dejections and despondencies, and owns he did ill to yield to them, and that he had no reason to do so; Why art thou cast down, O my soul? He then quiets himself in the believing expectation he had of giving glory to God; Hope in God, for I shall yet praise Him; and of enjoying glory with God, He is the Health of my countenance, and my God. This is what we cannot too much insist on, for it is what we must live and die by.

Ps. XLIV. We are not told either who was the penman of this Ps. or when, and on what occasion, it was penned; on a melancholy occasion, we are sure, not so much to the penman himself, but to the church of God in general; therefore, if we suppose it penned by David, yet we must attribute it purely to the spirit of prophecy, and must conclude that that spirit (whatever he himself had) had in view the captivity of Babylon, or the sufferings of the Jewish church under Antiochus, or rather, the afflicted state of the Christian church in its early days, to which v. 22. is applied by the apostle, Rom. 8: 36. and indeed in all its days on earth; for it is its determined lot, that it must enter into the kingdom of heaven through many tribulations. And if we have any gospel-psalms pointing at the privileges and comforts of Christians, why should we not have one pointing at their trials and exercises? It is a Ps. calculated for a day of fasting and humiliation, on occasion of some public calamity, either pressing or threatening. In singing this Ps. we ought to give God the praise of what He has formerly done for his people, to represent our own grievances, or sympathize with those parts of the church that are in distress; to engage ourselves, whatever happens, to cleave to God and duty, and then cheerfully to wait the event.

V. 1—8. Some observe, that most of the Pss. entitled Maschil, psalms of instruction, are sorrowful Pss.; for afflictions give instructions, and sorrow of spirit opens the ear to them; Blessed is the man whom Thou chastenest and teachest.

In these vs. the church, though now trampled on, calls to remembrance the days of her triumph in God, and over her enemies. This is very largely mentioned here, 1. As an aggravation of the present distress. The yoke of servitude cannot but lie very heavy on the necks of those that used to wear the crown of victory; and the tokens of God's displeasure must needs be most grievous to persons long accustomed to tokens of his favor. 2. As an encouragement to hope, that God would yet turn again their captivity, and return in mercy to them; accordingly he mixes prayers and comfortable expectations with his record of former mercies. Observe,

I. Their commemoration of the great things God had formerly done for them. In general, v. 1. Observe, 1. The many operations of Providence are here spoken of as one work; there is a wonderful harmony and uniformity in all that God does, Ezek. 10: 13. 2. It is a debt every age owes to posterity, to keep and to transmit an account of God's works of wonder to the next generation: thus shall one generation praise his works to another, 145: 4. the fathers to the children shall make known his truth, Isa. 38: 19. 3. We must not only make mention of the work God has done in our own days, but must also acquaint ourselves and our children with what He did in the times of old, long before our own days; and of this we have in the Scripture a sure word of history, as sure as the word of prophecy. 4. Children must diligently attend to what their parents tell them of the wonderful works of God, and keep it in remembrance, as that which will be of great use to them. 5. Former experiences of God's power and goodness are strong supports to faith, and powerful pleas in prayer under present calamities. See how Gideon insists on it, Judg. 6: 13. In particular, their fathers had told them,

(1.) How wonderfully God planted Israel in Canaan at first, v. 2, 3. not owing to their own merit, but to God's favor and free grace, Deut. 9: 5, 6. because He would perform the oath which He sware unto their fathers, Deut. 7: 8. not owing to their own might, but to God's power engaged for them, without which all their own efforts and endeavors had been fruitless. It was God that planted Israel in that good land, as the careful husbandman plants a tree, from which he promises himself fruit. See 80: 8. This is applicable to the planting of the Christian church, by the preaching of the gospel. Paganism was wonderfully driven out, as the Canaanites, not all at once, but by little and little, not by any human policy or power, but by the wisdom and power of God; Christ by his Spirit went forth conquering and to conquer; and the remembrance of that is a great support and comfort to those that groan under the yoke of anti-christian tyranny; for to the state of the church under the power of the N. T. Babylon, some think, (and particularly the learned Amyraldus,) the complaints in the latter part of this Ps. may very fitly be accommodated. He that by his power and goodness planted a church for Himself in the world, will certainly support it by the same power and goodness; and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it.

(2.) How frequently He had given them success against their enemies, v. 7. Thou hast, many a time, saved us from our enemies, and hast put to flight, and so put to shame, them that hated us; witness the successes of the Judges against the nations that oppressed Israel. Many a time have the persecutors of the Christian church, and those that hate it, been put to shame by the power of truth, Acts 6: 10.

NOTES.

Ps. XLIV. The author, occasion, and time of this Ps. appear to be uncertain. Most, with Henry and Scott, make David the author; but while many, with Henry, refer the Ps. to the times of the Bab. captivity or of Antiochus, and think David was inspired with prophetic forecast to adapt it accordingly, Scott only, so far as I find, supposes, though it may be with good reason, that he prepared it 'for the true church in every age;' and many think it was composed by Hezekiah, or some other one of his time: Mudge thinks, it was prepared at the particular time of Rabshakeh's coming with blasphemy and threats. Morison seems inclined to refer it to the time of the captivity, were it not that 'some descriptions of the piety of the people, as in vs. 17, 18, and 20. do not correspond with the actual feelings of the Israelites during that time, as described by Daniel, ch. 9:5, 6, 10, 11, 13.' Ed.

Verses 1—3.

This Ps. does not fully suit any period in the history of the old-testament church: for even in the days of Hezekiah, under Sennacherib's oppression, or afterwards, under the persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes, the bulk of the nation could not have made the solemn protestation contained in it; (17—22.) and it would have been still more unsuitable to the case of the Jews, during the Bab. captivity. It is therefore no very improbable conjecture, that David, or some other prophet, composed this Ps. for the use of the true church, in every age, when persecuted for conscience' sake.—The first verse is incorporated into our Litany, after a manner, suited to lead our thoughts to the triumphs of divine grace at the reformation, and in the age of the apostles.—The people. (2) Or peoples, the several nations inhabiting Canaan. (1 Sam. 12:22. Rom. 9:10—18.) Scott.

Verse 4.

This is a never-failing plea for the church under persecution, and for the believer when steadily resisting temptation, and for the minister in praying for success on his labors. (27:13. Matt. 6:13.) Id.

Verses 5—7.

God is frequently spoken of as a Horn, or as raising up for his church 'a Horn of salvation;' (Deut. 33:7. 2 Sam. 22:2, 3. Luke 1:67—75.) and the Psalmist, with allusion to that metaphor, says, 'Through Thee will we push down our enemies.' Id.

II. The good use they make, and had formerly made, of this record of the great things God had done for their fathers.

1. They had taken God for their sovereign Lord, sworn allegiance to Him, and put themselves under his protection, v. 4. He speaks in the name of the church, as 74: 12. Thou art my King of old; or, for himself here; 'Lord, Thou art my King, Whither shall I go with my petitions, but to Thee? The favor I ask is not for myself, but for thy church.' Note, It is every one's duty to improve their personal interest at the throne of grace, for the public welfare and prosperity of the people of God; as Moses, 'If I have found grace in thy sight, guide thy people,' Ex. 33: 13.

2. They had always applied themselves to Him by prayer for deliverance, when at any time they were in distress; Command deliverances for Jacob. Observe, (1.) The enlargedness of their desire; they pray for deliverances, not one, but many, as many as they need, a series, a deliverance from every danger. (2.) The strength of their faith in the power of God; Command, which denotes his doing it easily and instantly; Speak, and it is done; as the centurion, Matt. 8: 8. Speak the word only; it denotes also his doing it effectually; Where the word of a king is, there is power, much more the word of the King of kings.

3. They had trusted and triumphed in Him. As they owned it was not their own sword and bow that had saved them, v. 3. so neither did they trust to their own sword or bow to save them for the future, v. 6. no, through Thee will we push down our enemies, v. 5. relying only on thy strength, and not on the number or valor of our forces; and, having thee on our side, we will not doubt of success in the attempt.

4. They had made Him their Joy and Praise; v. 8. When their enemies boasted of their strength and success, as Sennacherib and Rabshakeh, they owned they had nothing to boast of, in answer thereunto, but their relation to God, and their interest in Him; and if He were for them, they could set all the world at defiance. Let him that glories, glory in the Lord, and let that for ever exclude all other boasting.

V. 9—16. The people of God here complain of the low and afflicted condition they were now in, under the prevailing power of their enemies and oppressors; which was the more grievous because they had always been used to win the day, and because those were now their oppressors, whom they had many a time triumphed over and made tributaries, and especially because they had boasted in their God, with great assurance, that He would still protect and prosper them, which made their distress and disgrace the more shameful. Let us see what the complaint is.

1. That they wanted the usual tokens of God's favor, and presence, v. 9. 'Thou seemest to have cast us off, and so hast put us to shame. Our armies go forth as usual, but they are put to flight, for Thou goest not forth with them.' Note, God's people, when cast down, are tempted to think themselves cast off, and forsaken of God; but it is a mistake. Hath God cast away his people? God forbid, Rom. 11: 1.

2. That they were put to the worst before their enemies in the field of battle, v. 10. as Joshua complained when he met with a repulse at Ai, Josh. 7: 8. 'We are dispirited, and have lost the ancient valor of Israelites; we flee, we fall, before those that used to flee and fall before us; and all our attempts to shake off the Babylonish yoke have been ineffectual, and we have rather lost ground by them.'

3. That they were doomed to the sword and to captivity, v. 11. They looked upon themselves as bought and sold, and charged it on God, when they should have charged it on their own sin, Is. 50: 1. However, thus far was right, that they looked above the instruments of their trouble, well knowing their worst enemies had no power against them, but what was given them from above; they own God delivered them into the hands of the ungodly, as that which is sold is delivered to the buyer. 'Thou sellest them for nought, and dost not increase in their price;' so it may be read; 'Thou dost not sell them by auction, to those that will bid most for them, but in haste, to those that will bid first for them; any one shall have them that will.' Or, as we read it, Thou dost not increase thy wealth by their price; intimating, they could have suffered this contentedly, if they had been sure it would have redounded to the glory of God, and his interest be some way served by it; but it was quite contrary, Israel's disgrace turned to God's dishonor, see Is. 52: 5. Ezek. 36: 20.

4. That they were loaded with contempt, and all possible ignominy. In this also they acknowledge God, 'Thou makest us a reproach; Thou bringest those calamities on us which occasion the reproach, and Thou permittest their virulent tongues to smite us.' They complain, (1.) That they were ridiculed and bantered, as the most contemptible people under the sun. (2.) That their neighbors, from whom they could not withdraw, were most abusive to them, v. 13. (3.) That the heathen, that were strangers and aliens, made them a by-word, and shook the head at them, as triumphing in their fall, v. 14. (4.) That the reproach was constant and incessant, v. 15. My confusion is continually before me. The church in general, the psalmist in particular, were continually teased and vexed with the insults of the enemy. To those that are going down, every one cries, 'Down with them.' (5.) That it was very grievous, and in a manner overwhelmed him; The shame of my face has covered me. He blushed for sin, or rather for the dishonor done to God, and then it was a holy blushing. (6.) That it reflected on God Himself; the reproach the enemy and the avenger cast on them, was downright blasphemy against God, v. 16. and 2 K. 19: 3. There was therefore strong reason to believe, that God would appear for them. As there is no trouble more grievous to a generous and ingenuous mind than reproach and calumny, so there is none more grievous to a holy, gracious soul, than blasphemy and dishonor done to God.

V. 17—26. The people of God, being greatly afflicted and oppressed, here apply themselves to Him,

I. By way of appeal, concerning their integrity, of which God only can infallibly judge and will certainly reward. Two things they call God to witness.

1. That though they suffered these hard things, yet they kept close to God, and duty, v. 17. 'We cannot deny we have dealt foolishly, yet not in thy covenant, so as to cast Thee off, and take to other gods: idolaters were our conquerors, but we did not therefore entertain any more favorable thoughts of their idols; we have not forsaken Thee.' The trouble they had been long in was very great; 'We have been among men as fierce, and furious, and cruel, as dragons; we have been under deep melancholy, and apprehensive of death; Thou hast thus broken and covered us, v. 19. yet we have not harbored any hard thoughts of Thee, but have not continued to trust in Thee; our heart is not turned back, we have not secretly withdrawn our affec-

Verse 8.

Or, 'Unto God we will give praise continually, and will confess thy name for ever. Selah.' 'Glorying in God' is generally expressed by another modification of the same verb. (Is. 45:25. Jer. 9:23. Heb.) SCOTT.

Many of the verbs are in the future tense, in the original: and perhaps the Psalmist meant, that past calamities led the people to very doleful conclusions as to the event. SCOTT.

Verses 17—22.

(1—3.) The formalist commonly escapes persecution, by turning with the stream, and purchasing security with sinful compliances, or tions from Thee, neither have our steps, either in our religious worship, or in our conversation, declined from thy way, v. 18. the way appointed us to walk in.' When the heart turns back, the steps will soon decline; for it is the evil heart of unbelief that inclines us to depart from God. Note, We may the better bear our troubles, how pressing soever, if in them we still hold fast our integrity. While our troubles do not drive us from our duty to God, we should not suffer them to drive us from our comfort in God; for He will not leave us, if we do not leave Him.

For the proof of their integrity, they take God's omniscience to witness, which is as much the comfort of the upright in heart, as it is the terror of hypocrites, v. 20, 21. Forgetting God was a heart sin, and stretching out the hand to a strange god was often a secret sin, Ezek. 8: 12. But heart sins and secret sins are known to God, and must be reckoned for; for He knows the secrets of the heart, and therefore is an infallible Judge of the words and actions.

2. That therefore they suffered these hard things, because they kept close to God and to their duty, v. 22. In this, the Spirit of prophecy had reference to those who suffered, even unto death, for the testimony of Christ, to whom it is applied, Rom. 8: 36. So many were killed, and put to such lingering deaths, that they were in the killing all the day long; so universally was this practised, that, when a man became a Christian, he reckoned himself as a sheep appointed for the slaughter.

II. By way of petition, with reference to their present distress, that God would, in his own due time, deliver them. Their request is very importunate, Awake, arise, v. 23. Arise for our help, redeem us, v. 26. come speedily and powerfully to our relief, 80: 2. Stir up thy strength, and come and save us. They complained, v. 12. that God had sold them; here they pray, v. 26. that God would redeem; them there is no appealing from God, but by appealing to Him; if He sell us, it is not any one else that can redeem us; the same hand that tears, must heal, that smites, must bind up, Hos. 6: 1. They complained, v. 9. Thou hast cast us off; but here they pray, v. 23. 'Cast us not off for ever; let us not be finally forsaken of God.' The expostulations are very moving; Why sleepest Thou? v. 23. He that keeps Israel neither slumbers nor sleeps; but, when He does not immediately appear, his people are tempted to think He sleeps. The expression is figurative, as 78: 65. Then the Lord awaked as one out of sleep; but it was applicable to Christ in the letter, Matt. 8: 24.

And lastly, The pleas are very proper; not their own merit and righteousness, though they had the testimony of their consciences to their integrity, but they plead the poor sinner's pleas. 1. Their own misery, which made them the proper objects of the divine compassion, v. 25. 'Our soul is bowed down to the dust, under prevailing grief and fear; we cannot lift up ourselves, and we lie exposed to be trodden on by every insulting foe.' 2. God's mercy; 'O redeem us for thy mercy-sake; we depend on the goodness of thy nature, which is the glory of thy name, Ex. 34: 6. and on those sure mercies of David, which are conveyed by the covenant to all his spiritual seed.

Ps. XLV. This Ps. is an illustrious prophecy of Messiah the Prince: it is all over Gospel, and points at Him only, as a Bridegroom espousing the church to Himself, and as a king ruling in it, and for it. It is probable our Savior has reference to this Ps. when he compares the kingdom of heaven, more than once, to a nuptial solemnity, Matt. 22: 2. 25: 1. We have no reason to think it has any reference to Solomon's marriage with Pharaoh's daughter; I would rather apply it to some of David's marriages, because he was a man of war, such a one as the bridegroom here is described to be, which Solomon was not. But I take it to be purely and only meant of JesusChrist; and to Him, v. 6, 7. it is applied in the N. T. Heb. 1: 8. nor can it be understood of any other. In singing this Ps. our hearts must be filled with high thoughts of Christ, with an entire submission to, and satisfaction in, his government, and an

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The church of God is one incorporated body, from the beginning to the end of the world: and the benefits conferred on it in every age, will be acknowledged with gratitude by believers, through all generations, and even to eternity.—'Whatsoever things were written of old time, were written for our instruction' and encouragement; and parents should declare the work of God to their children, that they may learn to hope in Him. (78: 3—8. Is. 38: 17—20. Rom. 15: 4—7.)—The prosperity of the church has always been attended with the ruin of her enemies; therefore the most prosperous despisers and persecutors have cause to tremble, on account of the prayers of God's afflicted and despised people.—As human policy, power, and authority could never prevail against the cause of God; so they have been very little employed in promoting it: but, whatever instruments have been used, all real advantages have been gained by 'his right hand, his arm, and the light of his countenance, because he had a favor' to his people. They therefore give Him the whole glory of the past, and entirely confide in Him for the future; and they prosper in their spiritual warfare, when they depend on his grace and go forth in his name.—We have reason to be thankful, considering our frailty, for exemption from the more violent species of persecution; but let us be careful, that prosperity and ease do not render us careless and lukewarm. open apostasy; but the true believer cannot be prevailed on, by menaces, sufferings, or promises, to forget God, or deal falsely in his covenant: neither the malice, nor the subtlety, nor the poison, of the old serpent, and of his progeny, even when permitted to torment him grievously, can induce him to turn aside to idolatry, or to renounce his God and Savior. This has been proved in ten thousand instances, while the disciples of Christ have been covered as with the shadow of death, in their constant expectation of it; and have seen their brethren killed, by every tedious excruciating method, 'all the day long, and accounted as sheep for the slaughter.' (John 16:1—3. Rom. 8:35—39.) Their regard to the authority of their holy and heart-searching God effectually preserves them even from committing secret wickedness; and they make their appeal to Him concerning their integrity. And indeed so far from suffering for their iniquities, they are hated and killed for the Lord's sake; because they bear his image, profess his truths, adhere to his commandments, and seek his glory.—'The place of dragons,' or serpents, or monsters, gives the idea of a man cast into a situation, in which every hateful and dreadful creature surrounds him. Such are persecutors, and such are evil spirits who employ them. (M. R. s.) SCOTT.

(19.) Broken in the place of dragons.] I. e. 'most bitterly afflicted, as those who are torn and broken by being thrown to wolves to devour.' The word which in the plural is here rendered dragons, denotes a wolf or wild dog—the jackal, and is employed as an image for tyrants: or, as others, their place indicates some barren, horrid region of great suffering and distress, where wild beasts only might be expected to be found.' ROSENM.

Verses 23—26.

'There is a time, when the triumphs of the adversary, and the afflictions of the church, tempt men to think, that the eye of Providence is closed, or turned away, and that the Almighty hath ceased to remember their sad estate. But the truth is, that God only giveth his people an opportunity of feeling their own insufficiency; and waiteth, till, by fervent and importunate prayer, they solicit his help. For so the holy Jesus slept, while the ship was covered with the waves; until, awakened by the cries of his disciples, He arose to their assistance, and spoke the tempest into a perfect calm.' Bp. Horne. SCOTT.

earnest desire of the enlarging and perpetuating of his church in the world.

V. 1—5. Some make Shoshannim, in the title, to signify an instrument of six strings; others take it primitively for lilies or roses, which, probably, were strewed, with other flowers, as nuptial solemnities; and then it is easily applicable to Christ, who calls Himself the Rose of Sharon, and the Lily of the valleys, Cant. 2 : 1. It is a song of loves, the holy love between Christ and his church. It is a song of the well-beloved, the virgins, the companions of the bride, v. 14. prepared to be sung by them; the virgin company, that attend the Lamb on mt. Zion, are said to sing a new song, Rev. 14 : 3, 4.

The preface v. 1. speaks, 1. The dignity of the subject. It is a good matter, and pity such a moving art as poetry should ever be employed about a bad matter. The King is Jesus. Note, Those that speak of Christ, speak of a good matter, no subject so noble, so copious, so fruitful, so profitable, and so well-becoming us; shame it is not more the matter of our discourse. 2. The excellency of the management. My heart is inditing. This is applicable to David's devout meditations and affections in his heart, out of the abundance of which his mouth spake. We then speak best of Christ and divine things, when we speak, from the heart, that which has warmed and affected us; and we should never be rash in speaking of the things of Christ, but weigh well beforehand what we have to say, lest we speak amiss. See Eccl. 5 : 2. The matter is well expressed; 'I will speak of the things I have made; which I understand, and am affected with, not what I have heard from others; not by rote; but what I have myself studied.' Note, What God has wrought in our souls, as well as for them, we must declare to others, 66 : 16. He expresses himself with all possible cheerfulness, freedom, and fluency; 'My tongue is as the pen of a ready writer, guided by my heart in every word, as the pen is by the hand.' We call the prophets the penmen of Scripture, whereas really they were but the pen. David not only spake what he thought of Christ, but wrote it, that it might spread the further, and last the longer: the pen of a ready writer lets nothing slip.

In these vs. the Lord Jesus is represented,

I. As most beautiful and amiable in Himself. It is a marriage song; therefore the transcendent excellences of Christ are represented by the beauty of the royal Bridegroom, v. 2. He proposed, v. 1. to speak of the King, but immediately directs his speech to him. They that have an admiration and affection for Christ, love to go to Him and tell Him so. Note, Jesus Christ is in Himself, and in the eyes of all believers, more amiable and lovely than the children of men. The beauties of the Lord Jesus, as God, as Mediator, far surpass those of the most amiable and excellent of men; there is more in Christ to engage our love, than is or can be in any creature. The beauties of this lower world are in danger of drawing away our hearts from Christ, therefore we are concerned to understand how much He excells them all, and how much more worthy He is of our love.

II. As the great Favorite of heaven. 1. He has grace, has it for us; grace is poured into thy lips. By his word, his promise, his Gospel, the good will of God is made known to us, and the good work of God is begun and carried on in us. He received all grace from God, all the endowments requisite to qualify Him for his work and office as Mediator, that from his fulness we might receive, John 1 : 16. It was not only poured into his heart, for his own strength and encouragement, but into his lips, that by the words and kisses of his mouth He might communicate light and holiness and comfort. From this grace proceeded those gracious words which all admired, Luke 4 : 22. The spirit of prophecy is put into thy lips; so the Chaldee. 2. He has the blessing, has it for us. Where God gives his grace, He will give his blessing; we are blessed with spiritual blessings in Christ Jesus, Eph. 1 : 3.

III. As victorious over all his enemies. Now we have here,

1. His preparations for war, v. 3. The Word of God is the sword of the Spirit; by its promises, and the grace contained in them, souls are made willing to submit to Christ, and become his loyal subjects; by its threatenings, and the judgments executed according to them, those that stand it out against Christ, will, in due time, be brought down and ruined. By it many Jews and Gentiles were converted, and, at length, the Jewish nation destroyed, according to its predictions, for their implacable enmity to it; and paganism was quite abolished. The sword here girt on Christ's thigh, is the same which is said to proceed out of his mouth, Rev. 19 : 15. When the Gospel was sent forth to be preached to all nations, then our Redeemer girded his sword on his thigh.

2. His expedition to this holy war; He goes forth with his glory and his majesty, as a great king takes the field with abundance of pomp and magnificence; his sword, his glory, and majesty. In his Gospel He appears transcendently great and excellent, bright and blessed, in the honor and majesty the Father has laid on Him: nothing external to charm men, or to awe them, but He took upon Him the form of a servant; it was all spiritual glory, spiritual majesty. There is so much grace, and therefore glory, in that word, He that believes shall be saved; so much terror, and therefore majesty, in that word, He that believes not, shall be damned; that we may well say, in the chariot of that Gospel, which these words are the sum of, the Redeemer rides forth in glory and majesty.

der the allusion of a marriage. (Eph. 5:22—31.) Most expositors maintain, that it was written on Solomon's marriage with Pharaoh's daughter; but a great part of it is wholly inapplicable to that transaction: nor is there sufficient ground to support the decided opinion, that this was so much as the occasion of its being written, or that David composed it. Scott.—'That this Ps. is to be regarded as nothing more than an Epithalamium, or marriage song, composed on occasion of the nuptials of Solomon with the daughter of Pharaoh, is revolting to every principle of faith, and every feeling of devotion; and thus to fritter down a spiritual and prophetic allegory, which this Ps. unquestionably is, is, to say the least, dealing very irreverently with the office of the Divine Spirit. There is not, perhaps, in the entire book of Pss. a more direct or sublime prediction of Christ and the church, than the one embodied in this beautiful ode. To a mind that is spiritual, it will ever suggest thoughts of loftiest devotion.' Mor. Rosenm. accords with J. H. Michaëlis, among other interpreters, that this Ps. cannot be accommodated either to David, or to Solomon; and Hengstenberg, he says, has replied to the arguments by which Paulus and De Wette have opposed its application to the Messiah. Ed.

Shoshannim.] 'To understand this of lilies rather than of the hexachord, is preferable; since lilies and other flowers are well known to have been employed as garlands to deck the bride and her attendants.' Morison. Note, 22[1] title; and Bush, there. The name of this song was probably 'the Lilies.' Gesenius, in Rosenm. makes it a song of 'delight,' or 'delightful things,' i. e. 'a pleasant, delightful song.' Id.

'A wedding among the Jews was considered, not only as a sacred solemnity, but a mystical rite. This is the true foundation for explaining this Ps., the Canticles, and a few other sacred songs, of the union between Jehovah and the Jewish church, or Messiah and the Christian church. See Is. 5:1. Matt. 25:1—16. Eph. 5:25—32. It appears to us very probable that it was composed on the same or a like occasion, as the book of Canticles; but whether by David, Solomon, or Nathan, as Dr. Hales thinks, we have no sufficient ground to ascertain. One thing is certain, a greater than David or Solomon is here namely, king Messiah.' Williams.

The inspiration of the Holy Spirit stirred up in the prophet's heart this meditation, as water bubbles up in a fountain: (marg.) so that he spoke freely of the things, which he had been considering, and had 'composed concerning the King,' the promised Messiah; and his tongue was guided by the Spirit of God, as entirely as the pen is by the hand of a ready writer, to express promptly and fully, 'the mind of the Spirit,' and nothing more. This seems the genuine meaning: for as the tongue utters more rapidly, than the readiest writer can note down the words; the clause, in the common interpretation, conveys no distinct idea. 3. The glorious cause in which He is engaged; because of truth, and meekness, and righteousness, which were, in a manner, sunk and lost among men, and which Christ came to retrieve and rescue. (1.) The Gospel itself is truth, meekness, and righteousness; it commands by the power of truth and righteousness; Christianity has these, incontestably, on its side, yet it is to be promoted by meekness and gentleness, 1 Cor. 4: 12, 13. 2 Tim. 2: 25. (2.) Christ appears in it, in his truth, meekness, and righteousness; these are his glory and majesty, and because of these He shall prosper. Men are brought to believe on Him because He is true, to learn of Him because He is meek, Mat. 11: 29. the gentleness of Christ is of mighty force, 2 Cor. 10: 1. Men are brought to submit to Him because He is righteous, and rules with equity. (3.) The Gospel, as far as it prevails, sets up truth, meekness, and righteousness in the heart; rectifies mistakes, controls the passions, and governs the life.

4. The success of his expedition; 'Thy right hand shall teach Thee terrible things; Thou shalt experience a wonderful divine power going along with thy Gospel, to make it victorious; and the effects of it will be terrible things.' (1.) In order to the conversion and reduction of souls to Him, terrible things are to be done; the heart must be pricked, conscience startled, and the terrors of the Lord make way for his consolations; this is done by the right hand of Christ. The Comforter shall continue, John 16: 8. (2.) In the conquest of the gates of hell, and its supporters, in the destruction of Judaism and Paganism, terrible things will be done, which will make men's hearts fail them for fear, Luke 21: 26. and great men and chief captains call to the rocks and mountains to fall on them, Rev. 6: 15. The next v. describes these terrible things, v. 5. Thine arrows are sharp in the heart of the King's enemies. Convictions are like arrows in the heart on which they fasten, and bring people to fall under Christ, in subjection to his laws and government. They that thus fall on this Stone shall be broken, Mat. 21: 44. Those that persist in their enmity are thus wounded, in order to their being ruined. The arrows of God's terrors are sharp in their hearts, whereby they shall fall under Him, so as to be made his footstool, 110: 1. (Luke 19: 27.')

V. 6—9. We have here the royal Bridegroom filling his throne with judgment, and keeping his court with splendor.

I. Filling his throne with judgment. It is God the Father that says this, v. 7. to the Son, as appears Heb. 1: 8, 9. where it is quoted to prove that He is God, and has a more excellent name than the angels. The Mediator is God, else He had neither been able to do the Mediator's work, nor fit to wear the Mediator's crown. Concerning his government, observe,

1. Its eternity; it is for ever and ever. It shall continue on earth throughout all the ages of time, and, in heaven, run parallel with eternity itself. Perhaps, even then, the glory of the Redeemer, and the blessedness of the redeemed, shall be in a continual, infinite progression; for it is promised, that not only of his government, but of the increase of his government and peace, there shall be no end; Isa. 9: 7. even then, when the kingdom shall be delivered up to God, even the Father, 1 Cor. 15: 24. the throne of the Redeemer will continue.

2. Its equity; The sceptre of thy kingdom, the administration of thy government, is right, exactly according to the eternal counsel and will of God, which is the eternal rule and reason of good and evil: rights those that do suffer wrong, v. 7. By the holiness of his life, the merit of his death, and the great design of his Gospel, He has made it to appear that He loves righteousness, and hates wickedness, for never did God's hatred of sin appear so as it did in Christ's sufferings.

3. Its establishment and elevation; Therefore God, even thy God, (Christ, as Mediator, called God his God, John 20: 17. as commissioned by Him, and the Head of those that are taken into covenant with Him,) has anointed Thee with the oil of gladness; therefore, i. e. (1.) 'In order to this righteous government of thine, to qualify Thee for thine undertaking,' Isa. 61: 1. 11: 2. The Spirit is called the oil of gladness, because of the delight wherewith Christ was filled, in carrying on his undertaking. He was anointed with the Spirit above all his fellows, above all those that were anointed, whether priests or kings. (2.) 'In recompense of what Thou hast done and suffered for the advancement of righteousness, and the destruction of sin;' because He humbled Himself, God has highly exalted Him. Phil. 2: 8, 9. His anointing Him, denotes the power and glory to which He is exalted; He is invested in all the dignities and authorities of the Messiah; and his anointing Him with the oil of gladness, denotes the joy that was set before Him; so his exaltation is expressed, Heb. 12: 2. both in the light of his Father's countenance, Acts 2: 28. and in the success of his undertaking, which He shall see, and be satisfied, Is. 53: 11. This He is anointed with above all his fellows, above all believers, who are his brethren, and who partake of the anointing; they by measure, He without measure. But the apostle brings it, to prove his pre-eminence above the angels, Heb. 1: 4, 9. The salvation of sin-

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—8. The difference of men's characters, before God, greatly consists in the thoughts which habitually occupy their minds. The lively believer has his memory, imagination, and affections, so stored with heavenly things, that he has commonly some good matter to meditate on, in those hours of solitude and leisure, which others waste in vanity, or employ in wicked and polluting speculations. (119: 113.) But no subject is so congenial to the heaven-born soul, or so replete with comfort and instruction, as the contemplation of the excellences of Christ our King.—In the Redeemer, the enlightened soul perceives unutterable goodness and beauty, which eclipse all the dim excellences, that it was wont to admire in the children of men.—All, who have seen his glory and tasted his grace, greatly desire to promote his cause: they rejoice in his former victories, and long to see Him 'ride forth in his majesty' to extend his conquests, and, by his Word and Spirit, to reduce enemies and strangers to a willing submission to his truth, and righteousness, and gentle dominion.—In proportion as we are conformed to his holy image, we may expect the gladdening influence of the Comforter, which is communicated from his fulness: and while his name is to us, 'as ointment poured forth;' the fragrancy of heavenly affections will recommend our conversation to the spiritually minded, and render us meet for his palace above. (Cant. 1: 3. 2 Cor. 2: 14—17.

SCOTT.

13:7. John 1:16. 3:27—36. Eph. 4:7—13.)—Various attempts have, in different ages, been made to explain away this decisive testimony to the Deity of Christ; but the manner in which the apostle quotes it, rather varied from the Sept. and made more energetic, is conclusive to all who admit his authority.—Some would render the words, 'God is thy throne for ever and ever.' Heaven indeed is the throne of God; but who ever heard of God being the throne of any of his creatures! (M. R.—Note, Heb. 1:8, 9.) SCOTT.

(6.) 'In all the anc. vers. the renderings support this passage as a proof of the proper deity of Christ.' MOR.—'The Psalmist calls the king, whom he addresses, God, not as a magistrate, for the Hebrews never dignified their kings with this title; but because he truly regarded Him as super-human, and because the mention of his eternity declares it; whence the Chal. has Jehovah instead of Elohim, and the apostle in his Epistle to the Hebrews, being about to prove the supreme excellence and divinity of Messiah by many arguments, adduces, among others, this passage, Heb. 1:8, 9.' ROSENM

Verse 8.

'Perfume was considered in the E as the finishing of the dress of persons of condition, and so implies here every thing else of elegance and costly ornament.' Bp. Horsley. See in Bush. Ivory palaces.} 'The word rendered palaces here may be taken as a proper name [Minni], as appears from Jer. 51:27. where, as Bochart shows, it signifies a part of Armenia; whence the Chal. renders it, from the land of Armenia; so some interpreters expound the passage: "from the ivory palaces of Armenia they exhilarate thee;" i. e. the princes of Armenia are studious to please thee, and court thy favor, by gifts. Others understand by it, Minæa, a region of Arabia Felix, (Strabo,) and expound the passage, in the same way, of that country. Yet I know not whether a more elegant sense may not be derived, if we take the original word here as in a more rare form of the plural, which, (Ps.150: 4.) signifies chords, or strings, i. e. of instruments of music. So the sense would be: "Musicians from the ivory palaces delight thee."' ROSENM.—The Crit. Bib. understands by it 'curious inlaid boxes of ivory,' and the more common idea is that of boxes, closets or apartments inlaid with ivory, always thus used in the E. ED.

ners is the joy of angels, Luke 15: 10. but much more of the Son.

II. Keeping his court with splendor.

1. His robes of state are noticed, not for their pomp, which might awe the spectator, but for their pleasantness, and the gratefulness of the odors they were perfumed with, v. 8. Myrrh, aloes, and cassia were some of the ingredients of the holy anointing oil, Ex. 30: 23, 24. which was typical of the unction of the Spirit, which Christ, the great High-Priest of our profession, received, and to which therefore there seems a reference. It is the savor of these good ointments, his graces and comforts, that draws souls to Him, Cant. 1: 3, 4. and makes Him precious to believers, 1 Pet. 2: 7.

2. His royal palaces are said to be ivory ones; such were then reckoned most magnificent, 1 K. 22: 39. The mansions of light above are the ivory palaces, whence all the joys both of Christ and believers come.

3. In public appearances at court, when the pomp of it is showed, nothing is supposed to contribute so much to it as the splendor of the ladies, which is alluded to here, v. 9. and to whom, (1.) Particular believers are here compared. All true believers are born from above, are the children of the King of kings; these attend the throne of the Lord Jesus daily with their prayers and praises, which is really their honor, and He is pleased to reckon it his. The numbering of kings' daughters among his honorable women, or maids of honor, intimates that the kings, their fathers, should be tributaries to, and dependents on Him, and would therefore think it a preferment to their daughters to attend Him. (2.) The church in general, constituted of these particular believers, is here compared to the queen herself; the queen-consort, whom, by an everlasting covenant, He hath betrothed to Himself; she stands at his right hand, near to Him, and receiving honor from Him, in the richest array, in gold of Ophir, in robes woven with gold thread, or with a gold chain, and other ornaments of gold. This is the bride, the Lamb's wife, whose graces, which are her ornaments, are compared to fine linen, clean and white, Rev. 19: 8. for their purity; here to gold of Ophir, for their costliness; for as we owe our redemption, so we owe our adorning, not to corruptible things, but to the precious blood of the Son of God.

V. 10—17. This latter part of the Ps. is addressed to the royal bride. God, who said to the Son, Thy throne is for ever and ever, says this to the church, whom, on account of her espousals to the Son, He here calls his daughter.

I. He tells her of the duties expected from her, which ought to be considered by all those that come into relation to the Lord Jesus; 'Hearken therefore, and consider this, and incline thine ear; submit to those conditions of thine espousals, and bring thy will to comply with them.' This is the method of profiting by the Word of God; He that has ears, let him hear, hearken diligently; he that hearkens, let him consider and weigh it duly; he that considers, let him incline and yield to the force of what is laid before him. And what is here required?

1. She must renounce all others; 'Forget thine own people and thy father's house, according to the law of marriage: covet not to return to them again; banish all such remembrance, not only of thy people, but of thy father's house, as may incline thee to look back.' This shows, (1.) How necessary it was for those who were converted from Judaism or Paganism to the faith of Christ, wholly to cast out the old leaven, and not to bring into their Christian profession, either the Jewish ceremonies, or the heathen idolatries, for these would make such a mongrel religion in Christianity as the Samaritans had. (2.) How necessary it is for us all, when we give up our names to Jesus Christ, to hate father and mother, and all that is dear to us in this world, in comparison; to love them less than Christ, and his honor, and our interest in Him, Luke 14: 26.

Here is good encouragement given to the royal bride, thus entirely to break off from her former alliances; So shall the King greatly desire thy beauty; which intimates that the mixing of her old rites and customs, whether Jewish or Gentile, with her religion, would blemish her beauty, and hazard her interest in the affections of the royal Bridegroom; but that if she entirely conformed to his will, He would delight in her: the beauty of holiness, both on the church, and on particular believers, is, in the sight of Christ, of great price and very amiable. Where that is, He says, This is my rest for ever, here will I dwell, for I have desired it. Rev. 2: 1.

2. She must reverence Him, love, honor, and obey Him: He is thy Lord, and worship thou Him. The church is to be subject to Christ, as the wife to the husband, Eph. 5: 24. to call him Lord, as Sarah called Abraham, and to obey Him, 1 Pet. 3: 6. and so not only to submit to his government, but to give Him divine honors; we must worship Him as God, and our Lord; for this is the will of God, that all men should honor the Son, even as they honor the Father; nay, in so doing, it is reckoned that they honor the Father; if we confess that Christ is Lord, and pay our homage to Him accordingly, it is to the glory of God the Father, Phil. 2: 11.

II. He tells her of the honors designed for her.

1. Great court should be made to her, and rich presents brought her, v. 12. 'The daughter of Tyre,' a rich and splendid city, 'the daughter of the King of Tyre shall be there with a gift; every royal family round about shall send a branch as a representative of the whole, to seek thy favor, and to make an interest in thee; even the rich among the people, whose wealth might be thought to discharge them from dependence at court, even they shall entreat thy favor, for his sake, to whom thou art espoused, that by thee they may make Him their Friend;' the Jews, the pretending Jews, who are rich to a proverb, shall come and worship before the church's feet in the Philadelphian period, and shall know that Christ has loved her, Rev. 3: 9. 2 Cor. 8: 5. Rom. 15: 16. When with themselves the Gentiles devote all they have to the honor of Christ, and the service of his kingdom, they then come with a gift.

2. She shall be very splendid, and highly esteemed in the eyes of all, v. 13. (1.) For her represented as surrounded with a splendid train.—The other attendants [besides kings' daughters and the queen] are either introduced, according to the customs of the times on such occasions, to keep up the allegory; or they may mean distinct churches or individuals who in succession seek to be admitted into this sacred relation. (12—15. Cant. 1:5, 6. 5:9.)—The whole church, composed of Jews and Gentiles, consists of such as were born in sin: and separation from all idolatry, iniquity, and self-dependence, and from all the carnal interests, pleasures, and attachments of an unconverted state, must make way for receiving Christ as their whole Portion and Salvation. (Gen. 12:1—3.) Scott.

Verse 12.

The accession of the Gentiles to the church may be here predicted, under the name of Tyre, a neighboring city, and at that time the mart of the world. (Is. 60:1—14. Zech. 8:20—23. Rev. 3:8,9.) Thy favor.] The pronoun is feminine, and the queen, the church, is especially meant. Scott.—Tyre.] 'As, at this time, Tyre was the greatest maritime and commercial city in the world, it may be here taken as representing those places which lay on the coasts of the sea, and carried on much traffic; such as parts of Syria, Egypt, Asia Minor, Greece, Italy, France, the British Isles, &c. which first received the gospel of Christ, and were the instruments of sending it to all other nations of the earth.' Dr. A. Clarke. 'Ancient Tyre was famous for her commerce, her wealth, her excellence in the fine arts, her luxury, the profligate, debauched manners of her people, and the grossness of her idolatry.' Horsley. Ed.

Verses 13—15.

The relation, in which the believer stands to the Lord, comprises in it every tie and affection; and the church is called his spouse, sister, or daughter, indiscriminately: or the title 'spouse,' or 'bride,' may express her relation to the Son of God; and 'daughter,' that to the Father. (1 Pet. 3:1—4. Rev. 19:7, 8.) When the church is thus prepared, this union is begun on earth, which will be completed and avowed in the King's palace above: while every individual, whose affection and dependence have been singly placed on Christ, shall be admitted as a guest at these nuptials, and likewise share for ever in the joy and honor of this sacred union. (M. R.—Matt. 25:1—13.) Scott.

Verse 16.

Instead of Jewish ancestors or kindred, there shall be an illustrious race of Gentile believers.—But the church renounces none of the Jewish race, except unbelievers, in exactly the same way, as she renounces unbelieving Gentiles.—Solomon had, as far as we know, no children by Pharaoh's daughter: and nothing can be less applicable to any one,

17 [i] I will make thy name to be remembered in all generations; [k] therefore shall the people praise thee for ever and ever.

PSALM XLVI.

The church exults in the assurance of protection and consolation from God, 1—5; recounts his wondrous works in her behalf, 6—9; and, while God demands submission from all the earth, she declares her confidence in Him, 10, 11.

personal qualifications, the endowments of her mind, which every one shall admire. Let us see here what is that true glory which we should be ambitious of, not that which makes a fair show in the flesh, but which is in the hidden man of the heart, in that which is not corruptible, 1 Pet. 3: 4. whose praise is not of men, but of God, Rom. 2: 29. (2.) For her rich apparel; though all her glory is within, that for which she is truly valuable, yet her clothing also is of wrought gold; the conversation of Christians, in which they appear in the world, must be enriched with good works, not gay and gaudy ones, like paint and flourish, but substantially good, like gold; and it must be accurate and exact, like wrought gold, which is worked with great care and caution.

3. Her nuptials shall be celebrated with great honor and joy, v. 14, 15. Gen. 2: 22. was a type of this mystical marriage. None are brought to Christ, but whom the Father brings, and He has undertaken to do it; none besides are so brought to the king, v. 14. as to enter into the king's palace, v. 15. This intimates a two-fold bringing of the spouse to Christ. (1.) In the conversion of souls to Christ; then they are espoused to Him, privately contracted, as chaste virgins, 2 Cor. 11: 2. Rom. 7: 4. (2.) In the completing of the mystical body, and the glorification of all the saints, at the end of time; then the bride, the Lamb's wife, shall be made completely ready, when all that belong to the election of grace shall be called in, and called home, and all gathered together to Christ, 2 Thess. 2: 1. Then is the marriage of the Lamb come, Rev. 19: 7. 21: 2. and the virgins go forth to meet the bridegroom, Matt. 25: 1. Then they shall enter into the king's palaces, into the heavenly mansions, to be ever with the Lord. In both these espousals, observe, to the honor of the royal bride, [1.] Her wedding-clothes; raiment of needle-work, the righteousness of Christ, the graces of the Spirit; both curiously wrought by divine wisdom. [2.] Her bride-maids; the virgins her companions, the wise virgins who have oil in their vessels as well as in their lamps; those who, being joined to the church, cleave to it and follow it, these shall go into the marriage. [3.] The mirth with which the nuptials will be celebrated; With gladness and rejoicings shall she be brought; when the prodigal is brought home to his father, it is meet that we should make merry and be glad, Luke 15: 32. and when the marriage of the Lamb is come, let us be glad and rejoice, Rev. 19: 7. for the day of his espousals is the day of the gladness of his heart, Cant. 3: 11.

4. The progeny of this marriage shall be illustrious, v. 16. Instead of thy fathers shall be thy children. Instead of the O. T. church, the economy of which was waxen old, and ready to vanish away, Heb. 8: 13. as the fathers that are going off, there shall be a N. T. church, a Gentile church, that shall be grafted into the same olive, and partake of its root and fatness; Rom. 11: 17. more, and more eminent, shall be the children of the desolate, than the children of the married wife, Is. 54: 1. This promise to Christ is of the same import with that, Is. 53: 10. He shall see his seed; and these shall be made princes in all the earth; there shall be some of all nations brought into subjection to Christ, and so made princes, made to our God kings and priests, Rev. 1: 6. Or it may intimate, that there should be a much greater number of Christian kings than ever there was of Jewish kings; those in Canaan only, these in all the earth, nursing fathers and nursing mothers to the church. They are princes of Christ's making; for by Him kings reign, and princes decree justice.

5. The praise of this marriage shall be perpetual, in the praises of the royal Bridegroom, v. 18. I will make thy name to be remembered. His Father has given Him a name above every name, and here promises to make it perpetual, by keeping up a succession of ministers and Christians in every age, that shall bear up his name; which shall thus endure for ever, 72: 17. by being remembered in all the generations of time; for the entail of Christianity shall not be cut off. 'Therefore, because they shall remember Thee in all generations, they shall praise Thee for ever and ever.' They that help to support the honor of Christ on earth, shall in heaven see his glory, and share in it, and be for ever praising Him. In the believing hope of our everlasting happiness in the other world, let us always keep up the remembrance of Christ, as our only Way thither, in our generation; and, in assurance of the perpetuating of the kingdom of the Redeemer in the world, let us transmit the remembrance of Him to succeeding generations.

Ps. XLVI. V. 1—5. This Ps. encourages us to hope and trust in God, his power, providence, and gracious presence with his church, in the worst of times, and directs us to give Him the

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 9—17. Next to the Redeemer's excellences, those of his espoused church are most worthy to be celebrated: not for what she was in herself; but for what He has made her, in consequence of his love and choice. (Cant. 4: 1—15. 6: 4—10. 7: 6—8. Ez. 16: 9—14.) If we desire to share these blessings, we must hearken to his Word, renounce our carnal and sinful attachments, pursuits, and connections, disavow other lords, and throw away all idols, that we may give Him our whole heart, and render Him unreserved worship, as well as seek all our happiness from Him alone. Indeed, the true believer's privileges, as well as the most estimable parts of his character, are internal, and undiscerned by an ungodly world: yet the holiness of his conversation proves the inward adorning of his soul, and that he is arrayed with 'the robe of righteousness and salvation.'—Those who are taught of God, however great in the world, will count it their honor to attend on Christ our King, and to employ their wealth and influence for the good of his church. And such as leave all for Him, shall be abundantly compensated even in this world, in new and spiritual relations, friends, and honors. To be a child of God, to be espoused to Christ, and made an heir of heaven, are the highest of all possible distinctions: this honorable race shall be continued and multiplied until the end of time, and at length shall possess and fill the earth; and thus shall the name of the Redeemer be remembered in all generations, and his people praise Him for ever and ever. Amen, and Amen. SCOTT.

than v. 17. to her. So that if Solomon's marriage to her were at all intended, this part of the prediction especially wholly failed of being accomplished. (Heb. 1: 8, 9.) SCOTT.

Verse 17.

This v. shows, that Christ and the church were immediately and expressly intended throughout the Ps. The language is peculiarly emphatical; and can mean nothing less, than all successive generations to the end of the world, and likewise eternal ages in heaven. Either the Father Himself thus declared his purpose of glorifying his beloved Son, and his people with Him, for ever; or, as many explain it, the Psalmist foresaw, that this sacred poem would be used by the church through all generations, in celebrating the honor of the Redeemer, and in calling on others to do the same; and that it would thus be useful, in preparing the redeemed people of God for the exalted adorations of the eternal world.—There can be no doubt, that this will be verified by the event. NOTES.

Ps. XLVI. Title. As the sons of Korah were principal singers in the sanctuary through successive generations, the title alone does not determine the date of this Ps. It is not known by whom, or when, it was written: but the ancient opinion, that it was composed on occasion of the deliverance of Jerusalem from Sennacherib's invasion, is very probable; though some think it was composed by David, after his victories over the Ammonites and Syrians. (48:1.) It is, however, well adapted to the use of the church, especially on great emergencies, in every age. SCOTT.

Alamoth.] (1 Chr. 15:20, 21.) 'Alamoth is thought to be either some tune in common use, or some kind of musical instrument, [named like the virginal in modern times,] unknown to us; in which young virgins, as some fancy, took a peculiar delight, and were wont to learn to play upon it, which they make the reason and original of its name.' Patrick.—'Alamoth' signifies virgins. SCOTT.—'I lean to the conviction, that alamoth here means some particular tune, so called from its lofty key, resembling the shrill and sprightly harmony of a virgin band. But whatever opinion be entertained respecting this title, there can be but little doubt that the Ps. itself looks into futurity. Calmet thinks it was composed by some Israelitish bard on the return of the Jews from Babylon, when they were once more quietly settled in Jerusalem, and that the convulsions spoken of were those which took place in the Persian empire after the death of Cambyses, when the Magi usurped the government. Probably it alludes to certain awful visitations of Divine providence, whether by earthquakes or otherwise, which swept in terror over the surrounding nations, but which spared and even protected the chosen tribes.' glory of what He has done for us, and what He will do: probably, it was penned on occasion of David's victories over the neighboring nations, 2 Sam. 8: and the rest God gave him from all his enemies round about. We may, in singing it, apply it, either to our spiritual enemies, and the encouragement we have to hope, that, through Christ, we shall be more than conquerors over them, or to the public enemies of Christ's kingdom in the world, and their threatening insults, endeavoring to preserve a holy security and serenity of mind, when they seem most formidable. It is said of Luther, that, when he heard any discouraging news, he would say, Come, let us sing the 46th psalm. The Psalmist here teaches us, by his own example,

I. To triumph in God, especially when we have had fresh experience of his appearing in our behalf, v. 1. Are we pursued? oppressed by troubles? or in distress? God is our strength and refuge, a help, a help found, so the word is, tried, Is. 28: 16. at hand, a sufficient help, a help accommodated to every case and exigence.

II. To triumph over the greatest dangers, v. 2. It is our duty, our privilege, to be thus fearless; an evidence of a clear conscience, of an honest heart, and of a lively faith in God, and his providence and promise. Though kingdoms and states be in confusion, embroiled in wars, tossed with tumults, and their governments in continual revolution; though their powers combine against the church and people of God, aim at no less than their ruin, and go very near to gain their point; yet will not we fear, knowing that all these troubles will end well for the church. See 93: 4. If the earth be removed, those have reason to fear who have laid up their treasures on earth, and set their hearts upon it; but not those who have laid up for themselves treasures in heaven, and who can expect to be then most happy, when the earth, and all the works that are therein, shall be burnt up. It is not any private concern of our own that we are in pain about; no, it is the city of God, the holy place of the tabernacle of the Most High; the ark, for which our hearts tremble. But when we consider what God has provided for the comfort and safety of his church, we shall see reason to have our hearts fixed, and set above the fear of evil tidings. Here is,

1. Joy to the church, even in the most melancholy and sorrowful times, v. 4. River here alludes to the waters of Siloam, which went softly by Jerusalem, Is. 8: 6, 7. though of no great depth or breadth, yet were they made serviceable to the defence of Jerusalem, in Hezekiah's time, Is. 22: 10, 11. But this must be understood spiritually; the covenant of grace is the river, the promises of which are the streams; or, the Spirit of grace is the river, John 7: 38, 39. the comforts of which are the streams, that make glad the city of our God. God's Word and ordinances are rivers and streams with which God makes his saints glad, in cloudy and dark days. God Himself is to his church a Place of broad rivers and streams, Isa. 33: 21. The streams that make glad the city of God are not rapid, but gentle, like those of Siloam. Note, The spiritual comforts, which are conveyed to the saints by soft and silent whispers, and which come not with observation, are sufficient to balance the most loud and noisy threatenings of an angry and malicious world.

2. Establishment to the church, v. 5. God has assured his church of his special presence with her, and concern for her; therefore she shall not be moved, i. e. not destroyed, nor removed, as the earth may be, v. 2. The church shall survive the world, and be in bliss when that is in ruins. It is built on a Rock, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it. Not disturbed, not much moved, with fears of the issue, God is for it.

3. Deliverance to the church, though her dangers be very great; God shall help her; help her under her troubles, that the more she is afflicted, the more she shall multiply; nay, out of her troubles, and that right early; when the morning appears; very speedily, very seasonably; then when things are brought to the last extremity, and when the relief will be most welcome. This may be applied by particular believers to themselves; if God be in our hearts, in the midst of us, by his Word dwelling richly in us, we shall be established, we shall be helped; let us therefore trust and not be afraid; all is well, and will end well.

V. 6—11. These verses give glory to God, both as King of nations, and as King of saints.

I. As King of nations, ruling the world by his power and providence, and over-ruling all the affairs of men to his own glory.

1. He checks the rage, and breaks the power, of the nations that oppose Him and his interests in the world, v. 6. comp. 2: 1, 2. Such a melting of the spirits of the enemies, is described, Judg. 5: 4, 5. and see Luke 21: 25, 26.

2. When He pleases to draw his sword, and give it commission, He can make great havoc, v. 8. See 66: 5. 111: 2. The works of the Lord include all his works of providence, in which must be noticed his attributes and purposes. Particularly, notice the desolations He has made in the earth, among the enemies of his church, who thought to have laid the land of Israel desolate. David carried the war into the enemies' country. Come and see the effects of desolating judgments, and stand in awe of God, 66: 3. Let all that oppose Him, see this with terror, and expect the same cup of trembling to be put into their hands; let all that fear Him, and trust in Him, see it with [hope,] and not be afraid of the most formidable powers armed against the church. Let them gird themselves, but they shall be broken to pieces.

3. War and peace depend on his word and will, (v. 9.) as much as storms and calms at sea do, 107: 25, 29. He makes wars to cease unto the end of the earth; sometimes in pity to the nations; both sides perhaps are weary of the war, [for both always suffer,] and willing to let it fall; or rather it may be meant of what He does, at other times, in favor of his own people. He makes wars waged and that of all believers from the beginning, evinced it; and this encouraged his present unshaken confidence: whereas all who call on idols, or on any creature, to help them in trouble, are invoking the absent, as well as the helpless.—Earthquakes, and other terrible convulsions in nature, are often made emblems of great commotions in nations; but such desolations are not likely to be realized, in the full literal import of the terms here used, till the consummation of all things. SCOTT.

Verse 4.

River.] 'Mudge reads: "The holy place of the tabernacles of the Most High is a stream, the branches whereof gladden the city of God." In justification, he observes, that the temple is here considered as a fountain, whence issued streams of joy and support. Most commentators think the Kidron, and its two streams, Gihon and Siloah, are referred to; but I should rather think, with Dathe, that the peaceful state of the land of Israel, as contrasted with the agitated and convulsed situation of surrounding nations, is here figuratively set forth, by the calm and placid movements of a gentle and refreshing stream, as compared with the swelling, tumultuous and destructive ocean.' MORISON.—'It may refer to the Medo-Persian army and its divisions; those branches which took Babylon, and instead of ruining the poor Jews, preserved them alive and gave them their liberty. Thus the city of God and the tabernacle of the Most High were gladdened.' Dr. A. Clarke; but this seems quite precarious. ED

Verse 6.

Nothing can be more concise, energetic, and sublime than this v (Ex. 15:9, 10.)—Many deliverances afforded to Israel answer the description, especially that under Hezekiah: but the success of the Gospel, notwithstanding all opposition of every kind, and from every quarter, which melted away before the blessing of God on the preaching of the apostles and evangelists, was a singular accomplishment of it; and it shall ere long have a still more glorious completion, in the destruction of every antichrist, and the universal prevalence of genuine Christianity. ID.

(9.) He maketh wars to cease.] 'By the death of Cambyses, and setting Darius son of Hystaspes on the Persian throne, He has tranquillized the whole empire.' Dr. A. CLARKE.

against them to cease, breaks the bow drawn against them, Is. 54: 17. The total destruction of Gog and Magog is prophetically described by the burning of their weapons, Ezek. 39: 9, 10. which intimates likewise the church's perfect security and assurance of lasting peace, which made it needless to lay up those weapons of war for their own service. The bringing of a long war to a good issue, is a work of the Lord, for our wonder and thankfulness.

II. As King of saints, and as such we must own that great and marvellous are his works, Rev. 15: 3.

1. For his own glory, v. 10. Be still, and know that I am God. (1.) Let his enemies be still; threaten no more, rage no more, it is all in vain, He that sits in heaven laughs at them; in spite of all their impoteat malice, He will be exalted, among the heathen, among his own people, in the earth. Men will set up themselves, will have their own way, and do their own will; but let them know God will be exalted, He will have his way, will do his own will, will glorify his own name, and wherein they deal proudly, He will be above them, and make them know He is so. (2.) Let his own people be still; be calm and sedate, and tremble no more; the Lord is God, He is God alone, and will be exalted, will maintain his honor unaided, fulfil his counsels, support his interest. Though depressed, let us not be dejected, for God will be exalted, and that may satisfy us; He will work for his great name, and then no matter what becomes of our little names. When we pray, Father, glorify thy name, we ought to act faith on the answer to that prayer, when Christ prayed it; I have both glorified it, and I will glorify it yet again. Amen, Lord, so be it.

2. For his people's safety and protection. He triumphs in the former, I will be exalted; they triumph in this, v. 7. and again v. 11. It is the burden of the song. Let all believers triumph in this: God, a God of all power, the sovereign Lord, is with us, sides with us, acts with us, and has promised He will never leave us. We are under his protection, a God in covenant with us, not only able, but engaged in honor and faithfulness to help us. He is the God of Jacob, not only Jacob the person, but Jacob the people; nay, and of all praying people, the spiritual seed of wrestling Jacob; mark this, and take the comfort of it, and say, If God be for us, who can be against us?

Ps. XLVII. The scope of this Ps. is, to stir us up to praise God, to stir up all people to do it. Many suppose it was penned on occasion of bringing the ark to mt. Zion, which v. 5. seems to refer to; God is gone up with a shout; but it looks further, to Christ's ascension to the heavenly Zion, after finishing his undertaking, and to the setting up of his kingdom. In singing it, we are to honor the exalted Redeemer, rejoice in his exaltation, celebrate his praises, confessing He is Lord, to the glory of God the Father.

V. 1—4. The Psalmist, having his own heart filled with great and good thoughts of God, endeavors to engage all about him in the blessed work of praise; as one convinced that God is worthy of all blessing and praise, and as one grieved at his own and others' backwardness to, and barrenness in, this work. Observe, in these vs.,

1. Who are called on to praise God; 'all ye people, of Israel; or, of the earth;' so it may be a prophecy of the conversion of the Gentiles; see Rom. 15: 11.

2. What they are called on to do; O clap your hands,* in token of your own joy and satisfaction in what God has done for you; of your approbation, nay admiration, of what God has done in general,' and of your indignation against all the enemies of God's glory, Job 27: 23. 'Clap your hands, as men transported with pleasure, that cannot contain themselves; shout unto God, to make all about you hear, and notice how much you are affected and filled with the works of God. Shout with the voice of triumph in Him, and in his power and goodness, that others may join your triumph.' Note, Such expressions of pious and devout affections as to some may seem indecent and imprudent, ought not to be hastily censured and condemned, much less ridiculed, because, if they come from an upright heart, God will accept the strength of the affection, and excuse the weakness of the expressions of it.

3. What is suggested as matter for our praise. (1.) God's awful majesty; v. 2. there are those perfections in God that are to be reverenced by all, and particularly that power, holiness, and justice, that are to be dreaded by all that contend with Him. (2.) God's sovereign and universal dominion; He is a King that reigns alone, and with an absolute power; a King over all the earth; therefore a great King; the King of kings. (3.) His particular care of his people, and their concerns, now and ever.

[1.] In giving them victory and success, v. 3. witness their planting in Canaan, and their continuance there unto this day. But this looks forward to the kingdom of the Messiah, to be set over all the earth. Jesus Christ shall subdue the Gentiles; bring them in as sheep into the fold, so the word signifies, not for slaughter, but preservation. He shall subdue their affections, make them a willing people in the day of his power, bring their thoughts into obedience to Him, and reduce them, which had gone astray, under the guidance of the great Shepherd and Bishop of souls, 1 Pet. 2: 25.

[2.] In giving them rest and settlement, v. 4. He had chosen Canaan to be an inheritance for Israel; see Deut. 32: 8. This justified their possession, and sweetened their enjoyment of it; they had reason to think it a happy lot, as Infinite Wisdom chose it for them. And the setting up of God's sanctuary in it, made it the excellency, the honor of Jacob, Amos 6: 8. a good inheritance God chose for him, as loving him, Deut. 7: 8. Apply this spiritually, and it bespeaks, 1. The

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Those who have received Jesus Christ as their Lord and Savior, and live in grateful obedience to Him, make the power, wisdom, truth, and love of God, their 'refuge and strength;' and in every urgent danger and trouble, they will find Him a ready and a present Help. If our faith were as strong as our security is good, we need fear no combination of enemies, no revolutions in kingdoms, and no convulsions in nature; but, in the most tremendous dangers, might triumph in the fullest assurance of security and victory. Let us then pray for increase of faith, and be careful to lay up our treasures in heaven: thus, when the earth and all its works shall be burnt up, we shall have nothing to fear, or to lose. Happy are they, in every case, who are enrolled citizens of the holy city of our God, in which He dwells as a Father, a Defender, and a Comforter of his people. But let the ungodly tremble at beholding the destruction of those, who have opposed the cause and people of God.—Let us pray [and act] for the speedy approach of these glorious days [of gospel-peace.]

NOTES.

Ps. XLVII. 'It appears by this and other Pss. that the public processions of the Hebrews were no less animated and noisy than those of the ancient heathens [especially in the E.] and nominal Christians: but in one important respect they differed; their rejoicings—their shoutings—were the voice of solemn praise, and not debased (so far as we know) by either intemperance or profaneness. The constant though distant expectation of the Messiah, seems to have sanctified their joy, and turned their songs of triumph into hymns of praise.'

happiness of the saints, that God Himself has chosen their inheritance for them, a goodly heritage: 16: 5. 1 Pet. 1: 4. This will be indeed the excellency of Jacob, for whom, because He loved them, He prepared such a happiness as eye has not seen. 2. The faith and submission of the saints to God. This is the language of every gracious soul, 'God shall choose my inheritance for me; let Him appoint me my lot, and I will acquiesce in the appointment. He knows what is good for me better than I do myself, therefore I will have no will of my own but what is resolved into his.'

V. 5—9. We are here most earnestly pressed to praise God; so backward are we to this duty, that we have need to be urged to it; so we are here, v. 6. This intimates, that it is a very necessary and excellent duty, a duty we ought to be frequent and abundant in; we may sing praises again and again in the same words, and it is no vain repetition, if done with new affections. Should not a people praise their God? Dan. 5: 4. subjects their king? God is our God, our King, therefore we must praise Him as those that are pleased with Him, and not ashamed of Him. But here is a needful rule subjoined, v. 7. Sing ye praises with understanding, with Maschil. 1. 'Intelligently; as those that understand why, and the meaning of the service.' This is the gospel rule, 1 Cor. 14: 15. only with the heart do we make melody to the Lord, Eph. 5: 19. It is not an acceptable, if it be not a reasonable service. 2. 'Instructively; as those that desire to make others understand God's glorious perfections, and to teach them to praise Him.'

Three things are mentioned in these vs. as just matter for our praises, and each will admit a double sense;

1. God's going up, v. 5. The ark being the instituted token of God's special presence with them, when that was brought up by warrant from Him, He might be said to go up. The emerging of God's ordinances out of obscurity, in order to their more public and solemn administration, is a great favor to any people, which they have reason to rejoice in, and give thanks for. In the ascension of our Lord, Acts 1: 9. God went up with a shout, the shout of a King, of a Conqueror, as one who, having spoiled principalities and powers, then led captivity captive, 68 : 18. He went up as Mediator, typified by the ark, and the mercy-seat over it, and was brought, as the ark into the most holy place, into heaven itself; see Heb. 9: 24. We read not of a shout, or the sound of a trumpet, at the ascension of Christ, but the sons of God then shouted for joy, Job 38 : 7. He shall come again in the same manner as He went, Acts 1: 11. and we are sure He shall come again with a shout and the sound of a trumpet.

2. God's reigning, v. 7, 8. God is not only our King, and therefore we owe our homage to Him, but He is King of all the earth, v. 7. and therefore, in every place, the incense of praise is to be offered up to Him. This may be understood, (1.) Of the kingdom of providence. God, as Creator, and the God of nature, disposes all affairs, as He pleases. See here the extent and equity of his government; even the heathen, that serve other gods, are ruled by the true God; and it is a throne of holiness He sits on, whence He gives warrants, orders, and judgment. (2.) Of the kingdom of the Messiah. Jesus Christ is intrusted not only with the administration of providence, but He shall set up the kingdom of his grace in the Gentile world, and rule in the hearts of multitudes that were bred up in heathenism, Eph. 2: 12, 13. This the apostle speaks of as a great mystery, that the Gentiles should be fellow-heirs; Eph. 3 : 6. all the administrations of his government are intended to show forth God's holiness, and to advance holiness [and happiness] among the children of men.

3. God's being attended and honored by the princes of the people, v. 9. This may be understood, (1.) Of the congress or convention of the states of Israel, the heads and rulers of the several tribes, at the solemn feasts, or to despatch the public business of the nation. It was the honor of Israel, that they were the people of the God of Abraham, as Abraham's seed, and in covenant; and, thanks be to God, this blessing of Abraham is come on the isles of the Gentiles, Gal. 3 : 14. Magistracy is God's institution, and He serves his own purposes by it in the government of the world, turning the hearts of kings, as the rivers of water, which way soever He pleases. (2.) It may be applied to the calling of the Gentiles, and taken as a prophecy, that, in the days of the Messiah, the kings of the earth and their people should join the church, and bring their glory and power into the New Jerusalem; should all become the people of the God of Abraham, to whom it was promised that he should be the father of many nations. The volunteers of the people, so it may be read; it is the same word that is used, 10 : 3. Thy people shall be willing; for those that are gathered to Christ are not forced, but made freely willing, to be his. When the shields of the earth, the ensigns of royal dignity, 1 K. 14 : 27, 28. are surrendered to the Lord Jesus, as the keys of a city are presented to the conqueror or sovereign, when princes [here called shields. Ed.] use their power for the advancement of the interests of religion, then Christ is greatly exalted.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The universal and absolute sovereignty of our holy God would be most terrible to every sinner, were it not administered by his incarnate Son from a mercy-seat: but now, it is terrible to the obstinate workers of iniquity alone.—While his peculiar people express their confidence, gratitude, and joy, by every token of external exultation, and animate each other in his service; let sinners submit to his authority, and accept of his salvation, that they may share in his holy triumph.—As angels and glorified saints worshipped the ascending Savior, and welcomed Him with shouts of joy and the trump of God: surely we on earth should join our praises with holy affections; and with understanding of his excellency and our obligations, that we may glorify Him and edify others also. Our backwardness to this reasonable service must be overcome by repeated exhortations; and when our hearts are attuned to this holy worship, we should call on all around to unite in it: may He hasten the time, when all kings and rulers shall serve Him, and use their delegated authority to his glory! Then will 'all the families of the earth be blessed in Him:' while, as the God of Abraham, He becomes their 'Shield, and exceeding great Reward.' SCOTT.

'God is gone up, by the special token of his presence, into the holy place, with shouts of joy and praise.' Patrick.—If, however, we consider this of Christ's ascension, the whole appears far more interesting, and becomes in the highest degree animated and appropriate, as introductory to the repeated call to fervent praises. Verses 6, 7.

Our King. (6) The Messiah is continually celebrated in the Pss. as Israel's King; it is therefore most natural to interpret this expression of Him in almost every part of them; which leads us to multiplied proofs that He is JEHOVAH, and the Lord of all. (2:4—6, 45:1—5. Zeph. 3:14—17. Zech. 9:9, 10. 14:6—9. Matt. 25:34—40.)—Maschil. (M.—Note, 32: title.) SCOTT.

Verses 8, 9.

The manner in which God's dominion over the nations of the earth is here mentioned, seems a clear intimation of the calling of the Gentiles into the church, in consequence of Christ's ascension. (Rom. 15: 12.)—All the principal persons, from the several tribes of Israel, 'the people of the God of Abraham,' assembled to remove the ark, leaving the protection of their houses and families unto God, who accordingly was the Shield of the land. Thus, when the princes and rulers join themselves to the Lord Jesus, and use their authority and influence for the benefit of the church; God is greatly exalted, in becoming the Shield and Defender of their dominions.—Some, however, interpret the last clause to mean the rulers themselves; who, belonging to God, having their authority from Him, and using it according to his command, become the shields of their people; and thus by their means God is greatly exalted and honored among men. The heathen. (8) Or, 'the nations;' over all the nations of the earth, and not only over Israel.—The princes of the people. (9) Or, 'of the peoples' (plural). The rulers of other nations must be meant, as uniting with those of Israel: and this leads us to interpret the passage, of the conversion of the Gentiles to the ascended Savior, rather than of the typical transaction of the removal of the ark. SCOTT.

Ps. XLVIII. This Ps. as the two former, is a triumphant song; penned some think on occasion of Jehoshaphat's victory, 2 Chr. 20 : others, of Sennacherib's defeat, when his army besieged Jerusalem in Hezekiah's time; but for aught I know, by David, on occasion of some eminent victory in his time; yet not so calculated for that, but that it might serve any like occasion in after times, and be applicable also to the glories of the gospel-church, of which Jerusalem was a type, especially when it shall come to be a church triumphant, the heavenly Jerusalem, Heb. 12 : 22. the Jerusalem which is above, Gal. 4 : 26. In singing this Ps. we must be affected with our privilege as members of the gospel-church, and must express and excite our sincere good-will to all its interests.

V. 1—7. The Psalmist, designing to praise Jerusalem, and to set forth its grandeur, begins with praising God, and his greatness, v. 1. and ends with praising God, and his goodness, v. 14. Whatever is the subject of our praises, God must be both their Alpha and Omega. What is here said to Jerusalem's honor is,

I. That the King of heaven owns it; it is the city of our God, v. 1. He chose, out of all the cities of Israel, to put his name there; of Zion he said kinder things than of any place on earth, This is my rest for ever, here will I dwell, for I have desired it, 132 : 13, 14. It is the city of the great King, v. 2. This our Savior quotes, to prove, that to swear by Jerusalem, is profanely to swear by God Himself, Mat. 5 : 35.

1. It is enlightened with the knowledge of God. In Judah God is known, and his name great, but especially in Jerusalem, the head-quarters of the priests, whose lips were to keep this knowledge. Happy the kingdom, the city, the family, the heart, in which God is great, in which He is uppermost, in which He is all. There God is known, v. 3. and where He is known, He will be great; none contemn God, but those that are ignorant of Him.

2. It is devoted to the honor of God; therefore called the mountain of his holiness, Zech. 14 : 20, 21. This is the privilege of the church of Christ, that it is a holy nation, a peculiar people; Jerusalem, the type of it, is called the holy city, bad as it was, Mat. 27 : 53. till that was set up, but never after.

3. It is the place appointed for the solemn service and worship of God: there He is greatly praised, and greatly to be praised, v. 1. Note, The clearer discoveries are made to us of God and his greatness, the more it is expected we should abound in his praises. All parts of the country brought offerings to Jerusalem, and herein Jerusalem typified the gospel-church; for what little tribute of praise God has from this earth, arises from that church on earth, which is therefore his tabernacle among men.

4. It is taken under his special protection: v. 3. He is known for a Refuge. They that know Him, will trust in Him, and seek to Him, 9 : 10. God was known, not only in the streets, but even in the palaces, of Jerusalem, for a Refuge; the great men had recourse to God, and acquaintance with Him. And then religion was likely to flourish in the city, when it reigned in the palaces.

5. On all these accounts, Jerusalem, and especially mt. Zion, on which the temple was built, was universally beloved and admired, v. 2. What made it beautiful, was, it was the mountain of holiness, for there is a beauty in holiness.

II. That the kings of the earth were afraid of it. That God was known in their palaces for a Refuge, they had had a late and very remarkable instance. Whatever it was,

1. They had had but too much occasion to fear; For the Kings were assembled, (v. 4.) the neighboring princes confederated against Jerusalem, for its ruin; their forces passed, advanced, and marched on, together, not doubting soon to master that city, which should have been the joy, but was the envy, of the whole earth.

2. God made their enemies to fear them; as the sight of the tents of Jacob frightened Balaam from his purpose, Num. 24: 2. They saw it and marvelled, and hasted away, v. 5. The sight of Jerusalem brought to mind what they had heard of the special presence of God in that city, and the divine protection it was under, and God impressed such terrors on their minds thereby, as made them retire with precipitation; v. 6. Note, God can dispirit the stoutest of his church's enemies. Their fright upon the sight of Jerusalem, is here compared to the throes of a woman in travail, sharp, grievous, and sometimes sudden, 1 Thess. 5: 3. which cannot be avoided, and which are effects of sin and the curse. The defeat hereby given to their designs on Jerusalem, is compared to the dreadful work made with a fleet of ships by a violent storm, when some are split, others shattered, all dispersed, v. 7. The terrors of God are compared to an east-wind, Job 27: 20, 21. Who knows the power of God's anger?

V. 8—14. We have here the good use and im-

NOTES.

Ps. XLVIII. Hammond styles this Ps. 'a hymn in honor of Jerusalem,' but when, and on what occasion it was written, seems not agreed. Dr. A. Clarke refers it to the time of the return of the Jews from captivity, and supposes it may have been sung at the dedication of the second temple:—Williams, to the age of David, and thinks he wrote it on his victory over the Syrians and their confederates, 2 Sam. 10 : 15-19.—Horsley, to the reign of Uzziah, because he augmented the fortifications of Jerusalem, 2 Chr. 26.—Mudge, to the time of Ahaz, when Rezin, king of Syria, and Pekah, king of Israel, came up against Jerusalem; and cites Is. 7. and 8. in support. Others, however, and most who agree in any particular reference, refer it to the time of Jehoshaphat, when Jerusalem was invaded by the Moabites, Ammonites and Idumeans. Of this opinion are Patrick, Morison, Dathe, Rosenm. For the history of the occasion, see 2 Chr. 20. Ed.

Verses 2—3.

The situation of Zion, with the adjacent region, was very beautiful, and the glory and joy of the whole land. Zion is supposed to have been situated on the S. side of the mountain; but the temple stood on the N. side of it, and was its peculiar honor and distinction. (Is. 14: 13.)—Scott. See the engraving, end of Mark. Ed.

(2.) 'Some difference obtains in the pointing of this v. Some have a colon after Mt. Zion; others a semicolon; and others still, a comma only. Most join "on the sides of the N." to "Mt. Zion"; supposing, as Henry, Mt. Zion stood northward of Jerusalem, which they gather from Is. 14 : 13. Others much oppose this, and would have the words, on the side of the N. to belong to "the city," &c. These quote Josephus and others to prove that Mt. Zion stood S. and had Jerusalem, i. e. the chief part of the city, N. Others, again who maintain the same as to the situation of both, yet take the words Mt. Zion and on the side of the N. together; because, though Zion itself were southward, as they maintain, yet it had Jerusalem, the chief part of it, on the N. On the N. then, means not absolutely, in regard to itself; but with reference to Jerusalem.' Assemb. Ann.—'In the northern quarter are the buildings of the Great King, these buildings dedicated to Him, the temple with its ample precincts.' Bp. Horsley.—'The site of Jerusalem was principally on the N. side of Mt. Zion.' Morison.—'The whole earth, may signify nothing more than the land of Judea.' Ed.

Verses 4—7.

(M. R.) 'Illustrations of this kind are sometimes introduced, by the sacred writers, with the mark of comparison; and frequently, as here, without it. The meaning evidently is, that as the E. wind [note Job 15: 2.] shatters in pieces the ships of Tarshish, so the divine power struck the heathen kings with terror and astonishment.' Bp. Horne. Matt.

(7.) 'This is not reported as a matter of fact, for we read of no ships in those expeditions to which this Ps. relates, nor did any ships come near Jerusalem, because that was a great distance from the sea, and from any navigable river running into the sea; but only added by way of illustration, or allusion.' Poole. Tarshish.] 'A maritime place in Cilicia, Ex. 27:25. Jonah 1: 3. usually put for the sea, as 1 K. 10:22. 2 Chr. 9.21. Ps. 72:10. Is. 2:16. Jer. 10:9.' Id., after Josephus.—Or, as Bochart, in Hammond, 'Tartessus, now Cadiz in Spain, a most opulent place, therefore turned by the poets into the Elysian fields, and by geographers called the Pillars of Hercules, beyond which was no passing.' Bochart, in Hammond.—Prideaux says, 'any place in the southern or greater Indian sea, at the distance of a then three years voyage from Elath, which can best furnish the merchants with gold, silver, ivory, apes and peacocks, may be guessed to be the Tarshish of the holy Scriptures.' Bp. Patrick refers here to 2 Chr. 20:37. for illustration respecting breaking the ships, and in confirmation of his reference of the Ps. to the time of Jehoshaphat. Ed.

Verse 8.

As a prophecy, this must mean that city of the living God, of which Jerusalem was but a type: (Gal. 4:21—31. Heb. 12:22—25. Rev. 21:) for Jerusalem was repeatedly taken, and at length given up to be 'trodden under foot by the Gentiles;' but the church of Christ is founded on city of the LORD of hosts, in the city of our God: [a] God will establish it for ever. Selah.

provement God's people are taught to make of his late glorious and gracious appearances for them.

1. Let our faith in God's Word be hereby confirmed. If we compare what God has done with what He has spoken, we shall find, that as we have heard, so have we seen, v. 8. and what we have seen, obliges us to believe what we have heard. As we have heard in the promise and prediction, so have we seen in the performance and accomplishment. In the great things God has done, and is doing, for his church, it is good to notice the fulfilling of the Scriptures; and this would help better to understand both the providence, and the Scripture.

2. Let our hope of the stability and perpetuity of the church be hereby encouraged. This was not fulfilled in Jerusalem, but has its accomplishment in the gospel-church, Matt. 16: 18. Is. 14: 32. And what we have seen, compared with what we have heard, may encourage us to hope in that promise of God, on which the church is built.

3. Let our minds be hereby filled with good thoughts of God, v. 9. All the streams of mercy that flow down to us, must be run up to the fountain of God's loving-kindness, of which we must think with delight, frequently, constantly, fixedly. What subject can we dwell on more noble, more pleasant, more profitable, especially when we attend upon Him in his temple!

4. Let us mention to the glory of God the great things He has done for us, v. 10. By the late signal deliverance of Jerusalem, God had made Himself a name; gloriously discovered his wisdom, power, and goodness, and made all the nations about sensible of it; and so was his praise; i. e. some, in all parts, would be found giving glory to Him accordingly. As far as his name goes, his praise will go; at least, it should go, and, at length, shall, when all the ends of the world shall praise Him, 22: 27. Rev. 11: 15. Some, by his name, understand especially that glorious name, the Lord of hosts; according to that name, so is his praise; for all the creatures, even to the ends of the earth, are under his command. But his people must, in a special manner, acknowledge his justice in all He does for them.

5. Let all the members of the church, in particular, take to themselves the comfort of what God does for his church in general, v. 11. 'Let mount Zion rejoice, the priests and Levites that attend the sanctuary, then let all the daughters of Judah, the country-towns, and the inhabitants of them, be glad; let the women, in their songs and dances, as usual on occasion of public joys, celebrate with thankfulness this great salvation which God has wrought for us.'

6. Let us diligently observe the instances and evidences of the church's beauty, strength, and safety, and faithfully transmit our observations to those that shall come after us, v. 12, 13. Walk about Zion. Some think this refers to the ceremony of the triumph; let those employed in that solemnity walk round the walls, as they did, Neh 12: 31. singing, and praising God. In doing this, let them tell the towers, and mark well the bulwarks, all in their full strength, and none of them damaged; the palaces in their beauty, and none of them blemished; v. 4. Tell this to the generation following, as a wonderful instance of God's care of his holy city, that the enemies should not only not ruin or destroy it, but not so much as hurt or deface it: and thus they might fortify themselves against the fear of the like threatening danger, another time. So, (1.) We may understand it literally of Jerusalem, and the strong-holds of Zion, v. 5. Jerusalem was generally looked upon as an impregnable place, as appears, Lam. 4: 12. nor could any enemy have entered, if the inhabitants had not sinned away their defence. Mark ye, set your heart to her bulwarks, intimates that the principal bulwarks of Zion were objects, not of sense, but of faith; its bulwarks, mostly to be relied on, were the special presence of God in it, the beauty of holiness He had put upon it, and his promises concerning it. Calvin observes here, that when they are directed to transmit to posterity a particular account of the towers, bulwarks, and palaces of Jerusalem, it is intimated, that, in process of time, they would all be destroyed, and remain no longer to be seen; for, otherwise, what need was there to preserve their description and history? When the disciples were admiring the temple, their Master told them, in a little time one stone should not be left on another, Matt. 24: 1, 2. Therefore, (2.) This must certainly be applied to the gospel-church, that mount Zion, Heb. 12: 22. 'See it founded on Christ, what precious ordinances are its palaces, what precious promises its bulwarks; tell this to the generation following, that they may with purpose of heart espouse its interests, and cleave to it.'

7. Let us triumph in God, and in our assurances of his everlasting loving-kindness, v. 14. (1.) If God be ours, it is for ever, for it is the everlasting blessedness of glorified saints, that God Himself will be with them, and be their God, Rev. 21: 3. (2.) If He be our God, He will be our Guide, faithful, constant, to show us our way, and lead us in it;

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The Lord is a great and glorious King, and worthy of universal and most exalted praises: but none on earth will render Him this due honor, except the citizens of the heavenly Jerusalem, who worship Him in the mountain of his holiness, as their God and Savior. (Gal. 4: 21—31.)—The Lord will always act in perfect consistency with those glorious perfections, which, by means of his Word, are made known and celebrated to the ends of the earth: the salvation of his people will be accompanied with righteous vengeance on his enemies; but every true believer may rejoice because of his judgments. Let us then diligently examine, and accurately mark, the security of the everlasting covenant, confirmed by the Word and oath of the immutable God: let us consider that 'his church is built on a rock, against which the gates of hell shall not prevail;' and let us meditate upon his exceedingly great and precious promises, and the privileges enjoyed by every true believer. a Rock, and God will certainly establish it for ever and ever. (125: 1,2. Matt. 16:18.) SCOTT.

Verse 9.

'We have waited, in silent contemplation and patient hope, for thy loving-kindness, with sacrifices and believing prayers presented at thy temple; trusting in thy aid, and not in our own power or valor.'—This was the conduct of Hezekiah, amidst the menaces and blasphemies of Rabshakeh and Sennacherib. (2 K. 18:17—37. 19: 2 Chr. 32: 1—22.) Yet the conduct of Jehoshaphat and his subjects seems more exactly to accord to these words, than even that of Hezekiah. (2 Chr. 20:1—30.) ID.

Verse 10.

The 'name' of God may, in this connection, either mean the glorious perfections by which He was known to his people, and distinguished from all the idols of the heathen; or his title, as 'the LORD of hosts, the God of Abraham, and the God of Israel.' (M. R. a.—Ex. 3:14,15. 34:5—7.)—In both respects, the powerful protection afforded his people, and the righteous vengeance executed by his right hand on their insolent and impious invaders, would tend to make his praises celebrated through the whole land, and indeed to the ends of the earth. (2 K. 19:14—19, v. 19.) ID.

Verse 11.

This v. is in the fut. and may literally be rendered, 'Mt. Zion will rejoice, and the daughters of Judah (the other towns and villages depend ent on Jerusalem) will be glad because of thy judgments;' as an anticipation, during the apparent danger, of victory and exulting praises, rather than as a subsequent exhortation. (2 Chr. 20:12—25.) SCOTT.

Verses 12—13.

This exact survey of Jerusalem's walls and fortifications, to be transmitted to posterity, might also intimate, that they were typical of more permanent privileges. (Heb. 12:26—29.) ID.

(12—14.) 'This address may be viewed, either as an exultation over the scattered, fallen enemies of Zion, or as a patriotic appeal to the inhabitants of the sacred city.' MORISON.

Verse 14.

This v. as the conclusion of a Ps. in which temporal deliverance, security, and privileges might appear to be exclusively celebrated, is a strong intimation, that spiritual and eternal blessings were also meant. It was before said, that God would establish Jerusalem for ever: but it is here added, in the most emphatical language imaginable, 'This God,' who protects Jerusalem, 'is our God,' or the Friend and Patron of his true people; and that 'for ever and ever,' or 'to all eternity' 'He will be our Guide unto death;' through all the sorrows and dangers of this world, to the eternal blessings of heaven. The Psalmist calls on all mankind to attend to his instructions, 1—4. He shows that the righteous have no cause to fear in evil times, 5. He exposes the vanity of trusting in riches, 6—13. Ps. XLIX. V. 1—5. This is the Psalmist's preface to his discourse, on the vanity of the world and its insufficiency to make us happy; and we seldom meet with an introduction more solemn; for there is no truth more certain, nor of greater weight, or advantage.

1. Hear this, and give ear, not only Israelites, but all ye inhabitants of the world; this doctrine is not peculiar to men blessed with divine revelation, but even the light of nature witnesses to it. All may know, therefore let all consider, that riches will not profit them in the day of death. Let not the high and rich be vain, nor proud, nor secure, but lay out their riches in doing good; let those that are poor and low be content, and not envy. Poor people are as much in danger from an inordinate desire toward wealth, as rich people from an inordinate delight in it.

2. He gives a good reason why his discourse should be regarded, v. 3. what he had to say was true and good; not doubtful but certain, not trivial but weighty, not a matter of nice speculation, but of admirable use to guide us in the right way to our great end. It was what he had himself well-digested, the meditation of his heart; as 19: 14. 45: 1. What ministers speak from their own hearts is most likely to reach the hearts of hearers.

3. He engages his own attention, v. 4. It is called a parable, not because figurative and obscure, but because wise, and very instructive: the same word is used of Solomon's proverbs. The Psalmist will himself incline his ear to it. This intimates he was taught it by the Spirit of God, and did not speak of himself; that he thought himself nearly concerned in it, and was resolved not to venture his own soul on that which he dissuaded others from venturing theirs upon; nay, that he would not expect others to attend to that, which he himself did not attend to as a matter of the greatest importance. Where God gives the tongue of the learned, He first wakens the ear to hear as the learned, Is. 50: 4.

4. He promises to make the matter as plain, and as affecting, as he could. Some understood it not, it was a riddle to them; tell them of the vanity of the things that are seen, and of the reality and weight of invisible things, and they say, Ah, Lord God, doth he not speak parables? For the sake of such, he would open this dark saying, and make it so plain, that he that runs might read it. Others understood it well enough, but it never affected them, and, for their sake, he would try the harp, to work upon, to win upon them. A verse may find him who a sermon flies. Herbert.

5. He begins with the application of it to himself, which is the right method to treat of divine things. Before he comes to set down the folly of carnal security, v. 6. he here lays down, from his own experience, the benefit and comfort of a holy, gracious security in God. Wherefore should I fear? he means, Wherefore should I fear their fear, Is. 8 : 12. the fears of worldly people ? (1.) 'Wherefore be afraid of them? all whose power lies in their wealth, which will not enable them to redeem their friends, or ruin me.' Great men of the world will not appear at all formidable, when we consider what little stead their wealth will stand them in. (2.) 'Wherefore be afraid like them?' The days of old age and death are the days of evil. In them, worldly, wicked people will be afraid; nothing more dreadful to them, than to think of leaving it; death to them is the king of terrors, because, after death, comes the judgment, when their sins will surround them as so many furies; but wherefore should a good man fear death, who has God with him? 23: 4. When the iniquities of his heels, or steps, compass him about, he sees them all pardoned, his conscience is purified and pacified, and then, even in the judgment-day, when the hearts of others fail them for fear, they can lift up their heads with joy, Luke 21 : 26, 28. Note, The children of God, though ever so poor, are in this truly happy, above the most prosperous of the children of this world, that they are well-guarded against the terrors of death, and the judgment.

V. 6—14. In these vs. we have,

1. A description of the spirit and way of worldly people, whose portion is in this life, 17: 14.—49: 6,11. It is taken for granted they have wealth, v. 6. houses and lands, which they call their own, v. 11. God often gives abundance of these things to bad men, who live in contempt of Him, and rebellion against Him, [but obey a part of his laws and receive the lower benefits, conferred by that partial obedience; Note, Job 34 : 1. 36 : 8—14. Ed.] by which it appears, they are not the best things in themselves, for then God would give most of them to his best friends; nor best for us, for then, they would not have so much of them, who, being marked for ruin, [ripen for it] by their prosperity, Prov. 1 : 32. [and note there.] A man may have abundance of wealth

NOTES.

Ps. XLIX. Rosenm. notes this Ps. as very similar to the 37th—Poole, to the 39th and 73d. Dr. A. Clarke thinks it was intended to be obscure, and that v. 8. probably, was the dark saying to be uttered. Yet to Morison 'there is nothing in it peculiarly recondite and perplexing;' and 'if it be hid from the wise and prudent, it is, nevertheless, revealed to those babes whom God teaches.' Dr. A. Clarke, from its resemblance to the book of Job, thinks it may have been once a part of that book; but Morison notes its resemblance to it as the more remarkable, only because it evidently belongs to a much later age.

Title.] The author of this Ps. is not known. 'But whosoever composed it, . . . it is likely he had in his eye the unreasonable thirst of mankind after riches, and their insolence and haughtiness, when they have acquired them; which, it is possible, was a great discouragement to some pious but poor people in those times: and therefore . . . he indited this Ps. to check that vanity, by setting death before their eyes.' Patrick.—It is not improbable David wrote it, and gave it to the sons of Korah; though the title may mean, as many think, that it was written by some of the sons of Korah. Verses 1—4.

His important and universally interesting instruction, being written in the sacred scriptures, has already been proposed to innumerable multitudes, and will at length be heard by all the inhabitants of the earth, whether of noble or ignoble birth, whether rich or poor. Id.

(4.) Incline mine ear.] 'The phrase is thought to be taken from the musicians, who lay their ear close to the instrument, when they tune it, and by their ear try how the voice and instrument agree.'

Verse 5.

'There are no less than 17 or 18 several interpretations of the words, "When the iniquity of my heels shall compass me about." ' Assemb. Ann. 'Of my heels seems to note, not the efficient or meriting cause of the iniquity, or punishment here spoken of, but the object about which this iniquity is exercised; so frequently: thus the spoil of the poor, Is. 3:14. is not that spoil made by, but upon them: and the violence of the children of Judah, Heb. of Joel 3:19. is that done against them as we tr. it. See also Dan. 4:27. Mat. 10:1. Acts 4:9.' Poole. Heels.] 'In the prophecy, Gen. 3:15. this is the part to be wounded, which conveys the idea of being followed for that purpose. It is a remarkable fact, that the heel in the E. is the part said to be wounded when a treacherous person, under the guise of friendship, has inflicted an injury: such an one is called "a heel-cutter." He who supplants or betrays another goes by the same name. A person disappointed by another's getting a situation he tried for, says, "Ah! I will yet cut his heel," i. e. by some stratagem have him turned out. The serpent Gen. 3:15. affected friendship. So did Judas. Jacob 'took hold on Esau's heel,' and, says Dr. A. Clarke, his name is from a word signifying to 'defraud, deceive, supplant.' [The etymology of supplant possibly indicates a putting the foot into the track of another, under his heel as it is raised.] Dan was to be a heel-biting adder. Job says "Thou settest a print on the heels of my feet;" so that treacherous people, or supplanters, might not find any difficulty in accusing him. The Psalmist's familiar friend 'lifted up his heel,' i. e. proved false to his professions. [Patrick] Horne and Lowth render at Ps. 49:5. supplant. Parkhurst says "of my heels," rather "of my supplanters." Jeremiah speaks of "heels made bare," i. e. uncovered so that their enemies might easily supplant them.' Ed. The old tr. seems to give the true sense of this v.: 'Wherefore should I fear in the evil days, when iniquity shall compass me about, as at mine heels.' In the judgment of the best critics, among whom is Lowth, the word, rendered as a substantive 'my heels,' is a participle signifying 'my supplanters.' 'The purport of the question is plainly this—Why should I give way to fear and despondency, in the time of calamity, when the wickedness of my wealthy and powerful adversaries compasses me about, to supplant and overthrow me?' Bp. Horne. Scott.

and be made better by it, thereby have his heart enlarged in love, and thankfulness, and obedience, and may do that good with it which will be fruit abounding to his account; therefore it is not men's having riches that denominates them worldly, but their setting their hearts on them as the best things: so these worldly people are here described.

1. They confide in their wealth, v. 6. depend on it as their portion and happiness, and expect it will secure them from all evil, and supply them with all good, and that they need nothing else, no, not God Himself. Their gold is their hope, Job 31 : 24. so it becomes their god. Thus our Savior explains the difficulty of the salvation of rich people, Mark 10: 24. See 1 Tim. 6: 17.

2. They take a pride in their riches; They boast in the multitude of them, as if they were sure tokens of God's favor, and certain proofs of their own ingenuity and industry. They boast that they have all they would have, 10 : 3. and can set all the world at defiance; I sit as a queen, and shall be a lady for ever; therefore they call their lands after their own names, hoping thereby to perpetuate their memory; and, if their lands do retain the names by which they called them, it is but a poor honor; but they often change their names when they change their owners.

3. They flatter themselves with an expectation of the perpetuity of their worldly possessions, v. 11. and with this thought they please themselves. All thoughts are inward, but this thought is deeply rooted in their minds. A godly man has thoughts of the world, but they are outward; his inward thought is reserved for God and heavenly things; but a worldly man has only some foreign, floating thoughts of the things of God, while his fixed, inward thought is about the world; that lies nearest his heart, and is on the throne there. There it is industriously concealed; they cannot, for shame, say they expect their houses to continue for ever, but, inwardly, they think so. If they shall not continue for ever, yet they are so foolish as to think their houses shall;—and suppose they should, what good will they do them, when no longer theirs? But they will not; for the world passes away, and the fashion of it : all things are devoured by the teeth of time.

II. A demonstration of their folly herein. In general, v. 13. This their way is their folly. Note, The way of worldliness is a foolish way, contrary both to right reason and to our true interest. God Himself pronounced him a fool who thought his goods were laid up for many years, and that they would be a portion for his soul, Luke 12 : 19, 20. And yet the posterity of the worldly approve their sayings, say as they say, and do as they do. Note, The love of the world is a disease that runs in the blood; men have it by kind, till the grace of God cures it.

To prove the folly of carnal worldlings, he shows,

1. That, with all their wealth, they cannot save the life of the dearest friend they have in the world, nor purchase a reprieve for him when under the arrest of death, v. 7—9. But this looks further, to the eternal redemption which was to be wrought out by the Messiah, whom the O. T. saints had an eye to as the Redeemer. Immortality is a jewel of too great a value to be purchased by the wealth of this world. We are not redeemed with corruptible things, such as silver and gold, 1 Pet. 1 : 18, 19. The learned Dr. Hammond applies vs. 8 and 9 expressly to Christ; 'The redemption of the soul shall be precious, highly prized, cost very dear; but, being once wrought, it shall cease for ever, never need to be repeated, Heb. 9 : 25, 26.—10 : 12. And He, the Redeemer, shall yet live for ever, and shall not see corruption; He shall rise again before he sees corruption, and then shall live for evermore,' Rev. 1 : 18. Christ did that for us, which all the riches of the world could not do; well therefore may He be dearer to us than any worldly things. Christ did that for us which a brother, a friend, could not do for us, no not one of the best estate or interest; therefore those that love father or brother more than Him, are not worthy of Him. This likewise shows the folly of worldly people, who sell their souls for what would never buy them.

2. That, with all their wealth, they cannot secure themselves from the stroke of death. The worldling sees, and it vexes him to see, that the wise and the fool, the brutish, alike die, v. 10. Therefore he cannot but expect that he also must die : Some rich people are wise, but they cannot out-wit death, nor evade his stroke; others are fools: these, though they do no good, yet perhaps do no great hurt, in the world: but that shall not excuse them; they shall die, as well as the wise that did mischief with their craft. Or, by the wise and the foolish we may understand the godly and the wicked; the godly die, and their death is their deliverance; the wicked perish, their death is their destruction ; but, however, they leave their wealth to others. They cannot continue with it; that is a frivolous plea, though once it served a turn, Jer. 41 : 8. Slay us not, for we have treasures in the field. They cannot carry it away with them, but must leave it. They cannot foresee who will enjoy it when they have left it; they must leave it, but to whom, they know not, perhaps to a fool, Eccl. 2 : 19. perhaps to an enemy.

And as men's wealth will stand them in no stead in a dying hour, so neither will their honor, v. 12. We will suppose a man advanced to the highest pinnacle of preferment; yet then his honor does not continue, nay, he himself does not.

Verse 8.

Precious.] 'Rare, or not to be found, as prophecy was precious in the days of Eli, 1 Sam. 3:1.' The price of redemption, whether of the life or soul, was too high for any mere man to pay: so that the ancient fathers referred the v. to Christ, in this sense, 'No man can redeem his brother, He alone excepted, who is also God.' (M. R.)—Even a Jewish interpreter 'understands these words of the King Messiah, who, having died for the redemption of his brethren, afterwards liveth for ever, as was predicted by Isaiah, Is. 53:10.' Bossuet. ID.

Verse 9.

'As long as the world endureth this will be a vain endeavor.—Let him attempt it, if he please, on himself. Can he prolong his own life, . . . that it shall be perpetuated and never dissolved.' Patrick. And if even this be a vain attempt, who can redeem or save his own immortal soul from the awful sentence of eternal punishment ?—See corruption.] 16:8—11. ID.

V. 7—13. 'O the dreadful folly of most men, who seek for, hold, delight in, and depend on, things of this world, as if they were their God, their ALL IN ALL! and yet how unavailable to ransom the soul, perpetuate the life, or preserve from hell ! To judge of things aright, we must weigh time with eternity. Happiness is found neither in wealth nor poverty, but in Christ's righteousness and grace. Hope in death comes only from redemption through his blood. Not their own vaunts, nor the world's admiration, but the Word of God adjusts men's real character; nor does what we have here, but what we carry into the other world, constitute true riches.' BROWN.

Verse 12.

The word rendered 'abideth,' signifies to lodge all night. (Notes, 20. 73:18—22. Ec. 3:18—21. 9:4—6. Heb. 9:27, 28.) SCOTT.—Nevertheless, &c.] 'The sense seems to be, "Man is perpetually restless, never satisfied with his present situation."' COTT. BIB.

Verse 13.

Some render the first clause, 'This their way is their confidence,' meaning a rash and presumptuous confidence. 'So close does this folly stick to mankind, that they that succeed in their possessions make no benefit of this observation; but are as very fools as themselves, and tread in the steps of those that went before them.' Patrick. Indeed, ungodly men, from age to age, not only copy the example, but imbibe the principles, and adopt the maxims, of those who went before them in this path, as admired dictates of wisdom. (Matt. 6:22, 23. Luke 16:14, 15.) SCOTT.

(13, 14.) The late venerable and excellent Dr. Stillman proposed a different punctuation here; 'This their way is their folly: yet their posterity approve their sayings like sheep.' (I. e. follow one another heedlessly in the same track.) 'Selah. They are laid in the grave; death shall feed on them;' &c. ED.

(14.) The most powerful and prosperous are soon carried into the grave, as sheep into the slaughter-house. There death feeds upon them. The word, repeatedly translated the grave, is often rendered hell, and probably means the unseen state, whether of body or soul. (16:8—11.)—'Christ's coming is as the morning, when the elect shall reign, with Christ their Head, over the wicked.' SCOTT.

(14, 15.) 'They also, like sheep, are placed in hades: Death is their shepherd; And the upright, in the time of judgment, Shall have dominion over them, When their frames, wasted in hades, Shall come forth from their habitation. Surely God will redeem my soul; From the power of hades He will verily take me." BOOTHR. in Mor.—In the morning.] 'What morning can be meant after death, but the morning of the resurrection, the time of judgment! It was the custom to hold courts of justice in the morning, Job 37:13. Boothr. considers the passage as plainly teaching the doctrines of a future state of retribution, of a resurrection and final judgment, and of the ultimate happy lot of the righteous.' MORISON.

(15.) The Psalmist in this v. expresses a full confidence, both that his soul would be preserved from hell, and his body raised from the grave; being received by the Lord to be for ever with Him. (31:5. 73:23—28, Luke 23:39—43. John 14:2, 3. Acts 7:54—60. 2 Tim. 1:11,12.)

He tarries not all night; this world is an inn, in which his stay is so short, he has but a baiting-time; He is like the beasts that perish; he must as certainly die as the beasts, and his death will be as final a period to his state in this world, as theirs is; his dead body likewise will putrify as theirs do; and, frequently, (so Hammond,) the greatest honors and wealth, unjustly gotten by the parent, descend not to any one of his posterity.

3. That their condition on the other side death will be very miserable. The world they dote on, will not only not save them from death, but will sink them so much the lower into hell, v. 14. Like sheep they are laid in the grave. Their prosperity did but feed them like sheep for the slaughter, Hos. 4: 16. and then death comes and shuts them up in the grave, like fat sheep in a fold, to be brought forth to the day of wrath, Job 21: 30. Multitudes of them, like flocks of sheep, dead of some disease, are thrown into the grave, and there death shall feed on them, the second death, the worm that dies not, Job 24: 40. Their own guilty consciences, like so many vultures, shall be continually preying on them, with, Son, remember, Luke 15: 25. Death insults and triumphs over them. Is. 14: 9, &c. While a saint can ask proud Death, Where is thy sting? Death will ask the proud sinner, Where is thy wealth, thy pomp? and the more he was fattened with prosperity, the more sweetly will death feed on him. And in the morning of the resurrection, when all that sleep in the dust shall awake, Dan. 12: 2. the upright shall have dominion over them; shall be assessors with Christ in passing judgment on them, and shall applaud the justice of God in their ruin. Let us now judge of things, as they will appear at that day. And what will become of all the beauty of the wicked? Alas! it shall all be consumed in the grave from their dwelling; but the beauty of holiness the grave cannot touch, or damage; but what beauty can be there where is nothing but the blackness of darkness for ever?

V. 15—20. Good reason is here given to good people,

I. Why they should not be afraid of death. There is no cause for that fear, v. 15. He had showed v. 14. how miserable the dead are that die in their sins; here he shows how blessed the dead are that die in the Lord. The distinction of men's outward condition, makes none at death; rich and poor meet in the grave: but the distinction of men's spiritual state, though, in this life, it makes a small difference, where all things come alike to all, yet, at and after death, it makes a very great one; Now he is comforted, and thou art tormented. The believing hopes of the soul's redemption from the grave, and reception to glory, to Himself, are the great support and joy of the children of God in a dying hour.

II. Why they should not be afraid of the prosperity and power of wicked people in this world, which, as it is their pride and joy, has often been the envy, and grief, and terror, of the righteous; which yet, all things considered, there is no reason for.

1. He supposes they will be under a strong temptation to envy the prosperity of sinners, and to be afraid that they, with their wealth and interest, will run down religion and religious people, and be found the only truly happy; for he supposes, (1.) That they are made rich, and so are enabled to give law to all about them. Pecuniæ obediunt omnes et omnia—Every person and every thing obey the commanding influence of money. (2.) That the glory of their house, from very small beginnings, is increased greatly, which naturally makes men haughty, insolent, and imperious, v. 16. (3.) That they are very easy and secure in themselves, and in their own minds, v. 18. Note, It is of great consequence to consider what that is in which we bless our souls; believers bless themselves in the God of truth, Isa. 65: 16. carnal people in the wealth of the world. Many precious souls lie under God's curse, who yet do bless themselves; they applaud that in themselves which God condemns, and speak peace to themselves, when God denounces war against them. Yet this is not all. (4.) They are in good reputation among their neighbors; 'Men will praise thee, and cry thee up, as having done well for thyself in raising such an estate and family.' This is the sentiment of all narrow-minded, selfish worldlings, that those do best for themselves that do most for their bodies, by heaping up riches, though, at the same time, nothing is done [for the better nature,] for the soul, for eternity; and accordingly they bless the covetous, whom the Lord abhors, 10: 3. If men were to be our judges, it were our wisdom thus to recommend ourselves to their good opinion: but what will it avail us to be approved of men, if God condemn us? Dr. Hammond understands this of the good man here spoken to, for it is the second person, not of the wicked man spoken of; 'He, in his life-time, blessed his soul, but thou shalt be praised for doing well unto thyself. The worldling magnified himself; but thou that dost not, like him, speak well of thyself, but dost well for thyself, in securing thy eternal welfare, thou shalt be praised, if not of men, yet of God, which will be thine everlasting honor.'

2. He suggests what is sufficient to take off the strength of the temptation, by directing us to look forward to the end of prosperous sinners; 73: 17. In the other world, they will be (1.) Never the better, for all the wealth and prosperity they are now so fond of, v. 17. The greatest and wealthiest cannot therefore be the happiest, because they are never the better for their living in this world: but those have something to show in the other world, for their living in this, who can say, through grace, that though they came corrupt, and sinful, and spiritually naked, into it, they go renewed, and sanctified, and well-clothed with the righteousness of Christ, out of it. (2.) Infinitely the worse, for all their abuses of their wealth and prosperity, v.

If this be left out, or indeed not distinctly and fully taken into the account, what does the solemn exordium of the Ps. introduce? (1—4.) For no other important distinction between the righteous and the wicked, in respect of happiness, is mentioned, or even intimated. SCOTT.

Verses 16, 17.

Worldly men count wealth and magnificence their glory: (Gen. 31: 1.) but holiness, being the moral image of God, is the true glory of our rational nature; and this will accompany us to heaven. ID.

Verse 18.

Mark in this v. the shortsightedness of worldly people, who would be thought the only practically wise. Mark the degeneracy of our nature. Man is so formed by his Creator, in reference to the universe, that obedience to the command, 'Love thy neighbor as thyself,' puts him in harmony with God's world, and prepares for him the greatest amount of real happiness. But how is the man laughed at as a visionary, who attempts to put this great law of his moral nature in practice, even too by professed Christians! Alas! how degenerate is that civilization, which exposes such an one to destitution and contempt, while that very selfishness, which its narrow philosophy eulogises as 'doing well' for its depraved practiser, is praised, and held up to our children, as an example of energy, enterprise, and practical wisdom. Wonderful wisdom, which has brought men to such misery as 'the creation groaneth' under! It has been well said—'That virtue which interests the whole human kind, is eminently superior to all the rest. True it is, indeed, that this is generally lost sight of altogether. In the appreciation of the virtues, the scale of their worth is commonly reversed. Most men think first of themselves, then of their families, then of their country, and seldom expend a thought upon humanity at large. There are even few who recognize the happiness of the species as the aim of man's existence, and the subordination of all else to this. Yet nature shows most evidently that she does all for the species; she universally sacrifices individuals to its preservation. Moreover, desire of self-preservation inheres in all animals, love of family and of country in a smaller number, but love of the entire species is a distinguishing character of man in his best estate. Is it to be expected that man will speedily practise the virtue of universal love? No; hitherto the happiness of countries has been sacrificed to that of families and of individuals; but general philanthropy is commonly decried and scouted as an aberration of the understanding; and this, too, in despite of the express command of Christianity.' Spurzheim. Nat. Verse 19.

'The soul shall go, &c.' (M.) Death will convey one generation after another from the light of this world; and how awful are the words, 'They shall not see light for ever!' (2 Pet. 2:17. Jude 11—13.) This fully proves, that the Psalmist was assured, the righteous would 'see light' after death, and for ever. (36:5—9.) SCOTT.

He who in prosperity [takes no pains to know and practise God's laws] has no understanding, [knowledge, or wisdom,] to use the gifts of God to his glory, but abuses them in wickedness, willingly renounces the grand distinction between a rational creature, and the beasts that perish. As to this world, he gratifies his [lower appetites and inclinations, not subjecting them to the higher, and an enlightened intellect] and dies, as beasts do: but 'after death is the judgment.' (12.) PSALM L.

The mighty God comes in awful majesty from Zion, to judge his people, in the sight of the assembled world, 1—4. He commands that the saints be gathered to Him; and declares that the heavens shall declare his righteousness, 5, 6. He delights not in legal sacrifices, but in spiritual worship, 7—15. Hypocrites are rebuked and silenced, 16—21. The ungodly are solemnly warned, and salvation is promised to the upright, 22, 23.

Be not afraid then of their pomp and power; the end of the man that is in honor, if he be not wise and good, will be miserable; if he understand not, he is to be pitied rather than envied. A fool, a wicked man, in honor, is really as despicable an animal as any under the sun; he is like the beasts that perish, v. 20. nay, better be a beast, than a man that makes himself like a beast. Men in honor, that understand, that know and do their duty, and make conscience of it, are as gods, and children of the Most High. But men in honor, that understand not, that [remain ignorant of God's laws,] proud, selfish, sensual, oppressive, are as beasts, and they shall perish, like the beasts, ingloriously as to this world, though not, like the beasts, indemnified as to another. Let prosperous sinners therefore be afraid for themselves, but let not even suffering saints be afraid of them.

Ps. L. This Ps. as the former, is a Ps. of instruction, not of prayer or praise; it is intended, 1. As a reproof to the carnal Jews, both those that rested in the external performances of their religion, and were remiss in the more excellent duties of prayer and praise; and those that expounded the law to others, but lived wicked lives themselves. 2. As a prediction of the abolishing of the ceremonial law, and of the introducing of a spiritual way of worship, in and by the kingdom of the Messiah, John 4: 23, 24. 3. As a representation of the day of judgment, in which God will call men to an account concerning their observance of those things which they have thus been taught; men shall be judged according to what is written in the books; therefore Christ is fitly represented speaking as a Judge, then when He speaks as a Lawgiver.

V. 1—6. Probably Asaph was not only the chief musician, who was to put a tune to this Ps. but also the penman of it; for we read, that in Hezekiah's time they praised God in the words of David, and of Asaph the seer, 2 Chr. 29: 30.

1. The court is called, in the name of the King of kings, v. 1. The mighty God, even the Lord; El, Elohim, Jehovah, the God of infinite power, justice, and mercy, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. God is the Judge, the Son of God came for judgment into the world, and the Holy Ghost is the Spirit of judgment. All the earth is called to attend, not only because God's controversy with his people Israel might safely be referred to any man of reason; but because all men are concerned to know the right way of worshipping God, in spirit and in truth; because, when the kingdom of the Messiah should be set up, all should be instructed in the evangelical worship, and invited to join in it, see Mal. 1: 11. Acts 10: 34. and because, in the day of final judgment, all shall be gathered together, to receive their doom, and every man shall give an account of himself unto God.

2. The judgment set, and the Judge taking his seat. Here is allusion to that, Deut. 33: 2. When God comes to reprove Israel for their hypocrisy, and to send forth his Gospel to supersede the legal institutions, it is said here, (1.) He shall shine out of Zion, as then from the top of Sinai, v. 2. Because in Zion his oracle was now fixed, thence his judgments on that provoking people were denounced, and his orders issued for their execution, Joel 2: 1. Blow ye the trumpet in Zion. Sometimes there are more than ordinary appearances of God's presence and power working with and by his Word and ordinances, to convince men's consciences, and reform and refine his church; and then God, who always dwells in Zion, may be said to shine out of Zion. Moreover, He may be said to shine out of Zion, because the Gospel, which set up spiritual worship, was to go forth from mt Zion, Is. 2: 3. Mic. 4: 2. and the preachers of i were to begin at Jerusalem, Luke 24: 47. Christians are said to come unto mt. Zion, to receive their instructions, Heb. 12: 22, 28. Zion is here called the perfection of beauty, because it was the holy hill; and holiness is indeed the perfection of beauty. (2.) He shall come, and not keep silence, shall no longer seem to wink at the sins of men, v. 21. but shall show his displeasure, and cause that mystery to be published by his apostles, which had long lain hid, that the Gentiles should be fellow-heirs, Eph. 3: 5, 6. and that the partition-wall of the ceremonial law should be taken down; this

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The important truths, which relate to the eternal state of the righteous and the wicked, are equally interesting to all the inhabitants of the earth, 'both high and low, rich and poor, together.' Blessed be God, they are plainly proposed to us in his holy Word; and had it not been for man's dislike to such subjects, they would have been universally heard and understood.—We should, however, still endeavor to illustrate and enforce these important instructions, by every method which can soften prejudice, or gain attention: especially by showing their influence on our own hearts [in regulating and harmonizing our desires], in mortifying [their inordinateness, as] covetousness, ambition, envy, discontent, selfishness and sensuality; in raising us above the fear of man, and rendering us constant and cheerful in doing the will and professing the truth of God, amidst the successful enmity of persecutors or oppressors.—Had not the ransom of the death of Christ intervened, the body of every sinner must have finally been left in the grave, and his soul in hell; for 'the redemption was too precious' to be otherwise effected, and 'must have been let alone for ever.' (Luke 12: 15—21.)—Death alone can convince men in general of the folly of laying up treasures on earth: and were there no future state, the most wealthy and honorable would soon be levelled with the beasts that perish: but in the prospect of the resurrection, and of eternity, the most prosperous of the wicked are infinitely more wretched and base. In this light, let the believer view the riches and the children of this world, that he may not be tempted to envy or impatience, or to fear evil consequences to himself and to the church of God, when sinners grow rich and honorable. (1 Cor. 6: 1—6. Rev. 3: 20—22.)—Is there a rational creature, who can prefer the lot of the rich sinner to that of poor Lazarus? (Luke 16: 19—31.) yet is not this more than brutish stupidity universal to the human race, if left to themselves? [For brutes obey their Creator in obeying all the instincts given them, but men, the vast majority, (in fact Christ is the only exception,) will not, and place selfish acquisition for sinful indulgences above the happiness flowing from the activity of the better nature, which indulges the lower propensities only in harmony with the higher impulses. ED.] What need then have we of revelation, and of the teaching of the Holy Spirit; when, with all our boasted powers, we are prone to such infatuation, in the most important of all concerns! O Lord, deliver us from [disobedience, and] the love of the world, and teach us to set our affections on things above! (Col. 3: 1—4.) SCOTT.

NOTES.

Ps. L. This is the first of the 12 Pss. ascribed to Asaph; respecting which, compared with David's, some are wont to mark a difference as to style and elegance of composition, giving the preference to those of David, especially for smoothness, softness and delicacy.—Patrick refers this Ps. to the time of Hezekiah; others, of David; and others still to the time of the Babylonish captivity.—Some, as Kimchi, (though Gill says K. interprets it of the day of judgment,) and Jarchi, take occasion, from the first five vs. to interpret the Ps. prophetically of the coming of the Messiah, to redeem the people from their enemies; but Rosenm. noting the above, justly observes respecting these vs. that they are only an exordium, to awaken the attention of the reader or hearer.—And the Asaph referred to, he thinks, was undoubtedly the son of Berechiah. See 1 Chr. 6:24. 15:17. 16:4, 5. also Rosenm. ED. 'The imagery in the introduction seems borrowed from the giving of the law at Sinai, Deut. 33:2. only God's glory, instead of shining forth from the wilderness, is displayed from Zion. The scene is that of supreme judgment, but extends to Israel only, not to the world at large. Some have applied this Ps. to the day of general judgment; and others, as Bps. Horne and Horsley, to the promulgation of the Gospel in the end of the Jewish dispensation; but, in our view, the simple topic is, the danger of hypocrisy.' WILLIAMS.

Title.] (2 Chr. 29:30.) Some expositors are of opinion, that 'Asaph the seer' was a different person from Asaph the Levite, who was one of the chief singers in the days of David; (*M. shall now no longer be concealed. In the great day, our God shall come, and shall not keep silence, but shall make those to hear his judgment that would not hearken to his law. (3.) His appearance should be very majestic and terrible; a fire shall devour before Him. The fire of his judgments shall make way for the rebukes of his Word, in order to the awakening of the hypocritical nation of the Jews, that the sinners in Zion, being afraid of that devouring fire, Is. 33:14. might be startled out of their sins. When his gospel-kingdom was to be set up, Christ came to send fire on the earth, Luke 12:49. The Spirit was given in cloven tongues as of fire, introduced by a rushing, mighty wind, which was very tempestuous, Acts 2:2, 3. And, in the last judgment, Christ shall come in flaming fire, 2 Thess. 1:8. See Dan. 7:9. Heb. 10:27. (4.) As on Sinai He came with ten thousands of his saints, so He shall now call to the heavens from above, to notice this solemn process, v. 4. as Moses often called heaven and earth to witness against Israel, Deut. 4:26. 31:28. 32:1. and God by his prophets, Isa. 1:2. Mic. 6:2. The equity of the judgment of the great day will be attested and applauded by heaven and earth, by saints and angels, even all the holy myriads.

3. The parties summoned, v. 5. This may be understood either, (1.) Of saints indeed; to them the following denunciations of wrath do not belong; rebukes to hypocrites ought not to be terrors to the upright. Here is given as a character of saints, that they have made a covenant with God by sacrifice. Note, Those only shall be gathered to God as his saints, who have, in sincerity, covenanted with Him, taken Him to be their God, and given up themselves to Him to be his people, and thus joined themselves to the Lord. It is only by sacrifice, by Christ the great Sacrifice, that sinners can covenant with God, so as to be accepted of Him. There must be an atonement made for the breach of the first covenant, before we can be admitted again into covenant. Or, (2.) It may be understood of saints in profession, such as the people of Israel were, who are called a kingdom of priests, and a holy nation, Ex. 19:6. They were, as a body politic, taken into covenant with God, the covenant of peculiarity, and it was done with great solemnity by sacrifice, Ex. 24:8.

4. The issue of this solemn trial foretold, v. 6. The heavens, those heavens called to be witnesses to the trial, v. 4. the people in heaven, shall say, Hallelujah. True and righteous are his judgments, Rev. 19:1, 2. The righteousness of God, in all the rebukes of his Word and Providence, in the establishment of his Gospel, and especially in the judgment of the great day, is what the heavens will declare. (1.) It will be universally known, and proclaimed to all the world. (2.) It will be incontestably owned and proved. Even sinners' own consciences will subscribe to it, and hell as well as heaven will be forced to acknowledge the righteousness of God. The reason given, is, for God is Judge Himself, Rom. 3:5, 6.

V. 7—15. God is here dealing with those that placed all their religion in the observances of the ceremonial law, and thought those sufficient.

I. He lays down the original contract between Him and Israel, in which they had avouched Him to be their God, and He them to be his people, and so both parties were agreed, v. 7. Note, We may comfortably expect God will speak to us, when we are ready to hear what He says.

II. He puts a slight on the legal sacrifices, v. 8, &c.

1. As looking back to the use of these under the law. God had a controversy with the Jews; but not for their neglect of the ceremonial institutions; no, they had not been wanting in the observance of them, and these, they thought, would both expiate and excuse their neglect of the weightier matters of the law. Nay, if they had, in some degree, neglected these institutions, yet that should not have been the cause of God's quarrel with them, for it was but a small offence, in comparison with the immoralities of their conversation. They thought God was mightily beholden to them for their many sacrifices; but He here shows them, He did not need their sacrifices, v. 9, 10. and could not be benefited by them; nor, if they were in this matter righteous, was He the better, v. 13. Will I eat the flesh of bulls? It is said indeed of the demons whom the Gentiles worshipped, that they did eat the fat of their sacrifices, and drink the wine of their drink-offerings, Deut. 32:38. but will the great Jehovah be thus entertained? No, to obey is better than sacrifice, and to love God and our neighbor, better than all burnt-offerings; so much better, that God, by his prophets, often told them that their sacrifices were not only not acceptable, but abominable, to Him, while they lived in sin, see Prov. 15:8. Isa. 1:11, &c.—66:3. Jer. 6:20. Amos 5:21. They are therefore here warned not to rest in these performances; but to conduct themselves, in all other instances, toward God as their God.

2. This may be considered as looking forward to the abolishing of these by the Gospel of Christ. Thus Hammond understands it. When God shall set up the kingdom of the Messiah, He will no more have these to be continually before Him, v. 8, 9. For indeed He never appointed this, as that which He had any need of, or took any pleasure in; but only to prefigure the great sacrifice his own Son should, in the fulness of time, offer on the cross, to make atonement for sin, and all the other spiritual sacrifices of acknowledgment, with which God, through Christ, will be well pleased.

III. He directs to the best sacrifices of prayer and praise, as those which, under the law, were preferred before all burnt-offerings and sacrifices, and on which then the greatest stress was laid, and which now, under the Gospel, come in the room of those carnal ordinances imposed until the times of reformation. 1. A penitent acknowledgment of our sins: offer to God confession; so some, who understand it of the confession of sin, in order to our giving glory to God, and taking shame to ourselves, that we may never return to it, 51:17. If the sin was not abandoned, the sin-offering was not accepted. 2. Thanks for his mercies to us; suffering, and does not immediately punish men for their sins. (Is. 42: 13—17, v. 14. 65:3—7. Acts 14:11—18. 17:30, 31.)—When [at last] Christ came among the Jews, though in the character of a Savior, they could not 'abide the day of his coming;' and his righteous indignation, like unquenchable fire, burnt up the chaff; i. e. He destroyed, by awful judgments, the bulk of the nation, which persisted in rejecting Him. (Mal. 3:1—6. 4:1. Matt. 3:7—12.) But his second coming to judge the world, to perfect the salvation of his people, and to punish the wicked, will be attended with still more tremendous displays of his power and justice, especially against such as neglect, oppose, or pervert and corrupt his Gospel.—'The Jewish rabbies affirm the subject of this Ps. to be, that judgment which will be executed in the days of Messiah:—ignorant, alas! that they themselves, and their people, are now become the unhappy objects of that judgment.' Bp. Horne.

Verses 4—6.

The whole human race indeed must appear in judgment: yet the professed worshippers of God, who have his oracles and ordinances among them, are chiefly spoken of, in all the descriptions given us in Scripture of that solemn season; because these descriptions were especially given for their instruction, warning, or encouragement. (Matt. 25:31—46. Rom. 2:7—16. 1 Cor. 4:3—5. 2 Cor. 5:9—12. 2 Thes. 1:5—10. Rev. 20:11—15.)—As 'the Father judgeth no man, but hath committed all judgment to the Son;' it must be sufficiently manifest, who it is, of whom it is said, 'For God is judge Himself,' even Emmanuel, the second person in the sacred Trinity, 'God manifest in the flesh.' Offer to God thanksgiving, every day, often every day, Seven times a day will I praise Thee, and on special occasions; and this shall please the Lord, if it come from an humble, thankful heart, full of love to Him, and joy in Him, better than ox or bullocks, 69: 30, 31. 3. Performing our covenants with Him; Pay thy vows to the Most High, forsake thy sins, and do thy duty better, pursuant to the solemn promises thou hast made Him to that purport. Hammond applies this to the great gospel-ordinance of the eucharist, in which we are to thank God for his great love in sending his Son to save us, pay our vows of love and duty to Him, and give alms. 4. In the day of distress, we must apply ourselves to God by faithful and fervent prayer, v. 15. Call upon Me in the day of trouble, and not on any other god. Thus must we keep up our communion with God; meeting Him with our prayers when He afflicts us, and with our praises when He delivers us.

V. 16—23. God, by the psalmist, having instructed his people in the right way of worshipping Him, and keeping up their communion with Him, here directs his speech to the wicked, to hypocrites, whether Jewish or Christian.

I. The charge.

1. Invading and usurping the honors and privileges of religion, v. 16. This is a challenge to those that are really profane, but seemingly godly, to show what title they have to the cloak of religion, and by what authority they wear it, when they use it only to cover and conceal the abominable impieties of their hearts and lives. Some think it points prophetically at the Scribes and Pharisees, and the account our blessed Savior gives of them, Mat. 23: and that of Paul, Rom. 2: 21, 22. makes this expostulation here agree very well to them. But it is applicable to all those that are practisers of iniquity, and yet professors of piety, especially if withal they be preachers of it.

2. They are charged with transgressing and violating the laws and precepts of religion. (1.) With a daring contempt of the Word of God, v. 17. Thou hatest instruction. They loved to give instruction, and to tell others what they should do, for this fed their pride, and made them look great, and by this craft they got their living; but they hated to receive instruction from God Himself, for that would be a check and mortification. Thou hatest discipline. In their conversations they cast God's Word behind them, did not care for seeing that rule they were resolved not to be ruled by. This is despising the commandment of the Lord. (2.) A close confederacy with the worst of sinners, v. 18. See Rom. 1: 32. (3.) A constant persisting in the worst of tongue-sins, v. 19. 'Thou givest thy mouth to evil; not only allowest thyself in, but addictest thyself wholly to, all manner of evil speaking;' lying, and slandering. Thy tongue frames deceit; thou art an overbearing judge, a deliberate slanderer, v. 20. Thou sittest and speakest against thy brother. Those that do ill themselves, commonly delight in speaking ill of others.

II. The proof, v. 21. Their sins will be proved on sinners beyond contradiction, in the judgment; 'I will reprove thee, or convince thee, so thou shalt have not one word to say for thyself.' The day is coming when impenitent sinners will have their mouths for ever stopped, and be struck speechless. What confusion will they be filled with, when God shall set their sins in order before their eyes!

III. The Judge's patience, and the sinner's abuse of that patience. Note, The patience of God is very great toward provoking sinners, and the more wonderful, because the sinner makes such an ill use of it; 'Thou thoughtest that I was altogether such a one as thyself, as weak and forgetful as thyself, as false to my word as thyself, nay, as much a friend to sin as thyself.' Sinners take God's silence for consent, and his patience for connivance; therefore the longer they are reprieved

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—15. The almighty and eternal JEHOVAH has spoken to men from mt. Sinai as a Lawgiver, and from mt. Zion as a Savior: and ere long He will speak to the whole human race from his righteous tribunal. Happy are they, who have acceded to the covenant of grace, by faith in the Redeemer's atoning sacrifice, and who have shown the sincerity of their love by the fruits of righteousness!—But let us beware of resting in any form: God will testify against his own professed people, who trust to their outward privileges; He demands the heart, and will not be put off with an unmeaning external observance.—We cannot offer unto God any thing, which He has not bestowed on us, nor any thing which can profit Him: so that the notion of meriting from Him is replete with ignorance, as well as arrogance. [See on 1 Chr. 29: 10—19. Job 22: 2.] As the Jews and their costly oblations were abhorred, when they rejected Him, of whom Moses and their prophets had written; so will attendance on the ordinances of Christianity be rejected, and even moral obedience itself, if substituted in his place: and no spiritual services can be performed, except by faith in Him, and by the supply of his Spirit. To be sensible of our own indigence, dependence, and unworthiness; to seek every thing from the all-sufficient God by faith and prayer; to render Him the tribute of a thankful heart; to perform the vows implied in baptism and the Lord's supper; (56: 12. P. O. end;) and to call on Him in every time of trouble, as our only Refuge and Friend; are reasonable sacrifices, and suited to Him, who 'is a Spirit, and seeketh such to worship Him, as worship Him in Spirit and truth.' (John 4: 21—24.) Those, who thus worship, 'glorify God:' and every answer to prayer, received with gratitude, forms an earnest of their eternal salvation.

sion of sacrifices, except as that arose from perverseness and rebellion. On the other hand, a humble, thankful heart, disposed to worship and praise God, (to 'sacrifice unto God thanksgiving,' Heb. 13:15, 16.) and to fulfil the engagements implied in the profession of being his people, as well as the vows made in the days of distress; and to confide in Him and seek help from Him in trouble, by earnest prayer, were sacrifices suited to his holy nature. This spiritual worship, springing from a penitent, believing heart, and connected with humble submission and obedience, was the grand substance of true religion, even under the Mosaic dispensation; and would be the substance of that which was about to succeed: and worshippers of this character would be accepted and delivered, and would render glory and praise to God for temporal mercies, and eternal salvation. (M. R. i—n.)—This passage was evidently intended as an intimation, that the ceremonial law would be abrogated at the coming of the Messiah; as well as an encouragement to prayer and praise.

Verses 16—21.

Multitudes of the strictest professors and teachers of the Jewish church were, not only superstitious and formal, (and so either blind guides or blindly led,) but even atrociously wicked; yet they cloaked their crimes with apparent zeal. (Matt. 23:14—33.) Thus in all ages many love the credit of being called Christians, and the dignity of instructers, who 'hate instruction;' and many discourse on the Word of God with their lips, who pour contempt upon it in their lives. Indeed, in this manner they often excuse their crimes, and even think they have compensated for them, by their earnestness in promoting what they suppose to be the cause of God. The whole of this strange delusion arises from a perverse construction put on the long-suffering of God: (Ec. 8:11—13. Rom. 2:4—6.) and a wilful mistake of his character and the intention of his Gospel: as if the methods of his grace, the doctrines of his Word, or the ordinances of his worship, were substituted in the stead of a holy life, and afforded men the license to indulge their lusts with impunity! But the Jews of old were reproved, convicted, condemned, and punished with the most dreadful severity, on these accounts: and so will all the superstitious, formal, hypocritical, enthusiastic, or antinomian abusers of the Gospel; when the day of judgment shall come, and the secrets of men shall be judged by Jesus Christ.—Consentedst, &c. (18) Or, 'Hadst pleasure in him.' (Rom. 1:28—32. conclusion.) Kept silence. (21) Note, 3.

PSALM LI.

David earnestly prays for mercy, humbly confesses his sins, and laments his original depravity, 1—6. He entreats forgiveness, sanctification, and renewed comfort, that he may glorify God and promote the conversion of sinners, 7—15. He shows, that God delights more in a contrite heart, than in legal sacrifices, 16, 17. He prays for the prosperity of the church, 18, 19.

ed, the more are their hearts hardened; but, if they turn not, they shall see their error too late, and that the God they provoke is just, holy, and terrible, not such a one as themselves.

IV. The fair warning given of the dreadful doom of hypocrites, v. 22. 'Now consider this, ye that forget God; consider that God knows, and keeps accounts of, all your sins; that He will call you to an account for them; that patience, abused, will turn into the greater wrath; that though you forget God, and your duty to Him, He will not forget you, and your rebellions against Him: consider this in time, before it be too late; for if these things be not considered, and the consideration of them improved, He will tear you in pieces, and there will be none to deliver.' Matt. 24: 51. Consideration is the first step toward conversion.

V. Full instructions given to us all, how to prevent this fearful doom. The conclusion of the whole matter, v. 23. directs us what to do, to attain our chief end.

1. Man's chief end is to glorify God, and we are here told, that whoso offers praise glorifies Him. We must praise God, and this He is pleased, in infinite condescension, to interpret as glorifying Him. Hereby we give Him the glory due to his name, and do what we can to advance the interests of his kingdom among men.

2. Man's chief end, in conjunction with this, is, to enjoy God; and we are here told, that those who order their conversation aright shall see his salvation. It is not enough for us to offer praise, but we must withal order our conversation aright. Thanksgiving is good, but thanks-living is better. Those that would have their conversation right must take care and pains to order it; to dispose it according to rule [to discover and obey all God's laws]; to understand their way, and to direct it. The right ordering of the conversation is the only, and sure way, to obtain the great salvation.

Ps. LI. David penned this Ps. on a very particular occasion, yet it is of as general use as any of his Pss.; it is the most eminent of the penitential, and most expressive of the cares and desires of a repenting sinner: we must come to the throne of grace in the posture of penitents, to confess our sins, and sue for the grace of God; and if therein we would take with us words, we can nowhere find any more apposite than here in this Ps. which is the record of David's repentance for his sin in the matter of Uriah, the greatest blemish on his character, 1 K. 15: 5. Those whose consciences charge them with any gross sin should, with a believing regard to the Mediator, again and again pray over this Ps.; nay, though we have not been guilty of any enormous crime, yet, in singing it, and praying over it, we may very sensibly apply it to all ourselves, which if we do with suitable affections, we shall through Christ, find mercy to pardon, and grace for seasonable help.

V. 1—6. The sin David laments, was adultery, a sin not to be spoken of, or thought of, without detestation. It is recorded for warning to all, that he who thinks he stands may take heed lest he fall. The repentance David here expresses, he was brought to by the ministry of Nathan, after he had continued above nine months (for aught that appears) without any particular expressions of remorse or sorrow for it. God may suffer his people to fall into sin, and to lie a great while in it, yet He will, by some means or other, recover them to repentance, bring them to Himself, and to their right mind, again. Herein, generally, He uses the ministry of the Word, which yet He is not tied to. But those that have been overtaken in any fault, ought to reckon a faithful reproof the greatest kindness, and a wise reprover their best friend. Let the righteous smite me, and it shall be excellent oil. Whither should backsliding children return, but to the Lord their God, from whom they have backslidden, and who alone can heal their backslidings? David drew up, by divine inspiration, the workings of his heart toward God, on this occasion, into a Ps., that it might be often repeated, and long after reviewed; and this he committed to the chief musician, to be sung in the public service of the church. 1. As a profession of his own repentance, which he would have to be generally noticed, his sin having been notorious: those that truly repent will not be ashamed to own their repentance. 2 As a pattern to others, both to bring them to repentance by his example, and to instruct them, in their repentance, what to do, and what to say. Being converted himself, he thus strengthens his brethren, Luke 22: 32. and, for this cause, he obtained mercy, 1 Tim. 1: 10. In these words, we have,

I. David's humble petition, v. 1, 2. which is much the same with that of the penitent publican in the parable; God be merciful to me a sinner! Luke 18: 13. David was, on many accounts, a man of great merit; had not only done much, but suffered much, in the cause of God; yet, when convinced of sin, he does not offer to balance his evil deeds with his good deeds, nor can he think his services will atone for his offences; but he flies to God's infinite mercy, and depends on that only for pardon and peace. He owns himself obnoxious to God's justice, and therefore casts himself on his mercy; and certainly the best man is undone, if God be not merciful to him. Observe,

1. His plea: 'For thy mercy's sake.' 'I have nothing to plead with Thee, but the freeness and fulness of thy mercy. There is in Thee not only loving-kindness, and tender mercies, but a free abundance of it, a multitude of tender mercies ready to flow forth for the forgiveness of many sin-

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 16—23. If ignorant formalists, though not grossly immoral or profane, are under a dangerous delusion, what will be the doom of those, who understand, profess, and preach the truths of God; while yet they hate instruction, and despise [half or all] his commandments? Yet how many such professors and teachers of Christianity disgrace the present age! And how strangely are they connived at, and enabled to keep up their confidence, as if the Judge of the world were altogether such a one as themselves! Indeed their present impunity emboldens them to expect, that they shall always escape. But the Judge will come, and will strip off their masks, and reprove, convict, and condemn them. Let us then judge ourselves, and beware of hypocrisy: let ministers see to it, that they preach first to themselves, and love and practise their own instructions: let every one inquire, whether he be indeed 'allowed of God to be put in trust with the Gospel;' or whether he run without being sent. God now warns, that He may not punish: let us then thankfully embrace his Gospel, and praise Him for his mercy; and, endeavoring to glorify Him in word and deed, wait for his complete and eternal salvation.

Verses 22, 23.

Ordereth his conversation. (23) M. 'disposeth his way.' In modern phrase, 'who aims to obey God's physical, organic, intellectual and moral laws;' guided by faith in his revealed will, he has temporal and eternal salvation.. Comp. John 7:17. ED.—The last clause may be understood, as prospective of their promised Savior. (7—15. 24:3—6.)—According to the concluding words of these vs. no man 'ordereth his conversation,' or conduct, 'aright,' who trusts in his own works, and does not seek 'the salvation of God;' none seeks that salvation properly, who is not conscientious in his whole conduct; and none, who unites the two, fails of salvation.—The Latin version of [Trem.] is very striking: 'Qui componit viam, faciam ut is fruatur salute Dei:' 'Him, who disposes,' or regulates, 'his conduct, I will cause to enjoy the salvation of God.' The preventing grace of God leads a man, like Cornelius, to regulate his conduct piously and uprightly, and to wait for God's salvation in this way; and the promise ensures to such a person the enjoyment of that salvation. (Acts 10:1—8, 34, 35.)—What a noble view does this Ps. give of God and of Revelation! God stands forth as the Parent, the Lord, and the Judge of all, and the Savior of all who trust in Him; exercising a universal providence, soliciting us to make Him our Refuge, to worship and serve Him, promising us his reward and favor.—And in the O. T. itself, which enjoins so many ceremonies, how little intrinsic value is there ascribed to them, compared with spiritual worship, and ordering the conversation aright! SCOTT.

NOTES.

Ps. LI. Title. (Notes, 2 Sam. 11: 12:1—12.) When Nathan had delivered his message, we may suppose David retired to his chamber full of confusion, remorse, and anguish; and there poured forth his soul before God in unreserved confessions and fervent prayers. And considering his rank, age, and circumstances, it might have been thought expedient for him to be satisfied with these secret acts of contrition and devotion, and with 'bringing forth fruits meet for repentance:' especially as God had already remitted the sentence of temporal death, to which the law condemned him. (2 Sam. 12:13.) But he viewed

I. David's penitential confessions, v. 3—5. 1. He was very free to own his guilt before God; I acknowledge my transgressions; he had formerly, as the only way of easing his conscience, 32: 4, 5. but he would again. Nathan said, Thou art the man; I am, says David; I have sinned. 2. He had such a deep sense of it, that he was continually thinking of it, with sorrow and shame. His contrition was not a slight, sudden passion, but an abiding grief; 'My sin is ever before me, is ever against me;' (so some;) 'I see it before me as an enemy, accusing and threatening me.' David was, on all occasions, put in mind of his sin, and was willing to be so, for his further abasement. Note, The acts of repentance, even for the same sin, must be often repeated. It is good for us to have our sins ever before us, that thereby we may be kept humble, may be armed against temptation, quickened to duty, and made patient under the cross.

(1.) He confesses his actual transgressions, v. 4. Against Thee, Thee only, have I sinned. The best men, if they sin, should give the best example of repentance. [1.] His confession is particular; 'I have done this evil, this I am now reproved for, this my own conscience now upbraids me with.' Note, It is good to be particular in the confession of sin, that we may be the more express in praying for pardon, and so may have the more comfort in it. We ought to reflect on the particular deeds of our sins of infirmity, and the particular circumstances of our gross sins. [2.] He aggravates the sin he confesses; Against Thee, and in thy sight. Hence our Savior seems to borrow the confession He puts into the mouth of the returning prodigal; I have sinned against heaven, and before Thee, Luke 15: 18. It was committed against God. From this topic Joseph fetched the great argument against sin, Gen. 39: 9. and David here the great aggravation of it; Against Thee only. Some make this to bespeak the prerogative of his crown, that, as a king, he was not accountable to any but God; but it is more agreeable to his present temper, to suppose it bespeaks the deep contrition of his soul for his sin, and that it was upon right grounds. He here sinned against Bathsheba and Uriah; against his own soul and body, and family; against his kingdom, and against the church of God; and all this helped to humble him;

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 1—4. If the most eminent believer ceases to watch and pray, nay, becomes more remiss and formal, than he once was; Satan may at length obtain such advantages against him, that for the time he shall seem perfectly fascinated and stupified: but the Lord will at length, by sharp rebukes, or most painful corrections, bring him to himself; and the depth of his humiliation will be proportioned to the heinousness of his sins. But the hypocrite is durably callous; and his religious profession and opinions are perversely employed, in excusing his crimes, and buoying up his presumptuous confidence.—Our sins are the more aggravated, when committed against knowledge, mercies, and vows; when they do violence to the new nature, and the strivings of the Holy Spirit; and when they are inconsistent with our character and profession, and tend to dishonor the Gospel, and mislead our brethren.—The real penitent will be deeply humbled and afflicted; but he will not sink into despair.—While sinners conceal or palliate their sins, they are out of the way of mercy: but when they humbly and ingenuously plead guilty, and unreservedly confess their crimes; they may even plead that confession, as a reason why they should be spared: for this yields the point in contest; namely, that the Lord might justly punish, and that salvation must be all of grace.—When a load of guilt oppresses a man of a tender conscience; the recollection of his sins and their aggravations, follows him every where: so that 'his sin is ever before him:' but slight convictions, where the heart is not broken, are soon shaken off; and the wound is skinned over, but not healed. —The true penitent considers every sin as rebellion against the authority and infinite Majesty of heaven. Even if he has been preserved from those crimes which evidently injure society, he reflects with shame on the enmity and ingratitude of his heart against God; he takes the part of God against himself, and pleads guilty to the most humiliating charge in his Word, as true in his own case: while those, who excuse themselves, commonly venture to arraign and censure the decisions and proceedings of the Almighty. the subject in another light, when brought to reflect seriously on his conduct, and its probable consequences. The honor of God and of true religion was deeply concerned, and with it the best interests of very great multitudes: nor did there appear any other way, in which the bad effects of his crimes could be so thoroughly prevented, as by his publicly taking the deepest shame to himself, for having acted directly contrary to that holy religion he professed. He therefore seems to have resolved without delay, whatever might be the consequences to himself and his reputation, to publish to his family, his subjects, the world, even all future generations, the judgment he now entertained of his late behavior, and the way in which he sought forgiveness and salvation. Nothing, all circumstances considered, can be conceived more humiliating than such a measure; nothing could more decidedly show how much he preferred the honor of God to his own credit; in short, nothing could more decidedly manifest the depth of genuine repentance. (1 Sam. 15:30,31.) SCOTT. The title of this Ps. from a supposed want of correspondence with vs. 4,18,19. Horsley, Dr. Kennicott, Mudge, Dr. A. Clarke, Paulus, and De Wette, suspect to be mispiaced; and they refer the Ps. to the time of the captivity. Most commentators, however, agree with Henry and Scott, that it was from the pen of David, and on occasion as the title purports. Morison well observes, that 'it seems a very hasty criticism to conclude that the 4th verse is unsuitable to the circumstances of David, when he had so mournfully departed from God; and might be supposed to be so absorbed in the sense of the dishonor he had done to God and his cause, as almost to lose sight of every other consideration.' And as to any difficulty arising from the phraseology of v. 18. 'it must vanish,' he says, 'on the slightest reflection; as it contains a simple prayer, on the part of David, that God would perfect the walls and buildings of the sacred city, and especially that He would cause his temple to be reared and established within its hallowed enclosures, notwithstanding the deep stain which he had brought on every thing holy by his grievous transgressions.' Morison rejoices that the 'enlightened Dathe' and the 'judicious Ainsworth' are on the side of the commonly received opinion of this Ps. and he thinks 'any one who will read the 11th and 12th chs. of 2 Sam., and compare them with the melting acknowledgments which run through the whole of this Ps. will no longer be able to doubt that the history and the confessions refer to the same general facts in the life of David.'—Rosenm. agrees with the commonly received opinion. Verses 1, 2.

He does not once mention his former services in the cause of religion; or palliate his conduct, by the peculiar temptations of his high rank, and the customs of princes; or plead that he was inadvertently betrayed into it, and led on by imperceptible degrees, step by step: (1 Sam. 15:15,24,25. Prov. 28:13. Luke 15:17—19.) but, as a vile and miserable sinner, with many repetitions and an accumulation of words, energetically expressing his inmost thoughts and feelings, he dwells on the only cheering thought his case allowed of; and entreats, that God would, 'to the praise of the glory of his grace,' forgive his sins, as a debt which when remitted is blotted out. The language shows that the Psalmist fervently prayed to be cleansed from the pollution, as well as the guilt of his sins; that he was aware no outward forms or endeavors of his own could effect this cleansing; and that he sought this blessing through the redemption and grace of the promised Savior. (M. R.) SCOTT.

(Notes 32:1—5.) While David endeavored to cover his sins, to conceal or excuse them, he could not, sincerely and heartily, seek forgiveness from God, as an act of unmerited mercy and grace, and even contrary to his deservings. And this seems to have been his state of mind before Nathan came to him: but now 'being come to himself,' he is deeply conscious of his most heinous guilt; and confesses it openly and ingenuously, with all its aggravations. Thus he 'submits to the righteousness of God,' owns that he deserves to perish, and is prepared, if spared, to ascribe the whole honor of salvation to the rich mercy and grace of God alone. but none of these were sinned against so as God was; therefore on this he lays the most sorrowful accent; Against Thee only have I sinned. This should greatly humble us for all our sins, that they have been committed under the eye of God, which argues either a disbelief of his omniscience, or a contempt of his justice. [3.] He justifies and honors God in the sentence passed on him, that the sword shall never depart from his house, 2 Sam. 12: 10, 11. thus Eli acquiesced in the like threatenings, 1 Sam. 3: 18. It is the Lord; and Hezekiah, 2 K. 20: 19. Good is the word of the Lord, which thou hast spoken. David published his confession of sin, that, when hereafter he should come into trouble, none might say, God had done him any wrong; thus will all true penitents justify God by condemning themselves.

(2.) He confesses his original corruption, v. 5. not in excuse, for that plea is false; with due care and watchfulness, and improvement of the grace of God, he might have helped it; so a true penitent never offers it. David elsewhere speaks of the admirable structure of his body, 139: 14, 15. yet here says it was shapen in iniquity, sin was twisted in with it; not as it came out of God's hands, but as it comes through our parents' loins. He elsewhere speaks of the piety of his mother, and pleads his relation to her, 116: 16.—86: 16. yet he here says she conceived him in sin; for though, by grace, a child of God, she was, by nature, a daughter of Eve, and not excepted from the common character. Note, It is to be sadly lamented by every one of us, that we brought into the world with us a corrupt nature, wretchedly degenerated from its primitive purity and rectitude; we have, from our birth, the snares of sin in our bodies, the seeds of sin in our souls, and a stain of sin on both. This is what we call original sin, because it is as ancient as our original, and because it is the original of all our actual transgressions. This is that foolishness which is bound in the heart of a child, the proneness to evil, and backwardness to good, which is the burden of the regenerate, and the ruin of the unregenerate; it is a bent to backslide from God.

III. David's acknowledgment of the grace of God, v. 6. both his good-will towards us, Thou desirest truth in the inward parts, and his good work in us, 'In the hidden part thou hast made,' or shalt make, 'me to know wisdom.' Note, Truth and wisdom will go very far toward making a man a good man. A clear head and a sound heart, prudence and sincerity, bespeak the man of God perfect. What God requires of us, He himself works in us, and He works it in the regular way, enlightening the mind, and so gaining the will. But how does this come in here? 1. God is hereby justified and cleared; 'Lord, Thou wast not the Author of my sin; I clear Thee.' 2. The sin is hereby aggravated; 'Lord, thou desirest truth; but where was it when I dissembled with Uriah? Thou hast made me to know wisdom; but I have not lived up to what I have known.' 3. He is hereby encouraged, in his repentance, to hope God would graciously accept him; for, (1.) God had made him sincere in his resolutions never to return to folly again; Thou desirest truth in the inward part; this is what God has an eye to, in a returning sinner, that in his spirit there be no guile, 32 : 2. David was conscious of the uprightness of his heart toward God, in his repentance, therefore doubted not but God would accept him. (2.) He hoped God would enable him to make good his resolutions, that, in the hidden part, in the new man, which is called the hidden man of the heart, (1 Pet. 3:4.) He would make him to know wisdom, so as to discern and avoid the designs of the tempter, another time. Some read it as a prayer; 'make me to know wisdom.' Where there is truth, God will give wisdom; those that sincerely endeavor to do their duty, shall be taught their duty.

V. 7—13. See here,

I. What David prays for;

1. That God would cleanse him from his sins, and the defilement he had contracted by them, v. 7. The expression here alludes to a ceremonial distinction, that of cleansing the leper, or those that were unclean by the touch of a body, by sprinkling water, or blood, or both, on them, with a bunch of hyssop, by which they were, at length, discharged from the restraints they were laid under by their pollution. But it is founded on Gos-that is my offence.' Bp. Hall.—Even before the law was given, God himself stated that the grand malignity of murder consisted in its being an assault on man, whom He created in his own image. (Gen. 9: 5,6.)—Crimes in civil society, which are injurious to individuals, are yet punished as violations of the laws of the land; thus high treason is the chief crime in every land. David indeed was not accountable for his conduct to any human tribunal: he had carefully concealed his transgressions from man; but he was sensible the Lord had witnessed the whole, and would bring it to light. He therefore found himself constrained to plead guilty, to the most humiliating charges of guilt and depravity, brought against mankind in general, which were contained in the Word of God; for he was convinced that his base conduct, after all his peculiar advantages and zealous profession of religion, would abundantly justify those declarations of the entire wickedness of the human heart; and fully confute the blasphemous censures, which ungodly men ventured to pass on the government of God, and on his denunciations and judgments, as if unjust and severe. Thus, in every sense, the case of David, when well understood, is suited to justify God in all his declarations, and to vindicate his whole government from every aspersion. (Gen. 6:5. 8:20—22. Job 15:14—16. Rom. 3:3,4.) Scott. Against thee, &c.] 'Street, who thinks the corresponding history, 2 Sam. 12:12. For thou didst it secretly, explains the phrase, reads: "Privately against thee have I sinned." The sense, therefore,' he observes, 'of "thee only," in this place, must be, that the crime was known, in the first instance, only to God.' Morison.—That thou mightest, &c.] 'The particle, that, is not taken causally, or intentionally, as if this were David's design; but eventually, as in Ex. 11:9. Ps. 30:12. Hos. 8:4.' Poole. Boothroyd observes very justly, that 'the common version makes David sin that God might be justified.' Morison. 'Therefore thou wilt.' Bp. Horne.

Verses 5, 6.

David was the offspring of lawful and honorable marriage; (86:16. 116:16.) yet, having received from his parents Adam's fallen nature, with all its evil propensities,* he confesses he was conceived and shapen in iniquity. (M. R.)—His late dreadful fall evinced the depravity of his heart: and in these instances he had only acted according to its corrupt bias; being in himself naturally prone to rebellion against God. (M. R. p. Gen. 5:3. Job 14:1—6.25: Eph. 2:3.) This he confessed in deep humiliation; yet it by no means followed, that the Lord should relax in his requirements, because of the depraved propensities of his apostate creatures.—His perfect law requires entire truth, purity, and love in the heart and conduct; and in this alone He delights; and sincerity from the inmost soul, in repentance, faith, and renewed obedience, is requisite, even according to the Gospel. This the Psalmist had been taught, before his transgressions: 'in the hidden part the Lord had made him to know wisdom,' which was a great aggravation of his guilt, in that he sinned against knowledge, conscience, and the peculiar obligations conferred on him. If we read the clause in the future tense, as in our tr. and as it stands in the Heb. it expresses the Psalmist's hope and prayer, that the Lord would, notwithstanding his guilt and depravity, graciously, and by his effectual inward teaching, communicate to him true wisdom, and enable him to know and do what He required and delighted in. 'So far from representing this' (my innate propensity to evil) 'as an excuse for what I have done; I confess that the consideration of it ought to have made me the more watchful and diligent, to suppress those bad inclinations, which I knew to be so natural.' . . . 'I am amazed at my folly, that I should be so careless; when I was not ignorant that Thou requirest us not to entertain, with the least kindness, those first motions which we find in our thoughts and desires after any evil, but uprightly to oppose them.' Bp. Patrick. (Jam. 1:13—18.) Scott.

(5) 'This v. is, both by Jewish and Christian, by ancient and later interpreters, generally and most truly understood of original sin.' Poole.—I was shapen.] 'Though it is perfectly plain the Psalmist here speaks of that original taint and pollution of nature which belongs to all the descendants of Adam, it is not so easy to determine whether the original here rendered, I was shapen, refers to the act of begetting, or to the act of birth. I confess I lean to the idea that the former is referred to; because such a view of the passage exhibits an antithesis between the act of begetting and that of conception, demonstrating the fact that both parents are equally concerned in the transmission of moral evil to their offspring. A. Montanus reads, either formatus sum, or genitus; and Dathe adopts the latter, "I was begotten."' Morison. 'This cannot be understood of any personal iniquity of his immediate parents, since it respects his wonderful formation in the womb, and is the amazing work of God Himself, so much admired by the Psalmist, Ps. 139:13—16. and cannot design any sinfulness then infused into him by his Maker, seeing God cannot be the author of sin; but of original sin and corruption derived to him by natural generation; and the sense is, that, as soon as ever the mass of human nature was shaped and quickened, or as soon as soul and body were united together, sin was in him, and he was in sin, or became a sinful creature.' Dr. Gill.—'Notwithstanding all that Grotius and others have said to the contrary, I believe David to speak here of what is commonly called original sin; the propensity to evil which every man brings into the world with him, and which is the fruitful source whence all transgression proceeds.' Dr. A. Clarke. The language of David will be plain to such as believe, that, in the human nature, 'mental manifestation depends on physical organization;' and that man has physically, and of course mentally, degenerated; the original degeneracy commencing when Adam sinned: others prefer a mystical sense. Ed.

Verse 7. Hyssop.] 'Derived from the Heb. esob, marjoram, origanum creticum. Rauwolf found this on this Mt. of Olives, and between Ramah and Joppa.' Rosenm.

* Rather, propensities which, in legitimate exercise, are good, as God pronounced all his works to be; but abused, i.e. unrestrained, or in action unallowed by the higher nature, are bad. That, in all Adam's race, as a race, the lower propensities have come to be the ruling ones, will not be denied. Ed.

pel-grace; Purge me with hyssop, with the blood of Christ applied to my soul by a lively faith, as water of purification was sprinkled with a bunch of hyssop. It is the blood of Christ, which is therefore called the blood of sprinkling, Heb. 12: 24. And if this blood of Christ, which cleanses from all sin, cleanse us from our sin, then we shall be clean indeed, Heb. 10: 2. If washed in this fountain opened, we shall be whiter than snow; not only acquitted, but accepted; so those are, that are justified, Is. 1: 18.

2. He prays that, his sins being pardoned, he might have the comfort of that pardon. He asks not to be comforted, till first he is cleansed. (1.) The pain of a heart truly broken for sin, may well be compared to that of a broken bone; and it is the same Spirit who, as a Spirit of bondage, smites and wounds, and, as a Spirit of adoption, heals and binds up. (2.) The comfort and joy that arise from a sealed pardon to a penitent sinner, are as refreshing as perfect ease from the most exquisite pain. (3.) It is God's work, not only to speak this joy and gladness, but to make us hear it, and take the comfort of it.

3. He prays for a complete and effectual pardon. This is what he is most earnest for, as the foundation of his comfort, v. 9. Isa. 45: 22.

4. He prays for sanctifying grace; this every true penitent is as earnest for, as for pardon and peace, v. 10. He does not pray, 'Lord, preserve me my reputation,' as Saul, I have sinned, yet honor me before this people. No, his great concern is, to get his corrupt nature changed: the sin he had been guilty of, was, (1.) An evidence of its impurity, therefore he prays, Create in me a clean heart, O God. He now saw, more than ever, what an unclean heart he had, and sadly laments it, but sees it is not in his own power to amend it, and therefore begs of God, (whose prerogative it is to create,) that He would create in him a clean heart. He only that made the heart, can new make it; and to his power nothing is impossible. He created the world by the word of his power, as the God of nature, and it is by the word of his power, as the God of grace, that we are clean, John 15: 3. that we are sanctified, John 17: 17. (2.) It was the cause of its disorder, and undid much of the good work that had been wrought in him; therefore he prays, 'Lord, renew a right spirit within me; repair the decays of spiritual strength, which this sin has been the cause of, and set me to rights again.' Renew a constant spirit within me; so some. He had, in this matter, discovered much inconstancy and inconsistency with himself, therefore he prays, 'Lord, fix me for the time to come, that I may never in like manner depart from Thee.'

5. He prays for the continuance of God's goodwill toward him, and the progress of his good work in him, v. 11. (1.) That he might never be shut out from God's favor and protection; but wherever he went, have the divine presence with him, be under the guidance of his wisdom, and in the custody of his power, and not be forbidden communion with God. He does not deprecate the temporal judgments God by Nathan had threatened to bring on him; 'God's will be done;' but, 'Lord, rebuke me not in thy wrath. If the sword come into my house never to depart from it, yet let me have access to Thee in my distresses, and all shall be well.' (2.) That he might never be deprived of God's grace; Take not thy Holy Spirit from me. He knew he had grieved the Spirit, and provoked Him to withdraw; and that God might justly have said his Spirit should no more strive with him, or work upon him, Gen. 6: 3. This he dreads, more than any thing; we are undone, if God take his Holy Spirit from us. Saul was a sad instance of this. David knew it, and therefore begs thus earnestly, 'Take not thy Holy Spirit from me,' see 2 Sam. 7: 15.

6. He prays for the restoration of divine comforts, and the perpetual communications of divine grace, v. 12. He finds two ill effects of his sin; (1.) It had made him sad, therefore he prays, Restore unto me the joy of thy salvation. By wilful sin, our evidences cannot but be clouded, and our hopes shaken; but when we truly repent, we may pray and hope that God will restore. They that sow in penitential tears, shall reap in the joys of God's salvation, when the times of refreshing shall come. (2.) It had made him weak, therefore he prays, 'Uphold me with thy free Spirit; I am ready to fall, either into sin or into despair; Lord, sustain me; my own spirit is not sufficient, if I be left to myself, I shall certainly sink; therefore uphold me with thy Spirit. Thy Spirit is a free spirit, working freely, and makes those free, whom He works upon, for where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty.' He was conscious of having acted, in the matter of Uriah, very disingenuously, and unlike a prince; his be-

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 5—13. When the heart is deeply humbled, the penitent is led to trace back the streams of actual sin to the fountain of original depravity; he compares the [propensions] of his heart, as well as his outward conduct, with the holy law and glorious perfections of God; and, perceiving the contrariety, 'abhors himself, and repents in dust and ashes,' feels his need of pardon and of holiness; longs for peace of conscience and purity of heart: and his experience of his own utter inability to obtain them for himself, puts vigor into his prayers to the Lord, to purge him by the blood and Spirit of Christ; and, pardoning all his sins, 'to create in him a clean heart, and renew a right spirit within him,' by his own almighty power; that for the future he may hate and flee from all sin.—Nothing so animates the soul to teach the ways of God to sinners, and to seek for their conversion, as a deep experience of the bitterness of sin, and of the consolations of the pardoning and saving love of God, and the freedom and pleasantness of his service; they therefore always form the most zealous preachers to others, who have themselves been most deeply humbled; and those are most earnest for the salvation of their fellow-sinners, who most value and rejoice in the salvation of God themselves. SCOTT.

Verse 10.

The production of a holy disposition in a sinner's heart,—the forming him to a spiritual judgment and taste, a submissive will, a pure imagination, and well regulated affections,—is a 'new creation:' even as if Satan, by almighty power, should again be made a holy angel. This state of the understanding and heart is 'a right spirit,' it is reasonable and excellent, such as all intelligent beings should possess, and it is absolutely necessary to true liberty and felicity. Man originally possessed it; but it was lost by the fall: and where it is again produced, it is the 'renewal of a right spirit.' This is begun in regeneration, carried on by progressive sanctification, and completed in glory. When the sinner is deeply convinced that such a change is necessary, and he unable to work it in himself; and when he reads the promises of God to this purpose, (Ez. 11:17—20. 18:30—32. 36:25—27.) he asks it from God: and every discovery of remaining sinfulness leads the believer to renew this supplication; and thus the change is gradually effected till it be finally completed.—The margin, however, renders it, 'Renew a constant, (Heb. stablished) spirit within me.' Holy angels are established in a right spirit; and so are 'the spirits of just men made perfect.' Even on earth, real Christians have, in a measure, this constant, established spirit: but hypocrites are unstable. David had experienced the inconstancy of his heart; and was sensible, that even if pardoned and restored, he should, in case he were left to himself, be again drawn aside; and he prayed earnestly for that constancy, which might enable him 'with purpose of heart to cleave unto the Lord.' (12,13. Num. 14:24. Josh. 14:6—15. Acts 11:23,24. 1 Cor. 15:55—58. Jam. 1:5—8.) SCOTT.

Verse 11.

Eternal banishment from the gracious presence of God, under his wrath and curse, constitutes a principal part of the misery of hell: (Matt. 25:41—46.) and something like this misery may be felt on earth, even by the believer, when, excluded from comfortable communion with God, he finds his heart oppressed with the sense or dread of deserved wrath. This heaviest of all afflictions David deprecated.—The Spirit of the Lord departed from Saul, when he was rejected from being king, and an evil spirit from God troubled him: (1 Sam. 16:14.) and David feared the same sentence for his more atrocious crimes, as in some respects they certainly were. All his sufficiency, as the prophet of God, as his anointed king, and as the Psalmist of Israel, was derived from the Holy Spirit: and all his comfort and usefulness must terminate, if the Holy Spirit should be finally taken from him. It is indeed maintained, and, as it appears to me, on scriptural ground, that the spirit of life and sanctification is never finally taken from believers: but, even in this case, their comforts may expire in despondings, their credit in disgrace, and all their gifts and usefulness may wither, and be lost to the end of life; and they cannot, in such circumstances, distinguish themselves from hypocrites. SCOTT.

Verses 12, 13.

'The joy of God's salvation,' arises from a persuasion and perception of the mercy and grace of God, according to his promises; of the nature and glory of his salvation, as revealed in the Scriptures; of its suitableness to the sinner's wants, its freeness, and sufficiency; from a prevailing confidence of an interest in this mercy; and from communion with God, and the exercise of faith, hope, admiring, adoring, grateful love, and all other holy affections, as springing from the Spirit of sanctification. The raptures and ecstasies peculiar to the prophets were of a very different nature, and arose from the sublime discoveries made to them in dreams or visions, and they did not always imply holiness of heart: whereas 'the joy of salvation' is the common privilege of the regenerate, according to the degree of their faith and grace; and it belongs to no one else. (M. R. k.) The Holy Spirit may be called free, because He is freely bestowed on sinners, through the gracious Savior: but this epithet seems rather to mean, that the sanctifying Spirit sets the soul at liberty from sin and Satan, produces a had offended, much less speak to Him; his heart condemned him, therefore he had little confidence toward God: it cast a damp particularly on his praises; therefore he prays, 'Lord, open my lips, put my heart in tune for praise again:' when our lips are opened, what should we speak but the praises of God, as Zacharias did? Luke 1:64.

II. David offers the sacrifice of a penitent, contrite heart, which he knew God would be pleased with.

1. He knew well the sacrificing of beasts was, in itself, of no account with God, v. 16. Here see how glad David would have been to give thousands of rams, to make atonement for sin. Those that are thoroughly convinced of their misery and danger, by reason of sin, would spare no cost to obtain the remission of it, Mic. 6:6, 7. But see how little God valued this! As trials of obedience, and types of Christ, He did indeed require sacrifices to be offered; but He had no delight in them for any intrinsic value they had; Sacrifice and offering Thou wouldest not. As they cannot make satisfaction for sin, so God cannot take any satisfaction in them, any otherwise than as the offering of them is expressive of love and duty to Him.

2. He knew also how acceptable true repentance is to God, v. 17. See here, (1.) What the good work is, that is wrought in every true penitent; a broken spirit, a broken and a contrite heart; a work wrought on the heart; that is what God looks at, and requires, in all religious exercises, particularly repentance. It is a sharp work wrought there, no less than the breaking of the heart; not in despair, but in a necessary humiliation, and sorrow for sin: it is a heart breaking with itself, and breaking from its sin; pliable to the Word of God, and patient under the rod of God; subdued and brought into obedience; a heart that is tender, like Josiah's, and trembles at God's Word. Oh that there were such a heart in us! (2.) How graciously God is pleased to accept of this; it is the sacrifices of God; not one, but many; it is instead of all burnt-offering and sacrifice. The breaking of Christ's body for sin, is the only sacrifice of atonement, for no sacrifice but that could take away sin; but the breaking of our hearts for sin, is a sacrifice of acknowledgment, a sacrifice of God, for to Him it is offered up; He requires

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

V. 14—19. When the heart is humbled, and the conscience tender, renewed recollection of heinous transgressions again and again discourages the soul: but this excites more fervent prayers; and when mercy is bestowed by 'the God of salvation,' such penitents will most abound in thankful praises. Yet conscious guilt stops the mouth, and the humbled sinner is afraid or ashamed to speak of his God, as in times past, until the impediment be removed by some tokens of pardoning love, and the comforts of the Holy Spirit. Such a one would do any thing, or part with any thing, to obtain pardon and peace: (Mic. 6:6—8.) but human inventions are worthless; and even divine ordinances are no more than means of communicating the blessings, procured by the sacrifice of Christ; and which can be received only by a broken and contrite heart, with which God is well pleased.—No personal fears or troubles of conscience can render the soul of a true Christian forgetful of the interests of the church, or indifferent about them: the humble believer and faithful minister often fear, lest their own misconduct should blight their endeavors for doing good: and, whatever they may suffer, or whatever may become of them, they still desire and pray, that true religion may prevail, and that spiritual sacrifices may abound through Jesus Christ, to the praise and glory of God.—O Lord, give us true repentance, for thy mercies' sake; help us to offer the sacrifice of a contrite spirit; preserve us from hypocrisy and blood-guiltiness, especially that of occasioning the ruin of immortal souls by our example or neglect; and enable us, through the merits and mediation of thy Son Jesus Christ, to walk with increasing watchfulness, and to pray more fervently for our fellow-Christians and fellow-sinners.

Verse 14.

David yet engaged to be open in vindicating the justice of God, even if connected with his own deep disgrace.—Some expositors indeed explain the words to mean, that he would celebrate that righteousness, by which sinners who believe are accounted righteous before God, or the faithfulness of God to his promises: but the former meaning appears to me more satisfactory. ID.

Verse 16.

Murder and adultery were by the law punishable by death; therefore no sacrifices were appointed to be offered by those who were guilty of them. ID.

Verse 17.

The legal sacrifices were continued above 1000 years after this time, as types of the Redeemer's atoning sacrifice. Indeed a broken heart can do nothing towards meriting forgiveness. But a humble spirit, broken off from all self-dependence and the love of sin, and crushed down into deep self-abasement and abhorrence, is a spiritual sacrifice pleasing and honorable to God: for he, who is enabled to present this oblation, unreservedly submits to the justice of God; casts himself, without plea or excuse, on his free mercy; thankfully accepts of his salvation; and will walk according to it, in all humble obedience, and patient submission to the will of God. This broken and contrite spirit man despises, as mean and contemptible; and the possessor is apt to deem it unmeet to be presented to his offended Sovereign: but God will never despise nor reject such an unequivocal effect of his own renewing grace. SCOTT.

Verses 18, 19.

David feared lest his guilt should render him as an Achan in the congregation of Israel: (Notes, and *P. O. The Lord delighted not in burnt-offerings, for their own sake; yet as they were sacramental prefigurations of the Messiah's atonement; acts of worship, and means of

PSALM LII.

David contrasts the deceit and malice of Doeg, with the goodness of God, 1—4. He predicts Doeg's ruin, and the joy of the righteous, 5—7. He professes confidence in God, and a full persuasion that he shall praise Him for ever, 8, 9.

it, He prepares it, He provides this lamb for a burnt-offering, and will accept of it. The sacrifice was offered on the altar that sanctified the gift; so the broken heart is acceptable to God only through Jesus Christ; there is no true repentance without faith in Him; and this is the sacrifice He will not despise. More is implied than is expressed; the great God overlooks heaven and earth, to look with favor on a broken and contrite heart, Isa. 66: 1, 2. 57: 15.

III. David intercedes for Zion, and Jerusalem, with an eye to God's honor. See his concern,

1. For the church of God, v. 18. Zion, here, is all the particular worshippers in Zion, all that love and fear God. Those that have been in spiritual troubles themselves, know how to pity and pray for those that are in the like; or, Zion is here put for the public interests of Israel. David was sensible how he had wronged Judah and Jerusalem by his sin; how it had weakened the hands, and saddened the hearts, of good people, and opened the mouths of their adversaries: he was likewise afraid lest, being a public person, his sin should bring judgments on the city and kingdom; therefore he prays to God to secure and advance those public interests which he had damaged and endangered. Note, (1.) When we have most business of our own, and of greatest importance at the throne of grace, yet then we must not forget to pray for the church of God; nay, our Master has taught us in our daily prayers to begin with that, Thy kingdom come. (2.) The consideration of the prejudice we have done the public interests by our sins, should engage us to do them all the service we can, particularly by our prayers.

2. For the honor of the churches of God, v. 19. If God would show himself reconciled to him and his people, as he had prayed, then they should go on with the public services of his house cheerfully and thankfully. The sense of God's goodness to them would enlarge their hearts in all the instances and expressions of thankfulness and obedience. They would then come to his tabernacle with burnt-offerings, with whole burnt-offerings, which were intended purely for the glory of God, and they would offer, not lambs and rams only, but bullocks, the costliest sacrifices, on his altar. And God would be pleased with them. Note, It is a great comfort to a good man, to think of the communion that is between God and his people in their public assemblies; how God is honored by their humble attendance on Him, and they are happy in his gracious acceptance of them.

Ps. LII. David, no doubt, was in very great grief, when he said to Abiathar, (1 Sam. 22: 22.) I have occasioned the death of all the persons of thy father's house, which were put to death on Doeg's malicious information: to give some vent to that grief, and to gain some relief to his mind under it, he penned this Ps. In singing it, we should conceive a detestation of the sin of lying, foresee the ruin of those that persist in it, and please ourselves with the assurance of the preservation of God's church and people, in spite of all the malicious designs of the children of Satan, that father of lies.

V. 1—5. The title is a brief account of the story to which the psalm refers. David now, at length, saw it necessary to quit the court, and shift for his own safety, for fear of Saul, who had once and again attempted to murder him. Being unprovided with arms and victuals, he, by a wile, got Ahimelech the priest to furnish him both; Doeg an Edomite happened to be there, and went and informed Saul against Ahimelech, representing him as confederate with a traitor; on which accusation, Saul grounded a very bloody warrant, to kill all the priests; and Doeg, the prosecutor, was the executioner, 1 Sam. 22: 9, &c. In these verses,

I. David argues the case fairly with this proud and mighty man, v. 1. Doeg, it is probable, was mighty in respect of bodily strength; at any rate, he was, by his office, a mighty man, for he was set over the servants of Saul, chamberlain of the household; and he boasted, not only in the power he had to do mischief, but in the mischief he did. Note, It is bad to do ill, but worse to boast of it, and glory in it, when we have done. They that glory in their sin, glory in their shame; and then it becomes yet more shameful; mighty men are often mischievous men, and boast of their heart's desire, 10: 3. It is uncertain how the following words come in; The goodness of God endures continually. Some make it the wicked man's answer to this question; as if prosperity in wickedness were an evidence that there is no harm in it. But it is rather to be taken as an argument against him, to show the sinfulness and folly of his sin. 'Thou thinkest, with the mischief which thou boastest of, to run down and ruin the people of God; but thou wilt find thyself mistaken; the goodness of God endures continually for their preservation, and then they need not fear what man can do unto them.'

II. He draws up a high charge against him in the court of heaven, as Doeg had drawn up a high charge against Ahimelech in Saul's court, v. 2—4. He accuses him of the wickedness of his tongue; of malice, falsehood, subtlety, and love to sin. His tongue did mischief; scornful, bantering words would not content him: he loved devouring words, words that would ruin the priests of the Lord whom he hated. Before he had this occasion given him to discover his malice against them, he had acted very plausibly toward them; though an Edomite, he attended the altars, brought his offerings, and paid his respects to the priests, as decently as any Israelite; it was only of constraint, he was detained before the Lord, but thus he gained an opportunity of doing them so much the greater mischief. Or, it may refer to the information he gave against Ahimelech; for the matter of fact was, in substance, true, yet it was misrepresented; therefore he might well be said to love lying, and to have a deceitful tongue. He told the truth, but not all the truth, as a witness ought to do; had he told that David made Ahimelech believe he was then going on Saul's errand, the kindness he showed would have appeared not only not traitorous, but respectful to Saul. It will not save us from the guilt of lying, to be able to say, 'There was some truth in what we said,' if we pervert it, and make it to appear otherwise than it was. The more there is of craft and contrivance in any wickedness, the more there is of the devil in it.

III. He reads his doom, and denounces the judgments of God against him for his wickedness, v. 5. Sons of perdition actively, shall be sons of perdition passively, as Judas and the man of sin: especially shall persecutors be destroyed. Good men are transplanted from the nursery to take root in the garden of the Lord, but wicked men are rooted up for ever; as fuel to the fire of divine wrath.

V. 6—9. David here triumphs,

I. In the fall of Doeg. Yet, lest this should look like personal revenge, he does not speak of it as his own act, but the language of other righteous persons, who shall reverence God's justice in it, and to whom Doeg shall appear ridiculous and worthy to be laughed at, v. 6, 7. The fall and ruin of a wealthy, mighty man, cannot but be generally noticed, and every one is apt to remark on it; now this is the remark of the righteous on Doeg's fall, that no better could come of it, since he took the wrong method of establishing himself in his wealth and power: what ruined Doeg was, He made not God his Strength, did not think the continuance of his prosperity depended on God's favor, so took no care to keep himself grace, and thus subserved the interests of true piety; and as they were accompanied by other sacrifices of righteousness, He was pleased with them. (M. R. h, i.) SCOTT.

PSALM LIII.

The general corruption of mankind; the madness of persecutors; and the terrors which seize on them, 1—5. A prayer for the salvation of Israel, 6.

To the chief Musician upon [a] Mahalath, Maschil, A Psalm of David.

THE [b] fool hath [c] said in his heart, There is no God. [d] Corrupt are they, and [e] have done abominable iniquity: [f] there is none that doeth good.

2 [g] God looked down from heaven upon the children of men, to see if there were any [h] that did understand, that did [i] seek God.

3 [k] Every one of them is gone back: they are altogether become [l] filthy: there is [m] none that doeth good, no, not one.

4 Have [n] the workers of iniquity no knowledge? who [o] eat up my people as they eat bread: they have not called upon God.

in God's love, made no conscience of [obeying his laws,] nor sought Him in the least. How wretchedly deceived! He thought his wealth would support itself; nay, thought his wickedness would help support it; he resolved to stick at nothing, to secure and advance his honor and power; he would get what he could, and keep what he had, and be the ruin of any one that stood in his way; and this, he thought, would strengthen him; they may have any thing that will make conscience of nothing, [as the courser is swiftest without the harness: and this is the secret of many people's 'greatness.'] But what comes of it?

II. In his own stability, v. 8, 9. 'This mighty man is plucked up by the roots; but I am established, planted and rooted, fixed and flourishing.' The wicked are said to flourish like a green bay-tree, 37: 35. which bears no useful fruit, though it have abundance of large leaves; but the righteous flourish like a green olive-tree, fat as well as flourishing, 92: 14. which with its fatness honors God and man, Judge. 9: 9. deriving its root and fatness from the good Olive, Rom. 11: 17. To be as green olive-trees, we must,

1. Live a life of [obedient] faith and holy confidence in God and his grace; a life of thankfulness and holy joy in God, v. 9. of expectation, and humble dependence on God. 2. There is nothing better to calm and quiet our spirits, when ruffled and disturbed, or to keep us in the way of duty, when tempted to use any indirect courses for our own relief, than to hope, and quietly wait for, the salvation of the Lord, Lam. 3: 26.

Ps. LIII. The scope of this Ps. is to convince us of our sins, and this we are with so much difficulty brought to, that there is need of line upon line. The Word, as a convincing Word, is compared to a hammer, the strokes whereof must be frequently repeated. Some little variation there is between Ps. 14. and this, but none considerable; between v. 5, 6. there, and v. 5. here; some expressions there used, are here left out, concerning the shame which the wicked put on God's people, and, instead of that, is here foretold the shame which God would put on the wicked; which alteration, with some others, David made by divine direction, when he delivered it the second time to the chief musician. In singing it, we ought to lament the wretched degeneracy of the world we live in, yet rejoice in hope of the great salvation.

V. 1—6. This Ps. was opened before, therefore we shall here only observe, in short, some things concerning sin, in order to increase our sorrow or and hatred of it.

1. The fact of sin; is that proved? Yes, God is a Witness to it, an unexceptionable witness; v. 2.

2. The fault of sin; is there any harm in it? Yes, it is iniquity, v. 1, 4. an unrighteous thing; what there is no good in, v. 1, 3. an evil thing, the worst of evils, what makes this world such an evil world as it is; it is going back from God, v. 3.

3. The fountain of sin; how comes it that men are so bad? Surely, because there is no fear of God before their eyes: they say in their hearts, 'There is no God, none to call us to an account, none we need stand in awe of.' Men's bad practices flow from their bad principles.

4. The folly of sin; atheists, whether in opinion or practice, are fools, the greatest fools in the world. They that do not seek God, do not understand; man is distinguished from brutes, not so much by the powers of reason, as by a capacity for religion. The workers of iniquity, whatever they pretend to, have no knowledge; those may truly be said to know nothing, that do not know God, v. 4.

5. The filthiness of sin; sinners are corrupt, v. 1. their nature is vitiated and spoiled, [their faculties abused,] their iniquity is abominable, odious to the holy God, and renders them so; whereas otherwise He hates nothing He has made. What decency soever proud sinners pretend to, it is certain, wickedness is the greatest defilement in the world.

6. The fruit of sin; see to what a degree of barbarity it brings men at last; as if they were not only become beasts, but beasts of prey, v. 4. And

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Many mighty men have been ambitious of being distinguished, by doing extensive mischief with valor or crafty policy. Indeed, poets, orators, and historians have generally celebrated those as heroes, whose conduct has been the reverse of the divine goodness, and the very counterpart of Satan's malice, pride, deceit, and murder; who have abused superior advantages and endowments, to devise and execute plans of more extensive devastation; or who, by slanders and treachery, excite war and bloodshed among those who were at peace.—It is wonderful, 'that any man should value himself for being able to do mischief, when God esteemeth it his glory to do good;' (Norris, in Bp. Horne;) and his goodness will increase the condemnation of all those, who are emboldened by it in committing iniquity: but it forms the security of those, who depend on it, and copy it as their example. Verse 8.

The Olive Tree is an evergreen, of which there are two kinds, the wild, and the cultivated. The latter is of a moderate height, its trunk knotty, its bark smooth and ash colored; its wood is solid and yellowish; its leaves are oblong, and almost like those of the willow. It puts forth, in June, bunches of white flowers. The fruit, which is oblong and plump, is first green, then pale, and, when quite ripe, black. The wild olive is smaller in all its parts. See Encyc. of Rel. Knowledge. 'The olive branch has ever been an emblem of peace, and the sacred writers frequently use similies taken from the olive tree;—in Jer. 11:16. the church is compared to it; see also Rom. 11:17, 24. The cherubim in the temple, as well as the doors of the oracle and the door posts of the temple, were made of the wood of this tree. 1 K. 6: In Hos. 14: it is said of Israel, "his beauty shall be as the olive tree." The Christian in a prosperous state and circumstances, fruitful in good works, is fitly compared to a beautiful olive tree, full of fatness, and bearing fair and goodly fruit. The engraving represents some of the wild olives growing in the garden of Gethsemane in 1834. This place was a favorite resort of our Savior, and is situated between the foot of the Mt. of Olives and the brook Kedron. The walls of Jerus. are very distinctly seen from it, on the extreme edge of a precipitous bank, and through the trees the bridge over the Kedron is clearly perceptible. Eight of the trees are so large, that they are said to have been in existence ever since the time of Jesus Christ. Although Titus cut down all the wood in the neighborhood of Jerus. yet it is not improbable that these trees (which are unquestionably of a very remote antiquity) may have arisen from the roots of the ancient trees, because the olive is very long lived, and possesses the peculiar property of shooting up again, however frequently it may be cut down These trees are of the species called Olea Europœa: they appear p[illegible]larded from extreme age, and their stems are very rough and knarled.' Horne. ED.

Title. It is not known, nor has it been conjectured with much probability, on what account, or for what reason, the same sentiments are [here] repeated in almost the same words, as in Ps. 14. The variations, however, are sufficient to show, that the Ps. in one place was intentionally altered from that in the other; and it is probable, that it was in consequence of some change in the Psalmist's circumstances, or some events which had occurred subsequent to its first publication. The word Mahalath seems to denote a hollow instrument of music, a flute or pipe: and Maschil, or instructing, implies the scope of it, viz. an instruction or warning against impiety towards God, and rebellion against his anointed king. 7. The fear and shame that attend sin, v. 5. the wicked flees when none pursues. See the ground of this fear; God had formerly scattered the bones of those that encamped against his people; not only broken their power, and dispersed their forces, but slain them, and reduced their bodies to dry bones, l[ike] those scattered at the grave's mouth, 161: 7. F[ear] .20: 9. This enables the virgin, the daughter o[f] Zion, to put them to shame, and expose them, because God has despised them; to laugh at them, because He that sits in heaven laughs at them.

Lastly, The faith of the saints, and their hope and power touching the cure of this great evil, v. 6. There will come a Savior, a great salvation, a salvation from sin. Oh that it might be hastened! for it will bring in glorious and joyful times. There were those in the O. T. times, that looked and hoped, that prayed and waited, for this redemption. Salvations were often wrought, and all typical of the everlasting triumphs of the glorious church. Matt. 1: 21.

Ps. LIV. The key of this Ps. hangs at the door, for the title tells us on what occasion it was penned, see 1 Sam. 23: 19. 26: 1. The Ps. is sweet; the former part of it, perhaps, was meditated when David was in his distress, and put into writing when the danger was over, with the addition of the two last vs. which speak his thankfulness for deliverance, which yet might be written in faith, even in the midst of his fright. In distress, we may comfortably sing this Ps.

V. 1—3. We may observe here,

1. The great distress David was now in, which the title gives an account of. Never let a good man expect to be safe and easy, till he comes to heaven. How treacherous, how basely officious, were these Ziphims! It is well God is faithful, for men are not to be trusted, Mic. 7: 5.

2. His prayer to God for succor and deliverance, v. 1, 2. He appeals to God, and begs He would save him from his enemies, plead his cause, and judge for him. David has no other plea to depend on than God's name, no other power to depend on than God's strength, and those he makes his refuge and confidence.

3. His plea, taken from the character of his enemies, v. 3. The worst treatment may be expected from those who, having broken through the bonds of relation and alliance, make themselves strangers. Paul's greatest perils were by his own countrymen, and by false brethren; 2 Cor. 11: 26. and so were David's. What bonds of nature, friendship, gratitude, or covenant, will hold those that have broken through the fear of God? Selah; Mark this. Let us all be sure to set God before us at all times; if not, we are in danger of becoming desperate.

V. 4—7. We have here the lively actings of David's faith in his prayer, which assured him of a comfortable issue.

1. He was sure God took his part, v. 4. he speaks it with an air of triumph and exultation, Behold, God is mine Helper. If we be for Him, He is for us; and if He be for us, we need not fear any power engaged against us. Comp 118: 7. He means, 'The Lord upholds my soul.'

2. God taking his part, he doubted not but his enemies should both flee and fall, v. 5. The enemies we forgive, if they repent not, God will judge: for this reason, we must not avenge ourselves, because God has said, Vengeance is mine. But he prays, Cut them off in thy truth. This is not a prayer of malice, but of faith, for it only desires the performance of the Word of God. There is truth in God's threatenings, as well as in his promises, and sinners that repent not will find it so to their cost.

3. He promises to thank God for all the experience he had had of his goodness, v. 6.

4. He speaks of his deliverance as a thing done, v. 7. I will praise Thy name, and say, 'He has delivered me; this shall be my song then.' What he rejoices in, is, a complete deliverance; He has delivered me from all trouble; and a deliverance to his heart's content; Mine eye has seen its desire on mine enemies; not seen them cut off and ruined, but forced to retreat; tidings being brought to Saul that the Philistines were upon him, 1 Sam. 23: 27, 28. All David desired was, to be himself safe; when he saw Saul draw off his forces, he saw his desire; He has delivered me from all trouble. With this thought David comforted himself when in distress. Or, With this he magnified his present deliverance, when the fright was over, that it was an earnest of his further deliverance. This may, perhaps, point at Christ, of whom David was a type. However, it is an encouragement to

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The folly of sinners greatly appears in their acting, as if they could escape the notice of Omniscience, prosper in defiance of Omnipotence, or be happy in rebellion against the Source of all felicity.—Those who go back from a religious profession, generally become most filthy, or most malicious persecutors, who of all sinners are most infatuated: for God 'hath despised,' and will confound and destroy them; as He has often scattered the bones of powerful armies, who have encamped against his church.—A guilty conscience and a dread of vengeance frequently fill the enemies of God with fears, where nothing formidable can be perceived; but at length their worst terrors will be awfully realized: (Prov. 10: 24.) and as the deliverance and prosperity of the church on earth will be attended with the ruin of all anti-christian opposers; so the eternal joys of the redeemed will be attended with the everlasting shame and misery of all their impenitent oppressors. Ps. LV. It is the conjecture of many expositors, that David penned this on occasion of Absalom's rebellion, and that the particular enemy he here speaks of, that dealt treacherously with him, was Ahithophel; some will therefore make David's troubles here typical of Christ's suffering, and Ahithophel's treachery a figure of Judas's, because they both hanged themselves. But there is nothing in it that is particularly applied to Christ in the N. T. David was in great distress when he penned it. In singing it, we may, if there be occasion, apply it to our own troubles; if not, we may sympathize with those to whose case it comes nearer, foreseeing that there will be, at last, indignation and wrath to the persecutors, a salvation and joy to the persecuted.

V. 1—8. In these vs. we have,

1. David praying, v. 1, 2. Prayer is a relief under every burden. If we, in our prayers, sincerely lay open ourselves, our case, our hearts, to God, we have reason to hope God will not hide Himself, his favors, his comforts, from us.

2. David weeping, (in this a type of Christ, a man of sorrows, and often in tears, v. 2.) because of the menaces, oppression and insults of Absalom's party, that swelled, and hectored, and stirred up the people to cry out against David, and shout him out of his palace and capital city, as afterwards the chief priests stirred up the mob to cry out against the Son of David, Away with Him, crucify Him. They could not justly charge him with any mal-administration, found no iniquity in him, relating to his trust as a king, yet they cast all manner of iniquity on him, and represented him to the people as a tyrant fit to be expelled. This made him mourn, and the more, because he could remember when he was the darling of the people, and answered to his name, David, a beloved one.

3. David trembling, and in great consternation: [as we may well suppose] on the breaking out of Absalom's conspiracy, and the general defection of the people, even those he had little reason to suspect.

David was a man of great boldness, and in some very eminent instances had signalized his courage; yet, when the danger was surprising and imminent, his heart [weakened by remorse] failed him. The best are not always alike strong in faith.

He was very desirous, in his fright, to retire any whither to be far enough from hearing the voice of the enemy, and seeing their oppressions, v. 6. Much as he had loved Jerusalem, now it was become a rebellious city, he longed, like the prophet, for a wilderness lodge, Jer. 9: 2. This agrees very well with his resolution on the breaking out of that plot, Arise, let us flee, and make speed to depart, 2 Sam. 15: 14.

Observe,

How he would make his escape; he was so surrounded with enemies, that he saw not how he could escape but on the wing; therefore he wishes for wings, not to fly upon the prey, but to be at rest, v. 6, 7. Note, Peace and quietness, in silence and solitude, are what the wisest and best of men have most earnestly coveted, and the more when they have been vexed and wearied with noise and clamor. Gracious souls wish to retire from hurry and bustle, that they may sweetly enjoy God and themselves; and if there be any true peace on this side heaven, it is with such, in those retirements.

V. 9—15. David here complains of his enemies, and prays against them by the spirit of prophecy. Observe here,

I. The character he gives of them. They were the worst sort, and his description agrees very well with Absalom and his accomplices.

1. He complains of the city Jerusalem, which strangely fell in with Absalom and off from David, so that he had none there he could confide in, but his own guards and servants. How is that faithful city become a harlot! David himself saw, with his own eyes, and with a sad heart, nothing but violence and strife in the city; v. 9, 10. there were no remains of honesty or love among them; wickedness, all manner of wickedness, was in the midst thereof; deceit and guile, and all manner of treacherous dealing, departed not from her streets, v. 11. It may be meant of their base and barbarous usage of David's friends, and such as they knew were firm and faithful to him; they did them all the mischief they could, by fraud or force. Let us

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Those who ought to protect us may become our oppressors; and many professors of true religion will generally behave to believers, with malignity and treachery, which even heathens would avoid and condemn. So that, looking unto David betrayed by the men of Judah, and to Jesus betrayed by his apostle, and delivered to death by the Jewish rulers and people; what can we expect from any who 'have not set God before them,' except ingratitude, treachery, malice, and cruelty?—O Lord, help us to bear our cross without repining, and at length bring us to behold, and to share thy victories and glory. V. 8. Some, as Patrick and Hamm. and Bp. Horne, agree with [illegible] after the manner, in considering Christ in his being betrayed, and Judas in betraying Him, as typically brought to view in some of the principal passages of this Ps. ED. 'It does not appear that Judas was ever remarkable for his wisdom, [as Ahithophel was,] or distinguished by his master above his other apostles, as was the case with Peter, James and John; nor did our Lord follow his betrayer with execrations, as David did Ahithophel and the other traitors, a circumstance that marks conspicuously the difference between the type and the antitype, between the Jewish and Christian dispensations.' WILLIAMS.

V. 6. 'The dove [especially the turtle-dove] is a bird of very rapid wing, [as Pliny remarks,] and some of them passing before David at the time, perhaps, suggested the idea expressed here.' Dr. A. Clarke. Roberts notes similar orientalisms. In connection with the characteristics of the dove, (comp. note 5:1.) the name by which Ps. 56 was familiarly known (note 22: title) is truly pleasing and poetical. ED.

not be surprised at the corruptions and disorders of the church on earth, but long to see the New Jerusalem, where there is no violence or strife, no mischief or guile, and into which no unclean thing shall enter, nor any thing that disquiets.

2. He complains of one of the ring-leaders of the conspiracy, that had reproached him, as if he either abused his power, or neglected the use of it,—such was Absalom's malicious suggestion; There is no man deputed of the king to hear thee; 2 Sam. 15: 3. And who was it? 'Not a sworn enemy, not Shimei, or any of the nonjurors; then I could have borne it, for I should not have expected better from them; would have stood on my guard, would have hid myself and my counsels; but it was thou, a man, mine equal,' v. 13. The Chaldee-paraphrase names Ahithophel, and nothing in that plot seems to have discouraged David so much, as to hear that he was among the conspirators with Absalom, 2 Sam. 15: 31. for he was the king's counsellor, 1 Chr. 27: 33. 'It was thou, a man, mine equal, one whom I esteemed as myself, to whom I had communicated all my secrets; my guide, with whom I advised, my counsellor of state; my intimate acquaintance and familiar friend; this is the man that now abuses me.' All this must needs be very grievous to an ingenuous mind, yet this was not all; this traitor had seemed a saint, else he had never been David's bosom friend, v. 14. 'We took counsel together, spent many an hour together, with great pleasure in religious discourse;' or, as Hammond reads it, 'We joined ourselves together to the assembly; I gave him the right-hand of fellowship in holy ordinances, and then we walked to the house of God in company, to attend the public service.' We must not wonder, if we be sadly deceived in some that have made great pretensions to those two sacred things, religion and friendship; David himself, though a very wise man, was thus imposed on, which may make similar disappointments the more tolerable.

II. His prayers against them, which we are both to stand in awe of, and to comfort ourselves in, as prophecies, but not to copy into our prayers against any particular enemies of our own. This prayer (v. 9.) was answered in the turning of Ahithophel's counsel into foolishness, by setting up the counsel of Hushai against it. God often destroys the church's enemies by dividing them; nor is there a surer way to the destruction of any people than their division. This prayer is a prophecy of the utter, the final, the everlasting ruin of all who, secretly or openly, oppose and rebel against the Messiah.

V. 16—23. In these verses, I. David perseveres in his resolution to call upon God, well assured he should not seek Him in vain, v. 16. Whosoever shall call on the name of the Lord, in a right manner, shall be saved, Rom. 10: 13. They that think three meals a day little enough for the body, ought much more to think three solemn prayers a day little enough for the soul, and to count it a pleasure, not a task. As it is fit that in the morning we should begin the day with God, and in the evening close it with Him, so it is fit that in the midst of the day we should retire awhile to converse with Him. It was Daniel's practice to pray three times a day, Dan. 6: 10. and noon was one of Peter's hours of prayer, Acts 10: 9. Let not us be weary of praying often, for God is not weary of hearing.

II. He assures himself that God would, in due time, answer his prayers.

1. He is as sure of the deliverance as if it were already wrought. If He did not deliver him in victory, yet He delivered him in peace, inward peace; those are safe and easy whose hearts and minds are kept by that peace of God which passes all understanding, Phil. 4: 7. David, in his alarm, thought all against him; but now he sees many with him, more than he imagined, and of this he gives the glory to God; for it is He that raises us up friends when we need them, and makes them faithful. Though his subjects deserted him, yet God was with him, and the good angels With an eye of faith he now sees himself surrounded, as Elisha, 2 K. 6: 16, 17.

2. His enemies should be reckoned with, and brought down. He here gives their character, as the reason why he expected God would bring them down. Because they have no changes, no afflictions, no crosses, therefore they fear not God, but live in constant neglect and contempt of God and religion, which is the cause of all their other wickedness, and certainly marks them for destruction. They are treacherous and false, and will not be held by the most sacred and solemn engagements, v. 20. than which nothing makes men riper for ruin. They are base and hypocritical, pretending friendship while they design mischief, v. 21. Probably he means Ahithophel particularly. They smile in a man's face, and cut his throat at the same time, as Joab. that kissed and killed. Satan is such an enemy; he flatters men into their ruin; when he speaks fair, believe him not.

3. Their ruin. God shall hear and afflict them, even He that abides of old, who is God from everlasting, and world without end, and has always presided in the affairs of men, Hab. 1: 12. God shall bring them down, not only to the dust, but to the pit of destruction, v. 23. to the bottomless pit, called destruction, Job 26: 6. Those that are not reclaimed by the rod, will certainly be brought down; bloody and deceitful men shall not live out half their days, not half so long as men ordinarily live, as they might have lived, and expected to live. They shall live as long as the Lord of life, the righteous Judge has appointed; but He has determined to cut them off, by an untimely death: they were deceitful, and defrauded others; therefore God will cut them short, though not of what was their due, yet of what they counted upon.

Ps. LVI. It seems by this, and many other psalms, that, when in the greatest trouble and distress, David never hung his harp on the willow, but even then was still in tune for singing God's praises. He was in imminent peril when he penned this psalm, at least when he meditated it; yet even then his meditation of God was sweet. How pleasantly may a good Christian, in singing this Ps. rejoice in God, and praise Him for what He will do, as well as for what He has done.

V. 1—7. David, by his faith, throws himself into the hands of God, then when he had by his fear and folly thrown himself into the hands of the Philistines, in Gath, whither he fled for fear of Saul, forgetting the quarrel they had with him for killing Goliath; but they soon put him in mind of it, 1 Sam. 21: 10, 11. On that occasion he changed his behavior, but with so little ruffle to his temper, that then he penned both this psalm and the 34th. This is called Michtam—A golden psalm. So some others, but this has something peculiar in the title; it is upon Jonath-elem-rechokim, which signifies, The silent dove afar off. [Note, Ps. 22. title.] Some apply that to David himself, who wished for the wings of a dove on which to fly away. He was at this time driven from his nest, from the sanctuary, 84: 3. was forced to seek for shelter in distant countries, there he was like the doves of the vallies, mourning and melancholy; but silent, neither murmuring against God, nor railing at the instruments of his trouble; herein a type of Christ, who was as a sheep, dumb before the shearers, and a pattern to Christians, who, wherever they are, and whatever injuries are done them, ought to be as silent doves. In this former part of the psalm,

1. He complains to God of the malice and wickedness of his enemies, to show what reason he had to fear them, and what cause, what need, there was, that God should appear against them, v. 1. Be merciful unto me, O God. That petition includes all the good we come to the throne of grace for; it implies also our best plea, not our merit, but God's free, rich mercy: it we may flee [*], and trust to, and in faith pray for, when surrounded on all sides with difficulties and dangers. He complains, that his enemies were very numerous, barbarous, unanimous, powerful, subtle, crafty, spiteful, malicious, restless, and unwearied, hunting for the precious life. Such as this, is the enmity of Satan and his agents against the kingdom of Christ, and the interests of his holy reli-

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The most excellent persons have always experienced the basest treatment in this evil world: and the more any mere man has resembled the Son of God, in heavenly zeal and purity; the more has he been traduced and hated by them, whose crimes he opposed, or whose hypocrisy he detected. Yet none was ever so overwhelmed with terror and anguish, as the holy Jesus was; when 'it pleased the LORD to bruise Him, to put Him to grief, and to make his soul an offering for our sins.' But in 'his agony He prayed more earnestly,' and was heard and delivered: and if we trust in his merits, and copy his example, we too shall be supported under all, and carried through all.—Those, who are most conversant with mankind, will see the most to disquiet, discourage, and disgust them, if they have a spiritual judgment, and are laboring to do good: yet no wickedness so distresses the believer, as that which he witnesses in the visible church of God: with anguish of heart he often perceives violence, discord and treachery in the congregations, where the Gospel of peace is preached and professed; by which the common cause is weakened, the truth disgraced, and far more mischief done than by all the fury of persecutors.—Though we must not pray for the destruction of our most treacherous injurers; yet we may warn them of the doom of those, who before them have trodden in the same path: and in every possible trial let us 'call upon the LORD, and He will save us.'—Our souls need spiritual nourishment at least as often as our bodies need food: but we generally starve in the midst of abundance; because we pray so seldom, so superficially, and so formally.—David had more loyal subjects than he expected; Christ more favorers than appeared, when the general cry was, 'Crucify Him, crucify Him:' and there are more true Christians, and believers have more real friends, than in their gloomy hours they suppose. If however God be for us, He will deliver our souls in peace from every conflict, whether few or many side with us: and it is better to have changes and afflictions, than to be hardened by uninterrupted prosperity, and thus emboldened to treachery and cruelty; which generally end in untimely death, and bring men down into the pit of destruction. character and language of crafty flattering courtiers, and of malicious dissemblers, in all ages, is emphatically described. Thus Judas betrayed Christ, while he said, 'Hail, Master, and kissed Him.' (M. R.) SCOTT.

Ps. LVI. Title.] 'David calls himself a dove for his innocency and folly, (see Hos. 7:11.) in casting himself into this snare; for his vexation and persecution by his enemies, those birds of prey; and for his sad and mournful posture.' POOLE. Note, 55:6. ED.

While David remained in the land of Judah, his countrymen fought against him; and at Gath the Philistines sought to slay him. Thus Jews and Gentiles united against Christ; and his disciples are 'hated of all men for his name's sake.' SCOTT.

(2.) O thou most High.] The clause may be rendered, 'There are many who fight against me from on high,' or, from a safe and fortified place. The original word is not the same, as is generally rendered, 'most High.' SCOTT. So nearly all the commentators. ED.

Verses 3, 4.

David was himself greatly alarmed, when at Gath; but in that day 'when he feared,' he determined still to trust in God; and to honor his word, and glory in it, as a full security in every possible danger. He especially referred to the promises of God, that he should be king over Israel. SCOTT.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The heavy and continued trials, through which many of the Lord's servants have passed, should teach us to be silent and patient under our lighter afflictions. Yet are we often tempted to repine and despond! For this we should check and condemn ourselves; and, under every disquieting fear, we should place our confidence in God, and pray more earnestly for his pardoning mercy.—The Lord graciously notes and orders the removals of his people: while they keep in the path of duty, they cannot be driven from his gracious presence; and their tears of godly sorrow, and those which are extorted by persecution, or sympathy with the sufferings of others, will be reserved to be jewels in their crown of glory. Let us then be careful to discharge our own obligations; and if the Lord by his grace have delivered our souls from the death of sin, He will deliver our feet from falling, and bring us to heaven. Vows.] 'Reader, what hast thou vowed to God? These things hast thou vowed; and these vows are upon thee. Wilt thou pay them?' Dr. A. CLARKE.

NOTES.

Ps. LVII. 'Very likely this Ps. was made to commemorate David's escape from Saul, in the cave of En-gedi. It is not improbable, when he found Saul providentially delivered into his hand, he might have formed the hasty resolution to take his life, as his companions counselled him to do; and that at that moment the divine monition came, al taschith! Destroy not. When, afterwards, he composed this Ps. he gave it for title the words he then received. See 1 Sam. 24:1.' Dr. A. together with Christ, and are made spiritually alive, we have reason to own that God has delivered our souls from death. This we should aim at in all our desires and expectations of deliverance both from sin and trouble, that we may [so much the better obey God, i. e.] do Him so much the better service, without fear.

Ps. LVII. This Ps. is very like the last; it was penned on a like occasion, when David was both in danger of trouble, and in temptation to sin; it begins as that did, Be merciful to me; the method also is the same: He begins with prayer and complaint, yet not without some assurance of speeding in his request; and concludes with joy and praise. Hence we may take direction and encouragement, both in supplications, and thanksgivings, and offer both to God in singing this.

V. 1—6. The title has one word new in it, Al-taschith—Destroy not. Some make it to be only some known tune to which this Ps. was set, others apply to it the occasion and matter of the Ps. i. e. David would not let Saul be destroyed, when now in the cave there was a fair opportunity of doing it, and his servants would fain have done it, 1 Sam. 24: 4, 6. Or rather, God would not let David be destroyed by Saul; as Satan might only afflict, not destroy, Job. David must not be destroyed, for a blessing is in him, Is. 65: 8. even Christ, the Best of blessings. Happy they that have such good thoughts as David's when in danger!

I. He supports himself with faith, hope and prayer, v. 1, 2. It was the publican's prayer, Luke 18: 13. pity any should use it slightly and profanely, should cry, God be merciful to us, or, Lord, have mercy upon us, when they mean only to express their wonder, or surprise, or vexation, but God and his mercy are not in all their thoughts. It is with much devout affection David here prays it. To recommend himself to God's mercy, he here professes,

1. That all his dependence is on God; My soul trusteth in Thee, v. 1. as the chickens take shelter under the wings of the hen, when the birds of prey are ready to strike at them; confident his troubles would end well, in due time. Our Lord comforted Himself with this, in his sufferings, Luke 22: 37. He was very easy under the divine protection, in the meantime. He comforted himself in the goodness of God's nature, by which He is inclined to succor and protect his people, as the hen is by instinct to shelter her young. God comes on the wing, to help his people, which denotes a speedy deliverance, 18: 10. He takes them under his wing, which denotes warmth and refreshment, even when the calamities are on them; see Mat. 23: 37. It may refer to the out-stretched wings of the cherubim, between which God is said to dwell, 80: 1. and whence He gave his oracles. God, by his promise, offers Himself to us, to be trusted; we by our faith must accept of Him, and put our trust in Him.

2. That all his desire is toward God, v. 2. In every thing that befalls us, we ought to see, and own, the hand of God.

3. That all his expectation is from God, v. 3. They that make God their only Refuge, and fly to Him by faith and prayer, may be sure of salvation, in his way and time. Some read it, He shall send from heaven, and save me, for He has put to shame him that would swallow me up; He has disappointed their designs against me hitherto, and therefore He will perfect my deliverance. God is good in Himself, and faithful to every word He has spoken, and so He makes it appear when He works deliverance for his people. We need no more to make us happy, than to have the benefit of the mercy and truth of God, 25: 10.

II. He represents the power and [inflamed] malice of his enemies, v. 4. But it was their destruction; the mischief they designed against David, returned on themselves; when Saul was pursuing David, the Philistines were invading him; nay, in the cave, when Saul thought David should fall into his hands, he fell into the hands of David.

III. He prays to God to glorify Himself and his own great name, v. 5. Thus God's glory should lie nearer our hearts, and we should be more concerned for it, than for any particular interests of our own. Thus the Son of David, when his soul was troubled, and He prayed, Father, save Me from this hour, immediately withdrew that petition, and presented this in its room, For this cause came I to this hour; Father glorify thy name, John 12: 27, 28. Or it may be taken as a plea; 'Lord, send from heaven to save me, and thereby thou wilt glorify Thyself as the God both of heaven and earth.' Our best encouragement in prayer, is taken from the glory of God; that therefore, more than our own comfort, we should eye in all petitions for particular mercies; for this is made the first petition in the Lord's prayer, which regulates and directs all the rest, Hallowed be thy name, thy will be done.

V. 7—11. How strangely is the tune altered here! This should make us in love with prayer, that, sooner or later, it will be swallowed up in praise. Observe,

1. How he prepares himself for the duty of praise, v. 7. My heart is erect, or lifted up, so some, which was bowed down, v. 6. My heart is fixed, with reference to God's providences; it is prepared for every event, being stayed on God, 112: 7. Is. 26: 3. Acts 20: 24. My heart is fixed with reference to his worship, to sing and give praise. It is implied, that nothing is done to purpose in religion, further than it is done with the heart: dull and sleepy devotions will never be acceptable to God; with a holy fire must that sacrifice be kindled, and ascend in a holy flame. David will be in the most lively frame, as one newly awakened out of a refreshing sleep.

2. How he pleases himself in the work of praise; so far from being ashamed to own his obligations and dependence, he resolves to praise God among the people, and to sing unto Him among the nations, v. 9. and bring all others to join him in praising God. David, in his Pss. which fill the universal church, and will to the end of time, may be said to be still praising God among the people, and singing to Him among the nations; for all good people

Egypt, Nubia, &c. The cut is the 'figured name of the Egyptian goddess Netphe (the Egyptian "Rhea").' Champ. The affectionate disposition of the Psalmist, could not but feel a peculiar delight in applying this idea to the true God, with all the fervor of a filial devotion; and we find it was a favorite expression with him. Our Savior has further hallowed it, by using it to denote the tenderness of his paternal love. Further, the idea of protection, as a prime quality in a ruler, must have early arisen in the ages of violence, when the weak multitude fled from the cruel to the generous strong, and put themselves under his shade or shadow, a synonyme for protection. Hence the umbrella was early used as a distinctive badge of sovereignty. See the cut, (?) Gen. 41: 42, 43. and the Persepolitan monuments, which frequently represent the Medo-Persian kings with this badge. The parasol is also so appropriated to the Emperor of Morocco, and in Persia, that the law forbids its use to any but the king. God's mercy and truth reach to the heavens, for they will bring all such to heaven as lay up their treasure in them, and build their hopes upon them. God's mercy and truth are praised even to the heavens, i. e. by all the bright and blessed inhabitants of the upper world, who are continually exalting God's praises to the highest, while David on earth is endeavoring to spread his praises to the furthest, v. 9.

4. The same words which he had used, v. 5. to sum up his prayers in, he here uses again, v. 11. In the praises of the church triumphant, Thou art exalted to the heavens, and in the praises of the church militant, thy glory is throughout all the earth; but Thou art above all the blessing and praise of both, Neh. 9: 5. therefore, Lord, exalt Thyself, (what can the best of us do,) above the heavens, and above all the earth: Father, glorify thine own name: Thou hast glorified it, glorify it yet again.

Ps. LVIII. It is the probable conjecture of some, (Amyraldus particularly,) that before Saul began to persecute David by force of arms, he formed a process against him by course of law, on which he was condemned, unheard, and attainted as a traitor by the great council, or supreme court of judicature, and then proclaimed an outlaw, whom any man might kill, and no man protect. The elders, to get favor with Saul, having passed this bill of attainder, it is supposed David penned this Ps. on the occasion. Sin appears here both exceeding sinful and exceeding dangerous, and God a just Avenger of wrong, with which we should be affected, in singing this Ps.

V. 1—5. David was not yet come to the throne, but as a prophet, he, in God's name, arraigns and convicts his judges. Two things he charges them with;

I. The corruption of their government. They were, perhaps, a congress or convention of the states, from whom one might have expected fair dealing, but who could be bribed, it seems, because the son of Kish could do that for them, which the son of Jesse could not, 1 Sam. 22: 7. He had vineyards, and fields, and preferments, to give them; therefore, to please him, they would do any thing, right or wrong: nothing vexed Solomon so much as to see, that, in the place of judgment, wickedness was there, Eccl. 3: 16. So it was in Saul's time.

1. The judges would not do right, would not protect or vindicate oppressed innocency, v. 1. 'You are sons of men, therefore we may appeal to yourselves, and to that law of nature written in every man's heart, Do ye indeed speak righteousness?'

2. They did a great deal of wrong; they used their power to support injury and oppression, v. 5. In heart, intimates they wrought with great plot, management, premeditation, and strong inclination, and resolution. The more there is of the heart, in any act of wickedness, the worse it is, Eccl. 8: 11. And what was their wickedness? It follows, 'You weigh (cautiously adjust, ponder, cunningly lay together) the violence of your hands in the earth, in the land; you frame it by rule and lines,' so the word signifies, 'that it may effectually answer your mischievous intentions; such masters are you of the art of oppression: you do it under color of justice.' They held the balances (the emblem of justice) in their hands, as if they designed to do right; and right is expected, but the result is violence and oppression, under pretext of law.

II. The corruption of their nature. This was the root of bitterness, v. 3. The wicked, who, in heart, work wickedness, are estranged from the womb, estranged from God and his will, and all good, alienated from the divine life, and its principles, powers, and pleasures, Eph. 4: 18. A sinful state, is a state of estrangement from that acquaintance with God, and service of Him, which we were made for. Let none wonder these wicked men dare do such things, for wickedness they brought into the world with them, they have in their natures a strong inclination to it, they learned it from their wicked parents, and have been trained up in it by a bad education; they go astray from God and their duty as soon as possibly they can; the foolishness that is bound up in their hearts, appears with the first operations of reason. Three instances are here given of the corruption of nature:

1. Falsehood. How soon will little children lie, to excuse a fault, or in their own commendation! No sooner can they speak than they speak to God's dishonor; tongue-sins are some of the first of our actual transgressions.

2. Malice. Their poison was like the poison of a serpent, innate, venomous, and very mischievous, what they can never be cured of. We pity a dog that is poisoned by accident, but hate a serpent that is poisonous by nature. Such was the cursed enmity, in the serpent's brood, against the Lord and his anointed.

3. Untractableness. They are malicious, and nothing will work on them, no reason, no kind-

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Protection from man's injustice must be sought from the Lord's mercy; and the most eminent believers need frequently to reiterate the publican's prayer, 'God be merciful to me, a sinner.' But an inward consciousness, that our souls trust in the Lord, may enable us in the most imminent dangers, to expect, that our calamities will at length be over-past: and, in the meantime, by faith and prayer, we must make the shadow of his almighty wings our refuge.—If we have fled from the wrath to come unto Jesus Christ, we are interested in all his merits, grace, and victories; and in all the precious promises and glorious perfections of our God: and He, who has performed all things requisite to the salvation of his people, will in answer to our prayers perform all things for us, and in us, which are needful to our enjoyment of it ness, to mollify them, and bring them to a better temper, v. 4, 5. The Psalmist, having compared these wicked men to serpents, takes occasion thence, on another account, to compare them to the deaf adder or viper, concerning which there was then this vulgar tradition, that, whereas by music, or some other art, they had a way of charming serpents, so as either to destroy, or, at least, disable them, this deaf adder would lay one ear to the ground, and stop the other with its tail; it is only an allusion to the report of such a thing, to illustrate the obstinacy of sinners in a sinful way. God's design, in his word and providence, is, to cure serpents of their malignity; to this end, how wise, how powerful, how well-chosen, are the charms! How forcible are right words! But all in vain, with most men; and what is the reason? It is, because they will not hearken; none so deaf!

He prays, 1. That they might be disabled for further mischief, v. 6. that they might not be able to make prey of others, 3: 7. 2. That they might be disappointed in the plots they had already laid, and might not gain their point, v. 7. 'Let them fall at the feet of the upright, and never come near the mark.' Let them be as the waters of a land-flood, which though they seem formidable for awhile, soon soak into the ground, or return to their channels; or, in general, let them be as water spilt on the ground, which cannot be gathered up again, but gradually dries away, and disappears. Such shall the floods of ungodly men be, which sometimes make us afraid, 18: 4. He prays, v. 8. they might melt as a snail, which wastes by its own motion, in every stretch it makes leaving some of its moisture behind. And he prays, that they might be like the untimely birth of a woman, which dies as soon as it begins to live, and never sees the sun, Job 3: 16. We may, in faith, pray against the designs of the church's enemies, as the prophet does, Hos. 9: 14. which explains this here.

II. His prediction of their ruin, v. 9. Thorns make a quick fire, and violent while it lasts, so that a pot is soon heated by them. Proverbial expressions are somewhat difficult, but the sense is plain; that the judgments of God often surprise wicked people in the midst of their jollity, and hurry them away of a sudden. Two things the Psalmist promises himself as the good effects of sinners' destruction:

1. That saints would be encouraged and comforted by it, v. 10. 73: 2, 13. When they see the judgments of God hurrying them away, and justice taken on them for all their mischief to God's people, they rejoice in the satisfaction to their doubts, and confirmation to their faith, thereby given in the providence of God, and his justice and righteousness in governing the world; they shall rejoice in the victory thus gained over tha temptation, by seeing their end, 73: 17. 68: 23. It shall be as great a refreshment to the saints, to see God glorified in the ruin of sinners, as it is to a weary traveller to have his feet washed. The joy of the saints, in the destruction of the wicked, is then a holy joy, and justifiable, when it helps to make them holy, and to purify them from sin.

2. That sinners would be convinced and converted by it, v. 11. The vengeance God sometimes takes on the wicked in this world, will bring men to say, Verily, or, However it be, so it may be read, there is a reward for the righteous. Any man may draw this inference from such providences, and many a man shall, who, before, denied even these plain truths, or doubted of them. Some shall have this confession extorted from them, others shall have their minds so changed, that they shall willingly own it, and thank God, who has given them to see it, and see it with satisfaction. Even in this world there is a reward for the righteous, [they shall have what is best worth having. Note, Job 36: 8, 14.] they shall be recompensed in the earth. They shall be noticed, honored, and protected, that seemed slighted, despised, and abandoned. God judges in the earth, presides in all the affairs of men, directs and disposes them according to the counsel of his will, to his own glory; and will punish the wicked, not only in the world to come, but in the earth, [for they throw themselves out of harmony with the laws of the universe. They forego the gratification of the better part of their nature, to indulge the worst, and their choice is their misery, temporal and eternal]. Thus the Similar representations abound, in modern travellers: and see Bush, Ill. &c. Roberts says, 'the kuravan, or serpent charmer, may be found in every village:' he plays on his instrument, and talks to them, and the reptiles creep out of his basket, and begin to mantle about with their heads erect, and their hoods [cuts, Gen. 3:15. Ex. 28:4. &c.] extended. From close observation, I am convinced that all these serpents, thus exhibited, have their poisonous fangs taken out; and the Psalmist seems to have had that in view when he says, "Break out their teeth."—v. 6.' ED. 'Mention is made of the charming or enchanting of serpents both in other places of Scripture, as Eccl. 10:11. Jer. 8:17. and in all sorts of authors, ancient and modern, Hebrew, Arabic, Greek and Latin, particularly Arabic.' POOLE.—'The deaf adder or asp, referred to here, may be a serpent of a species naturally deaf, [Roberts speaks of the 'beaver serpent, very deaf, and poisonous, one may approach very near without its perceiving,'] or one deaf by accident, or on account of its appearing to be so.' HARRIS. 'It is no doubt the ba'en of the Arabians. Forskal describes it as spotted with black and white, about one foot in length, nearly half an inch thick, oviparous, and its bite is almost instant death. It is the aspic of the ancients, and is so called by the literati of Cyprus, though the common people call it deaf.' [Comp. however, note, Job, 20.14. Cut in pieces.] So the Chal. the other versions have, 'weakened;' but in the ancient Hindoo mythologies, limbs are said to be 'cut off' by arrows, and arrows with crescent-bladed heads, &c. are pictured as used by their gods, in the drawings from Ceylon, already mentioned. That ancient nation, the Javanese, had arrows, which would cut as well as pierce; see some of the forms in the engraving; these forms are very ancient, for, says Raffles, 'they are those represented as used by the gods, demi-gods, and heroes of antiquity, and are constantly referred to in the mythological and historical romances of the Javans, and exhibited in their scenic and dramatic representations.' ED.

Verse 9.

Their prosperous rage, (which resembled the crackling of thorns under a pot,) would soon be extinct, and produce no effect: while the Lord would hurry them into speedy destruction. SCOTT.

Verses 10, 11.

David's cause was that of true religion; and though he would not avenge himself, he knew the Lord would, and with terrible displays of his power and wrath. Both the word for 'God,' and that translated 'that judgeth,' are in the plural. (Note, Gen. 1:1.)—All this was most signally verified in the destruction of Jerusalem, after the Jews had crucified their Messiah: and it has had, and will have, repeated accomplishments, in the establishment of true Christianity on the ruins of its opposers: but the day of judgment will be its grand and final accomplishment. SCOTT.

(10.) Wash, &c.] This would not shock an age so familiar as David's with war and butchery. Indeed we, who are blessed with peace, little conceive what scenes of blood have been and still are enacted in this fallen world. How few years, since the memory of man, have been unstained with war! Blood has ever been shed like water, especially in the E. (Note, 72:7.) 'When Abdallah captured Delhi in 1761, he ordered a general massacre which lasted 7 days! his guards were not even then glutted with slaughter, but the stench of dead bodies drove them out of the city: a great part of the buildings were reduced to ashes; and thousands who escaped the sword suffered a lingering death by famine, sitting upon the ruins of their smoking tenements. Thus a city 34 miles in length, and with 2,000,000 inhabitants, became almost a heap of ruins. The historians of the day have handed down the most appalling descriptions of human suffering, of women and men whipped naked through the streets with wanton tortures,—citizens fleeing from their dearest friends as from beasts of prey, for fear of being devoured amidst general starvation: women feeding on their own children, and infants sucking at the breasts of their deceased mothers; fire and sword seemed to contend for preeminence in the havoc, the work of war and blood was perpetual, human heads piled in pyramids, and the streets of cities and towns rendered impassable by heaps of slain; the country in many places exhibiting few signs of being inhabited, save in the bones of murdered bodies, and the smouldering ruins of villages and temples; all law and religion trodden under foot, the bonds of private friendship as well as of society broken, and every individual, as if amidst a forest of wild beasts, could rely upon nothing but the strength of his own arm, or the deep villany of his nature.' Martin, 'Br. Colonies.' If war was like this in David's time, and we have reason to suppose it was not much better, we need not wonder that the Psalmist is not more delicate in the choice of expressions: nor if he does not always clearly distinguish between revenge and justice: let us rather wonder, that, in nations pretending to reward for the righteous: [u] verily he is a God that judgeth in the earth.

Lord is known by the judgments He executes, and they are earnests of a judgment to come. He is a God, (so we read it,) not a weak man, not an angel, not a mere name, not (as the atheists suggest) a creature of men's fear and fancy, not a deified hero, not the sun and moon, as idolaters imagined; but a God, a self-existent, perfect, Being; He it is that judges the earth; his favor therefore let us seek, from whom every man's judgment proceeds, and to Him let all judgment be referred.

Ps. LIX. This Ps. is of the same nature and scope with six or seven foregoing Pss. all filled with David's complaints of his enemies, his prayers and prophecies against them, and his comfort and confidence in God as his God. The first is the language of nature, and may be allowed; the second of a prophetical spirit, looking forward to Christ and the enemies of his kingdom, therefore not to be drawn into a precedent; the third of grace and faith, which ought to be imitated by every one of us. As far as it appears that any of the particular enemies of God's people fall under these characters, we may, in singing this Ps. read their doom, and foresee their ruin.

V. 1—7. This Ps. was penned when Saul sent a party of his guards to beset David's house in the night, that they might seize and kill him; we have the story, 1 Sam. 19: 11. His hostilities were then newly begun against David, who had but just before narrowly escaped his javelin. These first eruptions of Saul's malice could not but be both grievous and terrifying to David, yet he kept up his communion with God, and such a composure of mind, that he was never out of frame for prayer and praise; happy they whose intercourse with heaven is not intercepted or broken in upon by their cares, or griefs, or fears, or any of the hurries, outward or inward, of an afflicted state. And thus earnestly should we pray daily, to be defended and delivered from our spiritual enemies, the temptations of Satan, and the corruptions of our own hearts.

David pleads here, 1. The bad character of his enemies; they are workers of iniquity, therefore not only his enemies, but God's; bloody men, therefore not only his enemies, but enemies to all mankind. 2. Their malice against him, and the imminent danger he was in from them, v. 3. They aim at my soul, my life; they are subtle, politic, all mighty, men of honor, and estates, and interest in court and country; confederate, united by league in counsel and action, very industrious, and actually gathered together against me, v. 4. He notices particularly the brutish carriage of the messengers Saul sent to take him, v. 6. [comparing them to dogs in pursuit of game, or picking up food.] Thus they raised an out-cry against him as a rebel not fit to live; with this they went about the city, as those afterwards who persecuted Christ, if possible to set the mob against him, at least, to prevent their being incensed against them, which otherwise they had reason to fear they would be, so much was David their darling. They belched out their malice in reproaches and slanders, and were continually suggesting what drew, and whet, Saul's sword against him. The sword, perhaps, had not been in Saul's hand, had it not been first in their lips. 3. His own innocency, not as to God, but as to what they charged him with; he had never said or done any thing to deserve such treatment, v. 3, 4. Note, The innocency of the godly will not secure them from the malignity of the wicked: for Christ's sake, they are hated of all men, as if noxious like serpents, and obnoxious accordingly. Yet our innocency will greatly support and comfort us under our troubles. The testimony of our conscience, that we have behaved well toward those that behave ill toward us, will much rejoice us in the day of evil. If conscious of our innocency, we may with humble confidence appeal to God, and beg of Him to plead our injured cause, which He will do in due time. 4. That his enemies were profane and atheistical, and bolstered themselves up in their enmity to David, with the contempt of God; For who, say they, doth hear? v. 7. Not God Himself, 10: 11.—94: 7. It is strange, if those regard what they say, who have made themselves believe that God regards not what they say.

He refers himself and his cause to the just judgment of God, v. 5. In this appeal, he has an eye to God, as the Lord of hosts, that has power to execute judgment, having all creatures, even hosts of angels, at his command; he views Him

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

Injustice, established by law, and decreed by judges, is more malignant than any other.—While we behold the effects of natural depravity in the atrocious crimes of others; we should be humbled by recollecting, that the principles of them all are in our hearts also, [and liable every moment to abuse.] We ought therefore to be thankful to the Lord for merciful restraints; earnest in seeking renewing grace; watchful over ourselves; and patient under the effects of our fallen nature in others. We may see, in our children, the wickedness of the world in embryo: their dislike to religion, their ingenuity at inventing lies, their pride, obstinacy, vanity, envy, and anger, are rank weeds, which, if neglected, will overspread their minds, and prevent the growth of every good thing. It is our duty therefore to bestow much pains on their education; and above all to pray for converting grace to make them new creatures.—But, though the poison of a serpent is within us, we may prevent, in great measure, its breaking forth to the injury of others. When the Savior's instructions, reasonings, and persuasions are duly regarded, the very serpent becomes harmless and gentle like the dove. (Note, Is. 11: 6—9.) But those, who refuse to hear Him that speaks to them in strains of heavenly wisdom, must perish miserably and eternally; nor can all nature furnish images adequately to represent their dreadful doom. Though the righteous are not 'glad at calamities,' yet they must rejoice to see the cause of God triumphant, and men on every side convinced that there is a reward for the righteous, and 'a God who judgeth the earth.' They must therefore exult, on some occasions, in the ruin of terrible persecutors: they will in due time rejoice at the destruction of all antichristian corrupters of the faith: and at last, they will witness the perdition of ungodly men with unmingled joy,* and sing, 'So let all thine enemies perish, O LORD.' NOTES.

Ps. LIX. The time and occasion of this Ps. are regarded as uncertain. Besides the reference in the title itself, which some adopt, others, as Dr. A. Clarke, after Calmet, refer it to the time of Nehemiah, and the occasion of his building again the walls of Jerusalem. Horsley thinks, if it be not entirely mystic, and any history is referred to, it may be that, 2 Sam. 10: the Syr. refers it to the slaughter of the priests of Nob. also as the God of Israel, to whom He was, in a peculiar manner, King and Judge, not doubting He would appear on the behalf of Israelites indeed. He desires, i. e. he is very sure, God will awake to visit all the nations; there will be a day of visitation, Is. 10: 3. and to that he refers himself, with this solemn appeal, Be not merciful to any wicked transgressors; Selah; Mark that. 1. If David had been conscious of being a wicked transgressor, he would not have expected to find mercy; but as to his enemies, he could say he was no transgressor at all, v. 3, 4. As to God, he could say he was no wicked transgressor; he had transgressed, but he was penitent, and did not obstinately persist. 2. He knew his enemies were wicked transgressors, wilful, malicious, and hardened, in their transgressions, both against God and man, therefore he sues for justice against them; judgment without mercy. Let not those expect to find mercy, who never showed mercy, for such are wicked transgressors.

V. 8—17. David here encourages himself, in reference to the threatening power of his enemies, with a pious resolution to wait on God, and a believing expectation that he should yet praise Him.

I. He resolves to wait on God, v. 9. 'Because of his strength,' either the strength of his enemies, the fear of which drove him to God, or God's strength, the hope of which drew him to God. This is our wisdom and duty, in times of danger, and difficulty. He hopes,

1. God will be to him a God of mercy, v. 10. It is very comfortable in prayer, to eye God, not only as the God of mercy, but as the God of our mercy; whatever mercy there is in God, it is laid up for us, and is ready to be laid out on us. Justly does the Psalmist call God's mercy his mercy, for all the blessings of the new covenant are called the sure mercies of David, Is. 55: 3. and they are sure to all the seed.

2. He will be to his persecutors a God of vengeance. His expectation of this, he expresses partly by way of prediction, and partly by way of petition, which come all to one; for his prayer that it might be so, amounts to a prophecy that it shall be so. Several things he foretells, in all which he should see his desire on his enemies, not a passionate or revengeful desire, but a believing desire, on them, v. 10.

(1.) He foresees that God would expose them to scorn, as they had indeed made themselves ridiculous, v. 8. Note, Atheists and persecutors are worthy to be had in derision. See Ps. 2. Prov 1: 26. Is. 37: 22.

(2.) That God would make them standing monuments of his justice, v. 11. He would not have them killed outright, lest the impressions of it should not be deep, and therefore not durable; hence he prays their execution may be gradual. Thus Cain was not slain, lest the vengeance should be forgotten, but was sentenced to be a fugitive and a vagabond. Note, God has wise and holy ends in the gradual proceedings of his wrath.

(3.) That they might be dealt with according to their deserts, v. 12. especially the sin of their mouth, let them for this be taken in their pride, even for their cursing others, and themselves, (a sin Saul was subject to, 1 Sam. 14: 28, 44.) and lying. Note, There is great malignity in tongue-sins, more than is commonly thought of. Cursing, and lying, and speaking proudly, are some of the worst of the sins of the tongue; and that man is

Verse 9.

'The more strong and the more malicious Saul is, the more will I look unto Thee; . . . for Thou, O God, art my sure Refuge in my greatest distresses.' Bp. Hall.—Some, however, suppose that the Psalmist, when he says, 'Because of his strength,' refers to the almighty power of God, as the ground of his cheerful confidence. (M.—Note, 1, 2.) ID.

Verse 10.

David's conduct, when he heard of Saul's death, implies, that he had not desired, though he had foreseen, the woful day. (M. R.—54:7.) ID.

Verses 11—13.

The rejection of the Jewish nation, their long continued dispersion, and their preservation as a distinct people, reminding men all over the earth of God's vengeance on those who reject his Gospel, and proudly despise and blaspheme his Son; (while every successive generation allows the deeds of their fathers, by their enmity against Christianity;) form such a striking accomplishment of this passage, that we must conclude the Holy Spirit intended these events in them: though it is probable David meant the disgrace, degradation, and gradual extirpation of Saul's family, for their opposition to the Lord's Anointed, and all their imprecations and calumnies against him. Other obstinate opposers of genuine Christianity may also be intended. (M. R.)—'They shall be taken in their pride, &c.' (12) 'And they' (or men,) 'shall know, unto the ends of the earth, that God ruleth, &c.' (13) Had the nation of Israel been wholly extirpated for their crimes, especially for crucifying their Messiah, and their obstinate and persevering opposition to Him and his cause; or had they been incorporated with the Gentiles, among whom they were dispersed; the awful event would in time have been forgotten, and many important benefits to the cause of true religion prevented. But their continuance through successive ages, a separate people, scattered amidst all nations, has been, and is, a most important proof that Christianity is of God; and will doubtless make way for still more surprising events, in their restoration, and the consequences of it to the world at large. (Num. 23: 9. Jer. 30:10,11. Hos. 3:4, 5. Rom. 11:11—15, 22—32.) SCOTT.

(13.) Consume them.] 'Literally "finish," bring to an end, namely, the banditti. V. 11. he prays, "Slay them not:" i. e. take not away their lives as individuals; but put an end to the conspiracy.' COTT. BIB.

Verses 14, 15.

These vs. may mean, that the punishment of David's persecutors would be answerable to their crimes. (M. R.—Note, 6.)—The extreme famine in Jerusalem, when besieged by the Romans; and the state of the Jewish nation ever since, as destitute of the Bread of life, might be alluded to.—But some think, David here again describes the conduct of his enemies, as foretelling and rejoicing in their disappointment: and that, having repeated what he said before, he adds what should be translated, 'They wander up and down to devour me: and if they be not satisfied, they tarry all night.' The words are throughout in the future tense, and may properly be thus rendered: 'Surely they shall not be satisfied, though they tarry all night.' (Title.—M.) SCOTT.

(14.) To feel the force of this, we must bear in mind that dogs in the E. are generally without owners, and dependent for food on what offal they can pick up about the city, or what is furnished them by the chance hand of charity. Hence they are lean, cross, hungry, disgusting, noisy and fierce, especially when they collect in famished troops at night. See notes, 22:16, &c. and Bush's Ill. on 22:16. Scarce any similitude could better express the despicableness the Psalmist intended. ED.

Verse 16.

In the morning.] (Note, title.) David was confident, that in the morning, when his enemies expected to devour him, he should, in perfect safety, be loudly singing the praises of God. (M. R.) SCOTT.

truly miserable whom God deals with according to the deserts of these, making his own tongue to fall on him.

(4.) That God would glorify Himself, as Israel's God and King, in their destruction, v. 13. Saul and his party think to rule and carry all before them, but they shall be made to know that there is a Higher than they, One who does and will overrule them. The design of God's judgments is, to convince men the Lord reigns; so that the greatest of men are under his check, and He makes what use He pleases of them. He rules in Jacob, and to the end of the earth; all nations are within the territories of his kingdom, even those that know Him not; but He rules for Jacob; so it may be read; He has an eye to the good of his church in the government of the world, Is. 45:4.

(5.) That He would make their sin their punishment, v. 14. comp. v. 6. Their sin was, hunting for David, to make a prey of him; their punishment should be, that they should be reduced to such extreme poverty, that they should hunt about for meat to satisfy their hunger, and should miss of it, as they missed of David, v. 15. If they be not satisfied, they will tarry all night; so that what people do give them, is not with good-will, but only to be rid of them. They should be insatiable, the greatest misery of all, in a poor condition; greedy dogs which can never have enough, Is. 56:11. and grudge if not satisfied. A contented man, if he has not what he would have, yet does not grudge, nor quarrel with Providence, nor fret within himself; but those whose God is their belly, if that be not filled, and its appetites gratified, fall out both with God and themselves. It is not poverty, but discontent, that makes a man unhappy.

II. He expects still and ever to praise God, v. 16, 17.

As we must direct our prayers to God, so to Him we must direct our praises, and must look up, making melody to the Lord.

Ps. LX. After many Pss. David penned in a day of distress, this comes calculated for a day of triumph; it was penned after he was settled in the throne, on occasion of an illustrious victory God blessed his forces with over the Syrians and Edomites: he was now in the zenith of his prosperity, and the affairs of his kingdom seem to have been in a better posture than ever before or after. See 2 Sam. 8: 3, 13. 1 Chr. 18: 3, 12. David, in prosperity, was as devout as David in adversity. In singing this Ps. we may have an eye both to the acts of the church, and to the state of our own souls, both which have their struggles.

V. 1—5. We have here,

I. A melancholy memorial of the many disgraces and disappointments God had, for some years put the people under. During the reign of Saul, especially the latter end, and during David's struggle with the house of Saul, while he reigned over Judah only, the affairs of the kingdom were much perplexed, and the neighboring nations vexatious. God sometimes shows even his own people hard things in this world, that they may not take up their rest in it, but may dwell at ease in Him only. He owns God's displeasure to be the cause of all, v. 1. Whatever our trouble, whoever the instruments, we must own the righteous hand of God in it. 'Thou hast made us to drink the wine of astonishment; we know not how to reconcile these dispensations with God's promises, and his relation to his people, nor what to do.'

Now this is mentioned here, to teach, i. e. for the instruction of the people. When God is turning his hand in our favor, it is good to remember our former calamities. Our souls must still have the affliction and the misery in remembrance, that they may be humbled within us, Lam. 3: 19, 20. Calamities serve as foils to joys.

II. A thankful notice of the encouragement God had given them to hope, that, though things had been long bad, they would now begin to mend, v. 4. 45:4. This banner was David's government, the establishment and enlargement of it over all Israel; the pious Israelites, who feared God, and had a regard to the divine designation of David to the throne, took his elevation as a token for good, and like the lifting up of a banner [note, and cut, 20: 5.] to them. It united and animated them, and struck a terror on their enemies. Christ, the Son of David, is given for an Ensign of the people, Is. 11:10. a Centre of their unity; to Him they seek, in Him they glory and take courage; his love is the banner over them, and under Him the church becomes terrible as an army with banners.

III. An humble petition for seasonable mercy.

1. That God would be reconciled, though He had been displeased. In his displeasure their calamities began, therefore in his favor their prosperity must begin. 2. That they might be reconciled to one another, though they had been broken and wretchedly divided among themselves, v. 2. ruinous breaches the folly and corruption of man makes, and which nothing but the wisdom and grace of God can repair, by pouring out a spirit

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

When we suffer for well-doing, we are conformed to our Redeemer, and have an evidence of our acceptance with God. We should indeed greatly fear suffering as 'evil-doers, or busy-bodies in other men's matters;' but we ought not to be either afraid or ashamed of the hatred of the workers of iniquity, when 'they prepare themselves, and are gathered together against us, without our fault.' (Matt. 5: 10—12. 1 Pet. 3: 13—18. 4: 12—16.) —In vain did Saul and his mighty men seek the life of David: they could not prevent his advancement to the throne, but they occasioned their own ignominy and ruin. Nor could the rulers of the Jews, by crucifying Jesus, prevent his glorification; but they thus hastened their own destruction: and neither tempters nor persecutors can succeed any better, in lying in wait for the soul of the believer.—The predictions we read concerning the vengeance to be executed on all the implacable enemies of Christ and his kingdom, and on all the impenitent and unbelieving; and the accomplishment of many of them in this present world, should impress our minds with an awe of the Divine Majesty and purity, and with dread of all iniquity.—The destruction of Jerusalem, and the state of the Jewish nation for much above 1700 years, when viewed in connection with that awful imprecation on themselves and their children, which accompanied their malice and lying testimony against Christ, and with their cry, 'Crucify Him, crucify Him;' should make us tremble at the thought of lies and imprecations, which are the offspring of pride and hatred; (Matt 27: 19—25.) and still more, lest we should at last be found despisers or abusers of his Gospel. SCOTT.

NOTES.

Ps. LX. Title. 'Shushan-eduth' seems to mean, 'a Psalm of testimony set to an instrument of 6 strings.' The Ps. was intended to testify, and teach, the danger of opposing the servants of God, and the happiness of uniting with them.—Aram-naharaim, or Syria of the two rivers, i. e. Syria between the Tigris and the Euphrates, denotes Mesopotamia; and Aram-zobah, Syria to the W. of the Euphrates.—Valley of salt.] M. R. c. SCOTT.—'This title seems not to agree with the histories to which this Ps. is supposed to relate, 2 Sam. 8:13. and 1 Chr. 18:12. neither in the persons slain, who are Edomites, 1 Chr. 18:12, but Syrians here, and 2 Sam. 8:13; nor in their numbers, which are here only 12,000, and there 18,000; nor in the persons to whom the victory is ascribed, Joab here, David, Sam. 8:13, and Abishai, 1 Chr. 18:12. But these difficulties may easily be resolved. 1. David being king, and Joab lord-general of all his forces, and Abishai lieutenant-general, as to a considerable part of his army, the same victory may well be ascribed to any or every one of them, as is usual in like cases in the Grecian and Roman histories. 2. The Edomites and Syrians were united in this war. 3. 12,000 might be slain in the pitched battle, and the rest in their flight. 4. These several places may speak of several fights.' POOLE.—'There are those who have not the common confidence in the title of this Ps. Some, as Houbigant, Venema, and Dathe, refer it to the beginning of David's reign, and think it composed by him; others, as Rudinger, refer it to the times of the Maccabees.' ROSENM.

Verses 1—3.

When Saul and his sons were slain, the Philistines triumphed, and the Israelites were scattered and dismayed. (1 Sam. 31:7.) The setting up of Ishbosheth over the ten tribes, and the consequent division and civil war, made the land to tremble, broke its force, and exposed it to the common enemy. When the Israelites supported Saul, whom God had rejected, and persecuted David, the Lord's anointed; and when after Saul's death they, at Abner's instance, adhered to Ishbosheth, and carried on war against David, in direct opposition to the known will of God; they seemed to be perfectly infatuated, as if they had drunk some intoxicating poison, which had bereaved them of their senses, and so filled them with terror and amazement, that they knew not what they did. of love and peace. 3. That thus they might be preserved out of the hands of their enemies, v. 5. They that fear God are his beloved, dear to Him as the apple of his eye; they are often in distress, but they shall be delivered; for they that have his heart have his hand; Save them, and hear me. Note, God's praying people may, with peculiar satisfaction, take public blessings, the general deliverances of the church, as answers to their prayers, in particular.

V. 6—12. The triumphs of the saints are not so much on account of what they have in possession, as in prospect, v. 6. 89: 35. God's word of promise, being a firm foundation of hope, is a full fountain of joy to all believers.

I. David here rejoices in prospect of two things:

1. The perfecting of this revolution in his own kingdom. God having promised it, he doubts not but the kingdom is all his own; I will divide Shechem, a pleasant city in mt. Ephraim, and mete out the valley of Succoth, as my own, v. 7. Gilead is mine, and Manasseh is mine, both entirely reduced. Ephraim would furnish him with soldiers for his life-guards and his standing forces; Judah, with able judges for his courts of justice. Thus may an active believer triumph in the promises, and take the comfort of all the good contained in them; they are all yea and amen in Christ, 1 Cor. 3: 22, 23.

2. The conquering of the neighboring nations, v. 8. Moab shall be put to the meanest drudgery; The Moabites became David's servants, 2 Sam. 8: 2. Edom shall be taken possession of, as David's own, signified by drawing off his shoe over it, Ruth 4: 7. As for the Philistines, let them, if they dare, triumph over him as they had done; he will soon force them to change their note.

But the war was not yet completed; a strong city, Rabbah, perhaps of Ammon, yet holds out; Edom is not yet subdued. David inquires for help to carry on and finish the war; and this he expects from God only. He notices the frowns of Providence they had been under; when defeated, they owned it was because they had forfeited God's gracious presence with them; yet they would not therefore fly from Him, but rather take so much the faster hold of Him. The Son of David, in his sufferings, seemed cast off by his Father, when He cried, Why hast Thou forsaken me? Yet, even then, He obtained a glorious victory over the powers of darkness and their strong city. The Israel of God, his spiritual Israel, are likewise, through Him, more than conquerors. A lively faith in the

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The anger of God against sin is the sole cause of all misery, [i. e. misery is the consequence of sin under God's laws or government; whether this misery be] personal or public, in families, churches, and nations; which has been, is, or shall be endured, in time or to eternity.—Professing churches are often cast off, and deprived of their privileges for their sins; nations tremble and are broken for the same cause;* yea, the earth, and creation itself, groans under the load of man's guilt. (Rom. 8: 18—23.) Even the true believer, when he commits iniquity, will sometimes be showed heavy things, and made to drink of the wine of astonishment, till anguish and dismay for a time seize on him. In all these cases, there is no remedy, but by returning to the Lord, [in dutiful obedience,] with repentance, faith, and prayer; and beseeching Him to return to us, and heal the breaches sin has made. He, who is in Christ a new creature, may rejoice in all the precious promises, God 'hath spoken in his holiness,' and by his Holy One; and may consider the whole ransomed inheritance as his own reversion: and the present privileges to which he is called, and the sanctifying and comforting influences of the Spirit which he experiences, are the sure earnests of heavenly glory.—Those who trust and pray to saints and angels, and expect salvation from them, will be overcome by the enemy, and finally perish. SCOTT.

* This is oftener asserted than believed, it would seem: else would rulers more refer themselves to God's laws, in matters of state. The following, while it startles, should warn. A popular British author, after stating that of 127 years (before 1815) England spent 65 in war, and 2,023 millions stg. says, 'Thus we are burdened with paying 30 millions stg. annually, as the price of the gratification of our ancestors' [lower] propensities. Had the 20th of this been spent in objects recognised by the moral sentiments, as education, penitentiaries, roads, canals, granaries, &c., how different would have been the present condition of the country. Every departure from the moral law carries its punishment from its first to its last moment; England needed reform, but clinging to the suggestions of the propensities, resisted it, and preferred to let them loose, for 23 years, on France, with headlong fury and fearful perseverance, not trusting to the efficacy of God's laws to explode the French infatuation. Do the consequences prove this conduct in accordance with the [moral] sentiments? This island [before 'the reform bill' alleviated some of the most flagrant evils] exhibits millions toiled to the extremity of human endurance, for a pittance scarcely sufficient to sustain life; weavers laboring 14 or 16 hours a day for 8d., (and even at that frequently unable to get work,) other artisans, exhausted almost to death by labor, who, if better paid, seek compensation and enjoyment in the grossest sensuality; employers anxious for wealth, now gay in hope, then suddenly sunk in despair and ruin; landholders and tenants now reaping unmeasured returns, then pining in penury, amidst an overflow of every species of produce; the government cramped by an overwhelming debt, and the prevalence of ignorance and selfishness on every side, so that it is impossible for it to follow, with a bold step, the most obvious dictates of reason and justice, for the countless prejudices and imaginary interests, every where obstructing the path of improvement. This much more resembles the punishment for transgression, than reward for obedience to divine institutions. Let every Briton reckon his own and his friend's pangs, in the vicissitudes of hope and fear, the denial (from taxation) of numberless little comforts, obstructions to fair industry, &c. &c., and he will discover the extent of responsibility attached by the Creator to national transgressions. The necessity of providing for the national debt, inflicts miseries equal to the most extensive natural calamities. . . Men have hitherto expected the punishment of their offences in the thunderbolt, or the yawning earthquake; and believed, that because the sea did not swallow them up, or the mountains fall upon them and crush them to atoms, Heaven was taking no cognizance of their sins: while, in point of fact, an omnipotent, an all-just and an all-wise God, had arranged, before they erred, an ample retribution in the very consequences of their transgressions. It is by looking to the principles, in the mind from which transgressions flow, and attending to their whole operations and results, that we discover the real theory of the divine government. When men shall be instructed in the laws of creation, they will discriminate more accurately than heretofore between natural and factitious evils, and be less tolerant of the latter.' Combe, Const. of Man. When will parents, teachers, divines, political economists, and rulers, think they have any thing to do with God's natural laws? Ed.

p omise will assure us, not only that the God of peace shall tread Satan under our feet shortly, but that it is our Father's good pleasure to give us the kingdom.

H. He prays in hope. v. 11. Even in the day of their triumph, they see themselves in trouble; for war is troublesome even to the prevailing side, and if God help not, the next engagement may result in a defeat; therefore, Lord, send us help from the sanctuary.

Their hope has two things in it. 1. A diffidence of themselves, and all their creature-confidences. Then only are we qualified to receive help from God, when brought to own the insufficiency of all creatures to do that for us which we expect Him to do. 2. A confidence in God, and in his power and promise, v. 12. Note, So far from superseding our endeavors, our confidence in God must encourage and quicken. Hope in God is the best principle of true courage; for what need they fear who have God on their side? It is only through God, and by the influence of his grace, that we do valiantly; and though we do ever so valiantly, the success must be attributed entirely to Him; for He it is that shall tread down our enemies, and not we ourselves. All our victories, as well as our valor, are from Him, therefore at his feet all our crowns must be cast.

Ps. LXI. V. 1—4. David, in this Ps. as in many others, begins with a sad heart, but concludes with an air of pleasantness; begins with prayer, and ends with praise. It should seem, David was banished when he penned this psalm, whether by Saul or Absalom is uncertain: some think by Absalom, because he calls himself the king, v. 6. but that refers to the King Messiah. But he resolves to persevere in duty, encouraged both by his experience, and expectations. So that, in singing this Ps. we may find what is very expressive both of our faith and hope, prayers and praises; some passages are very peculiar. Observe, in these verses,

1. David's close adherence and application to God by prayer, in the day of distress and trouble, v. 2. He will pray, notwithstanding his distance from the house of prayer. Note, Wherever we are, we may find a way open to the throne of grace. 'Nay, because in the end of the earth, in sorrow and solitude, therefore I will cry.' That which separates us from our other comforts, should drive us so much the nearer to God, the Fountain of all comfort. Neither shall dejection and despondency of spirit prevent his praying. 'Though my heart is overwhelmed, it is not so sunk, so burdened, but that it may be lifted up in prayer. Nay, because my heart is ready to be overwhelmed, therefore I will cry unto Thee, for by that mean it will be supported and relieved.' Note, Weeping must quicken, not deaden, praying; Jam. 5: 13. Ps. 102: title.

2. His particular petition; Lead me to the Rock that is higher than I; i. e. 'Lord, give me such an assurance and satisfaction of my own safety, as I can never attain to but by Thy special grace working such a faith in me.' God's power and promise are the rock higher than we. This Rock is Christ; they are safe that are in Him. We cannot get upon this rock, unless God by his power lead us, Ex. 33: 22.

3. His desire and expectation of an answer of peace. He begs in faith, v. 1. 'Let me have the present comfort of knowing I am heard, 20: 6. and in due time what I pray for.'

4. The ground and plea, v. 3. Past experiences of the benefit of trusting in God, as they should engage us still to keep close to Him, so they should encourage us to hope it will not be in vain, Prov. 18: 10.

5. His resolution to continue in the way of duty to, and dependence on, God, v. 4. David was now banished from the tabernacle, which was his greatest grievance; but he is assured that God, by his providence, would bring him back, because He had, by his grace, wrought in him such a kindness for his tabernacle, as that he was resolved to make it his perpetual residence, 27: 4. He speaks of abiding in it for ever, because that tabernacle was a type and figure of heaven, Heb. 9: 8, 9, 24. The grace of God and the covenant of grace shall be his constant comfort; I will make my refuge in the covert of his wings, as the chickens seek both warmth and safety under the wings of the hen.

V. 5—8. In these vs. we may observe,

1. With what pleasure David looks back on what God had done for him formerly, v. 5. God put Jacob in mind of his vows, Gen. 31: 13.—35: 1. Note, God is a Witness to all our good purposes, and all our solemn promises of new obedience. 'Prayers went along with his vows; those Thou hast graciously heard, and answered;' which encouraged him now to pray, O God, hear my cry. He that never did say to the seed of Jacob, Seek ye Me in vain, will not now begin to say so. Note, There is a peculiar people in the world, that fear God's name, and accommodate themselves to all the discoveries He is pleased to make of Himself to men. There is a heritage peculiar to that peculiar people, present comforts, earnests of their future bliss. God Himself is their Inheritance, their Portion for ever; what need we more?

2. With what assurance he looks forward to the continuance of his life, v. 6. This may be under-

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

When removed from other comforts, we should more earnestly seek consolation from God. No outward situation can exclude us from communion with Him through Christ; but without divine assistance, we can neither climb, nor take shelter in, that Rock of salvation: when therefore we perceive there is safety in Him and none in ourselves, we should pray fervently for the Holy Spirit of promise, that we may, by his gracious teaching and assistance, 'believe to the saving of our souls.'—When we have the opportunity, we should keep close to the ordinances of God: and remember, that if He have given us the goodly 'heritage of those that fear his name,' (106: 4, 5.) we shall have enough for ever and ever. SCOTT.

Morison, besides many others, refer it to David; and most, to Absalom's rebellion, while David was at Mahanaim. ED.

Verses 4, 5.

The Psalmist (Note, 27:4—6.) seems to have looked through the shadow of the earthly sanctuary, to 'the holy places not made with hands,' for it can hardly be supposed, he meant his temporal authority, which was given to him alone. SCOTT.

(4.) For ever. For ages. This must imply far more, than that one age, David lived on earth, drawing near to a close when this was written. (145:1,2. 146:2.)—Wings.] (M. R.—Notes, Ruth, 2:11, 12.57:1.) 'Wings of the cherubim,' say some. These indeed covered the mercy-seat. But they were placed in the holy of holies, and inaccessible to the worshippers, and were emblems of the angels looking into the mysteries of redemption, and joining in the worship of the redeemed. (1 Pet. 1:10—12 Rev. 5:11—14.) ID.

Verses 6, 7.

David might here mean himself, but the King Messiah seems to have been especially intended. (John 1:17.) 'The Chal. expounds this of Messiah only; "Thou shalt add days to the days of King Messias; his years shall be as the generation of this world, and of the world to come."' Bp. Horne. SCOTT.—(6.) There is some diversity of opinion, whether this v. should be understood exclusively of David, or as referring also, if not exclusively, to the Messiah. ED.

NOTES.

Ps. LXII. Hammond considers this 'a eucharistical hymn' of David, but fixes not the time, which Dr. A. Clarke thinks may have been Absalom's rebellion and when David fled from Jerusalem. Rosenm. refers it to Saul's persecution. ED.

Title.] Jeduthun was first chosen to be one of the chief musicians, when the ark was removed to mt. stood, either, (1.) Of himself; if penned before he came to the crown, yet, being anointed, and knowing what God had spoken in his holiness, he could, in faith, call himself the king, though now an outlaw; perhaps, it was penned when Absalom forced him into exile. Or, (2.) Of the Messiah, the King of whom he was a type. The Mediator shall abide before God for ever, for He always appears in the presence of God for us, and ever lives, making intercession; and because He lives, we shall live also.

3. With what importunity he begs of God to take him and keep him always under his protection; O prepare mercy and truth which may preserve him. God's promises, and our faith in them, are not to supersede, but to quicken and encourage, prayer. David is sure God will prolong his life, and therefore prays He would preserve it. We need not desire to be better secured than under the protection of God's mercy and truth. This may be applied to the Messiah; let Him be sent in the fulness of time, in performance of the truth to Jacob, and the mercy to Abraham, Mic. 7: 20. Luke 1: 72, 73.

4. With what cheerfulness he vows the grateful returns of duty to God, v. 8. Note, God's preservation of us calls on us to praise Him. We must praise God as long as we live, [not by flattering language, but by obedience also,] and then we shall praise Him for ever; that I may daily perform my vows: his praising God was itself the performance, and disposed his heart to perform his vows in other instances. Daily, constantly, receiving fresh mercies, if we think it much to do this daily, and constantly, we cannot expect to be doing it eternally.

Ps. LXII. V. 1—7. This Ps. has nothing in it directly either of prayer or praise, nor does it appear on what occasion it was penned, nor whether on any particular occasion, mournful or joyful. In singing it, we should stir up ourselves to wait on God. In these verses, we have,

I. David's profession of dependence on God, and on Him only, for all good, v. 1. Truly my soul waiteth upon God. Nevertheless, (so some,) or, 'However it be, whatever difficulties or dangers I may meet with, though God frown on me, yet still my soul waits on God;' or is silent to God, as the word is; 'says nothing against what He does, but quietly expects what He will do.' We are in the way both of duty and comfort, when our souls thus wait on God; Is not my soul subject to God? So the LXX. So it is, certainly so it ought to be; our wills must be melted into his will. David doubts not but his salvation will come, though now he was threatened and in danger; and he expects it from God only, Jer. 3: 23. Ps. 121: 1, 2. We may apply it to our eternal salvation, called the salvation of God, 50: 23. from Him that comes; He prepared it for us, He prepares us for it, and preserves us to it, therefore let our souls wait on Him, to be conducted through this world to that eternal salvation, in such way as He thinks fit.

II. The ground and reason of this dependence, v. 2. Many a time, in Him have I found shelter, strength, and succor: even He that is the Rock of ages, is my Rock; the God of salvation, is my Salvation; the Most High, is my High Place; therefore I have all the reason in the world to confide in Him.

III. His improvement of his confidence.

1. Trusting in God, his heart is fixed. 'I may be perplexed, but not in despair,' 2 Cor. 4: 8. This hope in God will be an anchor of the soul, sure and steadfast.

psalmody at the sanctuary was appointed, David delivered to the chief musicians the Pss. he had previously written, as well as those he afterwards from time to time composed. SCOTT.

Verses 3, 4.

The Psalmist, having avowed his confidence in God, expostulates with his enemies, warns them of their danger, and exposes their wickedness. He may refer to Saul and his party, or to Absalom and Ahithophel. (M. R.) SCOTT.—(3.) Boothr. r. 'How long will you yet plot against a man, And all of you attempt to break him down, Like a tottering wall, or a broken fence?'—The common vers. he says, makes the 2d and 3d line relate to David's enemies; but his, to David; and the next v. he thinks, supports his view.—Rowing, &c.] Roberts notes both the thing and saying as common in the E. ED.

Verses 5—7.

The repetitions, with some variation, of these vs. are peculiarly animated: and the Psalmist, by thus dwelling on the ground of his encouragement, baffled his temptations, and found his faith and hope invigorated. (1, 2.) SCOTT.

Verses 8—10.

The Psalmist, having risen above the disquietude and fear to which he had been tempted, next gives counsel and caution to the people in general, as he had before awfully warned his persecutors. (M. R. y. Note, Job 31:24—28.) 'He who is made vain and covetous by money, however honestly gotten, renders that a curse to one, which was designed a blessing to many; and drowns himself in the spring, which should have watered all around him.' Bp. Horne.—The old tr. of this last v. seems more literal than the present. 'Trust not in oppression, nor in robbery: be not vain: if riches increase, set not your heart thereon.' According to the construction of the pointed copies of the Heb. Bible, the v. seems more properly divided thus: 'Trust not in oppression nor in robbery; be not vain in riches, when they increase; set not your heart upon them.' ED.

(9.) Weighed, &c.] A seeming allusion to the Egyptian scene (common on the monuments and mummies) of weighing the character of the deceased, before permitting his honorable burial, i. e. entrance into the unseen world. The bad are sometimes represented as driven away in their wickedness, from the presence of Osiris, as Judge of the dead, and his conqueor gods. The person is presented, his deeds weighed, the result recorded, and the weigher ushers him to Osiris, &c. Note, Dan. 5:27. ED.

Verses 11, 12.

Dr. A. Clarke renders: 'Once hath God spoken;—these two things have I heard, that strength is the Lord's, and to Thee, Lord, is mercy;'—which Carpenter quotes, and Morison pronounces 'excellent and unexceptionable.' ED.

NOTES.

Ps. LXIII. Calmet refers this Ps. to the captivity, and some, as Hammond, and Dr. A. Clarke, with Scott, to Saul's persecution. But Patrick, Dathe and Rosenm. think v. 11. indicates it to have been penned not till after Saul's death, as till then David never claimed the royal dignity. They therefore refer it to Absalom's rebellion. ED.

Title. It is generally and probably supposed, that David composed this most fervent and devout Ps. when pursued by Saul in the deserts of Judah. (M. R.) Some, however, think it later; namely, when he fled from Absalom, before he passed Jordan. (2 Sam. 15:) SCOTT.

PSALM LXIII.

David earnestly thirsts for God, and longs to behold his glory at the sanctuary, 1, 2. Regarding the love of God more than life, he determines to rejoice in praising Him, 3—5. By meditation and prayer, he rises to full assurance of protection, success, and exulting joy in God; and predicts the ruin of his enemies, 6—11.

service; and men of high degree, for their wisdom, power, and influence: but neither are to be depended on; nay, of the two, men of high degree are mentioned in terms more disparaging; for they are a lie, which denotes not only vanity, but iniquity: there is no depending on their wisdom to advise, or power to act for us, their good will, nor promises, in comparison with God, or otherwise than in subordination to Him, v. 5, 9.

Note, The good we do, we should stir up ourselves to continue doing, and to do yet more and more, as those that have, through grace, experienced the comfort and benefit of it. The more faith is acted, the more active it is. The more we meditate on God's attributes and promises, and our own experience, the more ground we get of our fears, which, when they begin to fall, shall fall before us, and we be kept in perfect peace, Is. 26: 3. And as David's faith in God advances to an unshaken stayedness, so his joy in God improves itself into a holy triumph, v. 7.

V. 8—12. I. Here we have David's exhortation to all others to trust also in God, and wait on Him, as he did, v. 8. Ye people, i. e. All people, 65: 5. Ye people of the house of Israel; so the Chal.; they are especially invited, for He is the God of Israel. The good counsel is, 1. Confide in God; and this at all times. We must have an habitual and an actual confidence in God; must live a life of dependence on Him, and trust in Him on every emergency, to guide us in doubt, protect us in danger, supply us in want, and strengthen us for every good word and work. 2. Converse with God; Pour out your heart before Him; the expression seems to allude to pouring out drink-offerings. In a penitent confession of sin, our hearts are poured out before God, 1 Sam. 7: 6. But here it is meant of prayer; we must lay our grievances before Him, offer up our desires to Him, with all humble freedom, and then entirely refer ourselves to his disposal, patiently submitting our wills to his: this is pouring out our hearts. 3. His encouragement to us to take this counsel; God is a Refuge for us; not only my Refuge, v. 7. but a Refuge for all, even as many as will.

II. He cautions us against misplacing our confidence, Jer. 17: 5—9.

1. Let us not trust in the men of this world, v. 9. Men of low degree, one would think, might be relied on for their multitude, bodily strength and faithfulness; men of high degree are mentioned in terms more disparaging; for they are a lie, which denotes not only vanity, but iniquity: there is no depending on their wisdom to advise, or power to act for us, their good will, nor promises, in comparison with God, or otherwise than in subordination to Him, v. 5, 9.

2. Let us not trust in the wealth of this world; v. 10. where there is a great deal, it is commonly got by indirect scraping or saving; our Savior calls it the mammon of unrighteousness, Luke 16: 9. 'Trust not in the arts of getting riches.' He that trusted in the abundance of his riches, strengthened himself in his wickedness, 52:7. but, at his end, he will be a fool, Jer. 17: 11. Let none be so stupid as to think of supporting themselves in their sin, much less of supporting themselves in this sin. Nay, because it is hard to have riches, and not to trust in them; if they increase, though by lawful and honest means, we must take heed lest we let out our affections inordinately toward them; 'Set not your heart upon them.' This we are most in danger of doing when they increase; when the rich man's grounds brought forth plentifully, he said to his soul, Take thine ease, Luke 12: 19. It is a smiling world that is most likely to draw the heart away from God, on whom only it should be set.

III. He gives a very good reason why we should make God our Confidence, because He is a God of infinite power, mercy, and righteousness, v. 11, 12. This he had heard once, yea, twice; heard it by the light of reason, which easily infers it from the nature of the infinitely perfect Being, and from his works both of creation and providence; heard it many a time, by the events that have concerned him in particular; heard it, too, by the light of revelation, by dreams and visions, Job 4: 15. by the glorious manifestation of God on Sinai, to which, some think, it especially refers, and by the written Word. To some God speaks twice, and they will not hear once; but to others He speaks but once, and they hear twice. Comp. Job 33: 14.

Ps. LXIII. This Ps. has in it as much of warmth and lively devotion, as any of David's, in so little a compass. A devout and pious soul has little need of direction how to sing it, so naturally does it speak its own genuine language; and an unsanctified soul, unacquainted and unaffected with divine things, is scarcely capacle of singing it with understanding.

V. 1, 2. The title tells us the Ps. was penned, when David was in the wilderness of Judah, that is, in the forest of Hareth, 1 Sam. 22: 5. or, in the wilderness of Ziph, 1 Sam. 23: 15. Even in Canaan there were wildernesses, places less fruitful, and less inhabited, than others. It will be so in the world, in the church, but not in heaven. The best and dearest of God's saints may sometimes have their lot cast in a wilderness, which speaks them lonely and solitary, desolate and afflicted, wanting, wandering, and unsettled, and quite at a loss what to do with themselves; but even then they must not be put out of tune for sacred songs; it is our duty and interest to keep up a cheerful communion with God: there are Pss. proper for a wilderness. David stirs up himself to take hold on God,

I. By a lively, active faith. In all addresses to God, we must eye Him as God, and our God, and this will be our comfort in a wilderness-state. 'Thou art my God, by creation, therefore my rightful Owner and Ruler, mine by covenant, and my own consent.' We must speak this with the greatest pleasure to ourselves, and thankfulness to God, as resolved to abide by it.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS.

The lively believer can without hesitation avow, 'Truly my soul waiteth upon God.' Yet, however blamelessly he may conduct himself, he must expect a measure of the same enmity, with which the world treated his Savior. But the doom of David's persecutors, and of the crucifiers of Christ, may be expected by all, who endeavor to tempt his people to sin, or who vilify their characters. (Rom. 16: 17—20.) Let us, however, having fairly warned and expostulated with such infatuated persons, wait only upon God, and expect all our happiness from Him: then shall we not 'greatly be moved,' either to anger, to pride, or to despondency, by the malice or flattery of the ungodly: nay, when our faith grows strong, we shall be confident of not being moved at all to our real hurt: and meditation and prayer are blessed means of invigorating faith and hope. (Acts 20: 22—24.)—Reliance on increasing riches, however obtained, is idolatry, and totally inconsistent with the life of faith.—Yet the idea of increased wealth is associated with that of augmented felicity, in almost every human heart: [the very name is a synonyme with weal, or good:] and it is extremely difficult to possess riches without trusting in them, and setting the heart upon them. SCOTT.

He opens the eyes of his understanding together with those of his body, and awakes each morning to righteousness. He arises with an unextinguishable thirst after those comforts which the world cannot give; and has immediate recourse, by prayer, to the Fountain of the water of life, ever longing to behold the divine power and glory in the sanctuary above, of which he has been favored with some glimpse, in the services of the church below.' Bp. Horne.—Many explain the words, 'To see thy power and glory, &c.' of the ark, which was the symbol of the Lord's powerful, glorious, and gracious presence with his people. But the ark itself was concealed from sight; nor does it appear that, in the days of David, there was in general any external display of the divine glory at the sanctuary. It may therefore be supposed, that he referred to the internal and spiritual views, which, under the influence of the Holy Spirit, he had experienced, of the perfections and glory of God, while attending on those ordinances; which both commemorated the wonderful works of the Lord for his people Israel, and typified the salvation of the promised Redeemer. SCOTT.

V. 5. Can any candid man read this Ps. and then speak of true devotion, as merely intellectual, a dispassionate exercise of the understanding, without any warm emotions or vehement affections of the heart? Weighed in the balance of such phlegmatic Christians, the man after God's own heart must be numbered among enthusiasts: for, though his devotion was most rational, it certainly was most fervent and enraptured; and in fact the more rational on that very account. II. By pious and devout affections.

1. He resolves to seek God, his favor and grace. We must seek Him early, earnestly, with the utmost care; covet his favor as our chief good, and [in obedience] consult his glory as our highest end. This world is a weary land, so the word is; to the worldly that have their portion in it; to the godly that have their passage through it, a valley of Baca, they can promise themselves little from it. Observe his importunity for that presence of God. Gracious souls look down on the world with a holy disdain, up to God with a holy desire.

2. He passionately longs to enjoy God. To see God's power and glory; (1.) 'here in this wilderness, as in the tabernacle; in secret, as in the solemn assembly.' Note, When we want the benefit of public ordinances, we should keep up communion with God in retirements. A closet may be turned into a little sanctuary. Ezekiel had the visions of the Almighty in Babylon, and John in Patmos. (2.) 'To see it again in the sanctuary, as formerly there.' He does not say, as I have seen them, thy power and thy glory, but, Thee. We cannot see the essence of God, but we see Him, in seeing by faith his attributes and perfections. Those were precious minutes he spent in communion with God, he loved to think them over again; and with all gracious souls, laments their loss, and longs to be restored to them.

V. 3—6. How soon are David's complaints and prayers turned into praises and thanksgivings!

1. Because thy loving kindness is better than life; (lives;) life, and all its comforts; life in its best estate; long life and prosperity: spiritual life better than temporal, 30: 5. better, a thousand times, die in God's favor, than live under his wrath.

2. How he will praise God, and how long, v. 4. 'Thus as I have now begun; (the present devout affections shall remain;)' or, 'With the same earnestness and fervency with which I have prayed.' While I live. Praising God must be the work of our whole lives; we must in every thing give thanks; and not be put out of frame for this duty by any afflictions; for in this work we hope to spend a blessed eternity. We must eye God's name in all our joys, prayers and praises; we are to begin with Hallowed be thy name, and to conclude with, Thine is the glory. This we must have an eye to in our work and warfare; we must lift our hands to our duty, and against our spiritual enemies, 71: 16. Zech. 10:12. We must make all our vows in God's name; to Him engage ourselves, in dependence on his grace.

3. With what delight v. 5. The saints have a contentment with God, they desire no more than his favor to make them happy; and they have a transcendent complacency in God, in comparison with which all the delights of sense are sapless and without relish. He will praise God with outward expressions, of mouth and lips, both to excite his own devout affections, and edify others. We must address ourselves to the duties of religion with great cheerfulness, speak forth God's praises from a principle of holy joy. Praising lips must be joyful lips.

4. How he would entertain himself with thoughts of God when most retired, v. 6. remembering and meditating on Him; and thoughts of God must not be transient, but abiding, dwelling in the mind. Though wandering and unsettled, wherever he came, he brought his religion with him. On my beds, so some: being hunted by Saul, he seldom lay, two nights together, in the same bed; but, wherever he lay, if, as Jacob, on the cold ground, a stone his pillow, good thoughts of God lay down with him. When sleep departs through sickness, or any disturbance in the mind, our souls, by remembering God, may repose in Him: an hour's pious meditation may do us more good than an hour's sleep; see 16:7. 17:3. 4:4. 10:62. 134:1.

V. 7—11. David, having expressed his desires toward God, and praises, here speaks his confidence in, and joyful expectations from Him, v. 7. alluding either to the wings of the cherubim, or of a fowl, under which the helpless young have shelter, as the eagle's, (Ex.19:4. Deut. 32:11.) which speaks the divine power; and the young ones of the common hen, (Matt. 23: 37.) which speaks more of divine tenderness. It is a phrase often used in the Pss. 17:8. 36:7. 57:1. 61:4. 91:4. and no where else in this sense, except Ruth 2:12. where Ruth, when she became a proselyte, is said to trust under the wings of the God of Israel. It is duty to rejoice in the shadow of God's wings, which denotes recourse to Him by faith and prayer; having committed ourselves to God, we must be easy, pleased, and quiet from fear of evil. See,

I. The supports and encouragements of David's confidence: two things founded in the Word.

1. His former experience. 2. His present sense of God's grace carrying him on in these pursuits, v. 8. which speaks a very earnest desire, and a serious, vigorous endeavor to keep up communion with God; if we cannot always have God in our embraces, yet we must always have Him in our eye, reaching forth toward Him as our Prize, Phil. 3: 4. It is by God's power, i. e. his right hand, that we are kept from falling. This was a great encouragement to the Psalmist to hope He would, in due time, give him what he so earnestly desired, because He had by his grace wrought in him those desires, and kept them up.

II. What he foresees and foretells of his enemies.

1. They should be ruined, v. 9, 10. They sought his soul to destroy it; not only his life, but his soul, by banishing him from God's ordinances, so to starve it; and, by sending him to serve other gods, so to poison it, 1 Sam. 29: 19. But their enmity would be their death and damnation; they should fall by the sword; of God's wrath and justice; of man, Job 19: 28, 29. Rev. 13: 10. as fulfilled in Saul; either their corpses should be a prey to ravenous beasts, (Saul lay a good while unburied,) or their houses and estates a habitation for them, Is. 34:14. Such will be the doom of Christ's enemies, that oppose his kingdom and interest, Luke 19: 27.

2. That he himself should gain his point, v. 11. and be advanced to the throne to which he had been anointed. He calls himself the king because he knew himself so in the divine purpose and designation; thus Paul, yet in conflict, writes himself more than a conqueror, Rom. 8: 37. This applies to the glories and joys of the exalted Redeemer.

Two things would be the good effect; (1.) The consolation of his friends. Every one that swears to him, i. e. to David, that comes into his interest, shall glory in his success; or that swears by Him, i. e. by the blessed name of God, and not an idol; Deut. 6:13. and then it means all good people, that make a sincere and open profession of God's name; they shall glory in God. If we suffer with Christ, we shall reign with Him. (2.) The confutation of his enemies. Apply this to Christ's enemies, to those that speak lies to Him, as all hypocrites, or of Him, as persecutors. Matt. 22: 12.

PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS. The true believer is convinced, that nothing in this world can satisfy the desires of his immortal soul; and he therefore expects happiness from the eternal God, as his God and Portion. (Deut. 33:27—29.) When his soul is in a healthy and prosperous state, an inextinguishable thirst after the discoveries of the glory of the Lord, and the experience of his grace and love, lead him to seek Him early, every day, with the best of his time and the prime of his affections. He likewise values the loving-kindness of God more than life; and is even willing to depart hence that he may fully enjoy it. (Phil. 1: 21—26.) Then the pleasures of the world lose their attraction: 'for his soul is satisfied, as with marrow and fatness,' while joyfully praising and thinking upon God: and such contemplations at once excite his gratitude, increase his confidence, and animate him in seeking conformity and nearness to the Lord; aspiring after still greater attainments, as feeling himself upheld by the power of the Almighty.—To mount with David towards heaven, in these exalted strains of devotion and zeal, should be our holy ambition. Christians can, in some measure, and at some times, appropriate his emphatical language; but, alas! too commonly complain, that 'our souls cleave to the dust.' (119:25.) Let us then be more instant in prayer, that we may be quickened according to his Word of promise. SCOTT

Vs. 6—8. The fervor of David's devotion, whether pouring out his soul in earnest prayer, with vigorous exercises of faith and hope; or celebrating God's praises with admiring love, joyful gratitude, and glowing zeal for his honor and glory; seems especially to have procured him the honorable distinction of 'the man after God's own heart.' SCOTT.

Vs. 9—11. They would perish and go under the earth, as if swallowed up, with Dathan and Abiram; (Num. 16:28—34.) or, falling by the sword, be left unburied, food to [jackals] with which the land abounded: the case at Gilboa. [Comp. 68:14 and note, 58:10.] SCOTT.

(11.) By him.] 'I. e. the true God.' WILLIAMS. Boothr. renders 'Hath sworn by Him,' 'indicating the worship of Jehovah, Am. 8:14 Is. 19:18. 45:23, where swearing has this sense.' ED.

[a] The laws of Moses will appear to be drawn up with the most perfect wisdom. Knowing the changeableness of the human mind, he had anticipated the decision the people had now (1 Sam. 8:5.) come to by demanding a king. He specifies, therefore, (Deut. 17:14, &c.) the duties required of the king, and Samuel, at Saul's coronation, prepared a writing in which the powers and privileges of the sovereign were distinctly laid down; and this writing was carefully deposited in the sanctuary. See more in Mich. Comm. vol. 1. art. 54 to 63.

[b] V. 18. What was this ark of God, which Saul commands the priests to bring? The ark of the covenant was at Kirjath-jearim: and the Israelites had been already punished for removing it from Shiloh without permission. From the latter part of this 1 Sam. it appears, that during Saul's life, both Saul and David were possessed at the same time of the instruments of oracular consultation; of which the ark with the cherubic emblems formed an essential part. Mr. Hutchinson's opinion, then, that there were more emblematic arks than one, deserves great attention.

[c] At 1 S. 16:19. we read, Saul sent messengers to Jesse, saying, Send David thy son. Pursuant to this order, David played upon the harp before the king, when the evil spirit of melancholy was upon him. Saul loved him greatly, and he became his armor-bearer, and resided constantly at his court; for Saul sent a second message to Jesse: 'Let David, I pray thee, stand before me; for he hath found favor in my sight.' Yet in v. 55. of the next ch. we read that Saul enquired of Abner, whose son was the conqueror of Goliath. He speaks of him as an entire stranger; and Abner, to gratify the king's curiosity, introduces David to him after the combat, with the head of the Philistine in his hand. Bps. Warburton and Hall suppose the encounter with Goliath took place before David was required to play the harp before Saul; and so Horsley, whose arguments are so satisfactory, I insert his own words. 'It appears, indeed, from many circumstances of the story, that David's combat with Goliath was many years prior to Saul's madness, and David's introduction to him as a musician. 1st. He was quite a youth when he engaged Goliath, (vs. 33, 42.), when introduced to Saul as a musician, he was of full age, (16:18.) 2dly. This combat was his first appearance in public life (v. 56.); when introduced as a musician, he was a man of established character. (16: 18.) 3d. This combat was his first military exploit (vs. 38, 39.). He was a man of war when introduced as a musician. (16:19.) He was unknown both to Saul and Abner when he fought Goliath. He had not therefore yet been in the office of Saul's armor-bearer, or resident in any capacity at the court. Now the just conclusion from these circumstances is, not that these 20 vs. are an interpolation, but that the last 10 vs. of the preceding ch. which relate Saul's madness and David's introduction to the court on that occasion, are misplaced. The true place for these 10 vs. seems between vs. 9 and 10 of ch. 18. Let these 10 vs. be removed to that place, and this ch. 17 be immediately connected with v. 13 of ch. 16, and the whole disorder and inconsistencies that appear in the narrative in the present arrangement will be removed.'

[d] Ps. 9 is inserted here on the authority of the Chal. paraphrast, who gives as its title, 'Upon the death of the man that came out between the two armies:' and Lightfoot tr. muth labben, (the Heb. title) 'upon the death of the champion;' whose decision I prefer.

[e] In confirmation of Horsley's arrangement (note, c.) it may be observed, that, probably, David might retire from court on discovering the jealousy excited in Saul's mind after the songs and dances of the women, (1 S. 18:6.) he might have gone home to his father, and returned to court only when the malady of his sovereign required his presence. The apparent capriciousness of Saul's conduct probably arose from the sudden returns of his disorder; and at other times from the suspicions he might entertain towards the anointed successor to his crown. [Notes, 1 S. 16:14. Ps. 7:2.]

[f] This Ps. seems to have been composed by David, when, to avoid Saul's evil designs, his friends advised him to flee to the mountains of Judea. Edwards, Green, Calmet.

[g] V. 11. The date of David's marriage with Michal is uncertain. Hales supposes 5 yrs. elapsed between his conquest of Goliath and his marriage, because that time appears requisite for the intervening events, and for the establishment of the popularity and character of David. The marriage is supposed, in the Bible chronology, to have occurred in the same year with the victory; probably, however, it took place sometime after; as David (so Horsley) returned home to his father, and was again invited to court, and made Saul's armor-bearer. This was a post of confidence and affection; and while David continued in it, he greatly distinguished himself in war, and ingratiated himself with the people. The affections of Saul, however, soon changed; but the son of Jesse still continued firmly established in the hearts of the people. It was attempted therefore to remove him by stratagem. The king's daughter was offered him in marriage, on condition that he killed a certain number of the enemy. But this exposure to danger, instead of the desired effect, only served to increase his fame; and he became the son-in-law of Saul. It is not probable that all these events could have happened in one year; but still 5 are not required; for if so long a space was given to his residence at the court of Saul, we should too much abridge the time assigned to his wandering in the wilderness, in the hill country, &c. I have on these grounds therefore rejected the date in the Bib. chron. as well as that of Hales; and allowed 3 yrs. from the victory over Goliath till the marriage, and flight, by means of Michal, from the court of Saul. See Hales.

[h] Ps. 59 is inserted here on the authority of Bp. Horne and Dr. Gray.

[i] V. 1. Horsley thinks Samuel died about this time, and that, at his death, David fled from Ramah; for in all his ensuing difficulties, David consulted Ahimelech and not Samuel, as had been his custom, (ch. 21.) or Gad (22:5.) or Abiathar (33:9, 12.) I have not, however, altered the Bible arrangement upon these conjectural reasons. Samuel was now 90 yrs. of age. He might have been rendered by infirmity incapable of directing David. In addition to which it must be remembered, that immediately on Samuel's death, we read that David fled to the wilderness, (1 S. 25:1.) The mere existence of Samuel, from the prophet's influence in the towns and cities of Israel, seems to have been a defence to David. Horsley. Bib. Crit.

[j] Calmet, Gray, and Wells, assign the date of these Pss. (56. 34.) to the persecution of David by Saul. The titles prefixed to them in the Heb. text, though they do not form a part of the Ps., and may possibly be spurious, are undoubtedly very ancient, and may be considered a better authority for the insertion of the Pss. in their respective places, than the conjecture of later authors. Pss. 56 and 34 are therefore inserted in this Section on the authority of Lightfoot and their titles. So Kennicott supposes Abimelech was a common title of the kings of Gath, and Achish an individual name. That David was an inspired prophet, is evident from the prediction in vs. 20, 21, that not a bone of Him, (the Messiah) shall be broken. The pious Jews were continually looking forward to the Messiah; and they must have been as well aware of the meaning of these passages, in the writings of those who were from time to time endued with the spirit of prophecy, as we ourselves are of the meaning of many of the predictions in the book of the Apocalypse. That is, their faith was kept in exercise by the glimpses given them of the future, though they could not entirely comprehend the precise signification of every figurative expression. Their faith, like ours, 'was the substance of things not seen;' and 'they walked by faith and not by sight.'

[k] Ps. 142. is inserted here on the joint authority of the Heb. title, Lightfoot, and Travell; if different conjectures supported by great names can be called authorities.

[l] Several passages of 1 Chr. and 2 Sam. relate the same events, and repeat the same catalogues of illustrious men, in nearly the same words throughout. The apparent discrepancies are beautifully reconciled by Kennicott, in his Diss. on state of Heb. text, by comparing the Heb. of both passages with the Sept. Comp. the passage at the end of this Section (1 Chr. 11:15—29.) with the par. pass. (2 S. 23:13—17.) and refer to both in K's. Dissert. [See also Table, p. 432.]

[m] This is the first parallel passage which occurs. Par. pass. will be placed at the end of the respective chs. or sections to which they belong.

[n] In 1 S. 2. 3. we read the prediction of the total ruin of Eli's house. Saul, in the blindness of his fury, orders 85 priests of the house of Eli with their families, and Ahimelech the high priest with his family, to be slain. This is another specimen of the way in which men pursue their own schemes, whether of good or evil, and of the manner in which they are overruled to the accomplishment of the prophecies and purposes of God. The reflecting part of the Jewish nation must have observed this fulfilment of one part of the prophecies, and inferred from it the eventual accomplishment of the rest. The same observation will apply to many events in the subsequent history. See a large collection of the prophecies, with their fulfilment, in Allix's Reflections.

o Ps. 52 is here inserted on the joint authorities of its title—Lightfoot, Calmet and Travell.—Ps. 109 on the authority of Archdeacon Randolph, who observes, that probably Doeg the Edomite is particularly alluded to in it; as he had slain the priests, and endeavored to destroy him whom God had appointed to be king over Israel.—It is prophetic: and is applied by Paul to Judas.—Ps. 17 was composed, as Calmet remarks, during Saul's bitterest persecutions of David; which was certainly when the inhuman murder of the priests was committed. See Horne's Crit. Introd.—Ps. 140 is referred to this period by Hammond.—Ps. 35, from its contents, seems to have been composed by David when persecuted by Saul; and falsely accused by Doeg, and others. Edwards.—Ps. 64 was most probably composed by David, when persecuted by Saul, and his associates. Edwards.

p While the Philistines were fighting against Keilah, Doeg was executing the inhuman command of Saul, and murdering the priests at Nob. Abiathar at this time escaped and fled to David, with the ephod and the breastplate, with the Urim and the Thummim; thus transferring to David the means of consulting the oracle of God in the sanctuary, which had hitherto been appropriated to the service of Saul. To connect the history, the escape of Abiathar is inserted after the account which was brought to David, that the Philistines were plundering the country round Keilah. 1 S. 23:2. tells us, that David consulted the oracle; on the authority of Horsley, therefore, as well as from the internal evidence, v. 6 is placed before v. 2. See Horsley, Patrick, Lightfoot.

q David being pursued by his enemies, probably in his retreat from Keilah, entreats the Lord in this Ps. (31.) to deliver him. Dr. Green and Calmet place the Ps. among those composed during the persecution of Saul, but do not fix the exact period.

r Ps. 51 is inserted here on the authority of the ancient title, and Lightfoot.

s Ps. 57. David in the cave of En-gedi pours out his prayer in this Psalm, and entitles it, Al-tashchith, destroy not: for though he was invited by his soldiers to destroy Saul, yet he would not. Lightfoot. —Ps. 58. David, in the cave of En-gedi, implores the divine protection; in sure prospect of which he breaks out into grateful praise, in Ps. 57. The 58th Ps. is a continuation of the same subject, with complaints against the counsellors of Saul. Calmet.—Ps. 63, composed (title) in the wilderness of Judah, Lightfoot places in this part of the narrative, En-gedi being the most desert part of the wilderness.

t We have now arrived at the close of the persecutions of David. It is necessary to observe the order of the events related in this Section. Finding Saul to be still implacable, David resolved upon joining the Philistines, which appears to have been an unjustifiable mode of escape, when we remember the many difficulties from which he had been so mercifully delivered. [David, however, could better judge of this, in the circumstances, than we. Ed.] He fled to the king of Gath, with whom he continued 16 months. During this time he was joined by many of his own people, and made war upon the surrounding nations. In the meanwhile, the Philistines, to whom David had become an auxiliary, had declared war against Saul; and Achish, the protector of David, required him to fight against his own countrymen. From this dreadful necessity of deciding between gratitude to Achish, and the love of his country, he was relieved by the distrust of the Philistines. The two armies approach: Saul consults the witch of Endor: and according to the prediction of Samuel, who appears to him from the invisible world, he loses his throne and his life. This, of course, takes place at the conclusion of the 16 months of David's residence at Ziklag. Not having been permitted to join in the battle, David had returned to this city; but finds it burnt and plundered by the Amalekites. He pursues and defeats the invaders with great slaughter. After the battle, he generously divides the spoil between his soldiers, including those who were not able to attend him in the field. He distributes presents to the tribe of Judah, and secures the attachment of his friends: and on the death of Saul and Jonathan, being left without a rival, and alike distinguished [and far, very far, beyond his age] for courage, conduct, generosity, magnanimity and every virtue which can dignify and adorn a prince, every human mean seemed to combine to accomplish the promises of God. The tribe of Judah assemble, and elect him king; and their example is followed, after an interval of 7 yrs. by the rest of Israel.

u Ps. 141. David, being driven out of Judea by Saul, begs of God grace, that he may not sin against Him with his tongue, nor be drawn into any sinful compliances with idolatry, by living among the Philistines. He confides in God's help, and prays to be delivered from those who seek his ruin. He probably composed this Ps. just before his flight to Achish; when he had a second time spared Saul's life, but could trust him no longer. Green, Bp. Horne.

v This history of the witch of Endor has been made the subject of as much discussion as any in the O. T.; and the general concurrent opinion of both the Jewish and Christian churches, that the spirit of Samuel really appeared to Saul, has been treated with much ridicule by objectors; and it has been explained away, or otherwise interpreted by some, who think that a Christian may conciliate the skeptic, by yielding those points which appear mysterious in his religion. But if we at all believe in the existence of spirit, as something distinct from matter, there is no difficulty nor absurdity in this history. We know but little of the invisible world, or of the manner in which the disembodied spirit continues to exist; our understanding and our apprehension are so limited in this stage of our existence, that we cannot comprehend one half of those truths, which both our senses, our reason, and Revelation compel us to approve. Why then should it appear impossible that God should raise the dead? If Moses and Elias appeared from the invisible world, what greater difficulty can exist in supposing that Samuel did so? For the proofs that the spirit of the prophet was really made visible by the power of God in some mysterious manner to the woman, and for an inquiry into the nature of the objects which were to be answered by this manifestation of Samuel, see the various commentators, as Patrick, Horne, Stackhouse, and particularly Hales: Anal.

w This arrangement of § II. is made on the authority of the author of Chr.; who places the list of David's warriors, after the account of his being made king by all the tribes of Israel at Hebron. They are mentioned before the numbering of the people in 2 S.; but why, is not apparent. Their most appropriate place seems after the history of David's elevation; who was in a great measure indebted to their allegiance, among other human means, for the throne. There is some partial difference between the catalogues, 1 S. 22: & 1 Chr. 11. Kennicott, in a valuable and learned dissertation, has reconciled the apparent discrepances in the two lists by comparing both with the Sept.; and pointing out the manner in which it is probable the various minor changes of letters and words might have occurred. The passages (2 S. 23:18—17.) and (1 Chr. 11:15—19.) have been inserted above, ch. VI. § IX. See Kennicott's Diss.

x Immediately on David's accession to the throne of Israel, we read in Chr. he proposed fetching the ark up from Kirjath-jearim. His first thought was gratitude, and adoration to that God who had fulfilled his promises, and made him ruler over his people. On this supposition I have inserted Ps. 139th here, although its date and occasion are uncertain. On surveying the whole of his eventful life, David acknowledges the wisdom of Providence alike in his adversity and prosperity; he resolves to restore the ark to its place; proclaims the omniscience of God; and concludes his song of praise, with a prayer to be preserved from the evils and dangers of prosperity, and to be led in the way everlasting.

y The increase of David's family is here mentioned by anticipation. The narrative, however, must be preserved in its present order, as it is not possible to ascertain the birth of the various sons enumerated.

The invasion by the Philistines took place immediately on the dispersion of the several tribes to their own homes, after the meeting at Hebron.

z This Ps. was composed on the occasion of the [first] removal of the ark [from Kirjath-jearim to Obed Edom's house, 2 S. 6:1—11.]. It commences with the words constantly used when the ark was removed in the wilderness. (Num. 10:35.) It is quoted as prophetic by Paul, Eph. 4:8. As the ark ascended into Jerusalem, the city of the great King, so was Christ to ascend into the heavenly Jerusalem. Lowth, Lightfoot.

aa This Ps. was written [on the preparation for the second removal of the Ark, from Obed Edom's house to Jerusalem, 1 Chr. 15:1—14.] But Calmet supposes it a prayer during the Babylonish captivity. Others, by Solomon at the dedication of the Temple. I insert it here on the authority of Lightfoot, (its date being uncertain,) as an appropriate prayer of David only. He had once attempted to remove the ark, and, now prepares for a second time; and offering up a prayer for himself in the third person, he repeats his vow that he would bring the ark to Jerusalem, and the prayer that he had made on the first attempt (v. 8.); and he concludes by pleading the promises of God, that his posterity shall sit for ever on his throne, and that from him the Messiah should descend: he considers the removal of the ark as the sign and pledge of the certain accomplishment of these promises.

bb Removal of the Ark. In 1 Chr. 16:7, we read, 'On that day David delivered forth this P., to thank the Lord, into the hands of Asaph, and his brethren.' The passage which follows is nearly the same as this Ps. 105. The variations are supposed to have originated from this cause: in 1 Chr. 16. we read the Ps. as it was composed for the removal of the ark. Ps. 105 is the same Ps. of praise corrected for temple worship.—Ps. 96. See 1 Chr. 16: This Ps. was composed on the same occasion, and varies from the original only as corrected for the temple service. See Lightfoot.—Ps. 106. On the insertion of this and the two preceding Pss., Lightfoot observes, 'These are the Pss. David then appointed; ordinarily, and well known, and read in the book of Pss. when Ezra penned Chr.; and therefore he giveth them so very short in that book.'

cc The par. pass. (1 Chr. 17.) is put in the same [conspicuous] type as this of 2 S. 7, that the reader may have the advantage of comparing one with the other, and of observing the very forcible language in which both are worded, as well as the light the different modes of expressing the same idea throw upon this remarkable prediction of the prophet Nathan. The sun of prophecy seems to be climbing higher in its celestial progress, when we read this passage. The first part announces the glory of Solomon. The second looks into futurity, to the final destination of the people of Israel, promising them a rest of such a nature as they have never yet enjoyed, though they have so long possessed the promised land. The third part predicts the future son of David, who is alluded to and described in terms applicable only to a greater than Solomon: and the passage, 'I will be to him a father, and he shall be to me a son,' is expressly applied by Paul to the Savior who should come into the world.

Upon hearing this prophecy, David, though commanded not to build the temple, proceeds to the sanctuary; and there acknowledges that he did not consider this prediction as referring to his immediate son, or to the building of a temple made with hands. The two par. pass. are thus interpreted by Horsley; 2 S. 7:9. 'And this (namely, what was said about his house in distant times) is the arrangement about the MAN, Oh Lord Jehovah.' And at 1 Chr. 17:17. 'And Thou hast regarded me in the arrangement about THE MAN that is from above, O God Jehovah'—i. e. in forming the scheme of the incarnation, regard was had to the honor of David, and his house, as a secondary object, by making it a part of the plan, that the Messiah should be born in his family.

This circumstance, of David's entering into the sanctuary, and acknowledging that he understood the meaning of the figurative language of the prophet, is a proof that other Israelites, who expected the future Messiah, comprehended the various predictions which announced, in still clearer terms, the nature, the person, the life, and the incarnation of the promised Savior. It shows us too, that the prophecies were of various degrees of clearness; and when the appointed number of inspired predictions contained in the O. T. was completed, so satisfactory and so perfect was the description of our blessed Lord, and so conclusive was the evidence that He was the Messiah, that wilful blindness alone prevented the Jews from acknowledging Him. They had determined to receive only a temporal Messiah, and the predictions of their prophets were every day in vain fulfilled before their eyes, by the spiritual and long-promised Deliverer. Hales, Horsley, D'Oyly and Mant, &c.

dd Ps. 2. V. 7 refers to the prophecy of Nathan: the Ps. is inserted here on the joint authority of Hales; and of its ancient Arabic title, 'A Prophecy concerning Christ the Lord, and the calling of the Gentiles;' and on its internal evidence, as corresponding with the preceding prophecy. The application of the Ps. to the Messiah was unquestionably the doctrine of the Jewish church. See Hales.—Ps. 45. The prophecies of Nathan and David form the basis of the admirable chain (column?) of prophecies in the Pss. on Hales's authority inserted here: each is quoted as prophetic in the N. T. Ps. 45 declares the divinity of Christ, and his exaltation above the angels; it is expounded, Heb. 1:8, 9. 1 Pet. 3:22. Eph. 1:22. Phil. 2:9—11. See, too, Horsley's Serms. on this Ps.—Ps. 22 predicts the sufferings and crucifixion of Christ. The Jews unwittingly quoted v. 8. against our Lord, when hanging on the cross; and as if to fix the undoubted [indubitable] application of the Ps. to Himself, Christ expressed the sufferings of the moment in using v. 1.; still further to prove it, John applies v. 18 to the parting of our Lord's garments among the soldiers.—Ps. 16 predicts the death and resurrection of Christ: and is so applied by Peter, Acts 2:25—31; and Paul, 13:35, 36.—Ps. 108 foretells his rejection by the Jews, his adoption by the Gentiles, and the establishment of his church. It is cited by our Lord, Matt. 22:42. It is expounded by Pet. Acts 4:11. 1 Pet. 2:4, 5; by Paul, Rom. 9:32, 33. Eph. 2:20,21; and by John, Rev. 20:10—14.—Ps. 110 declares the exaltation, the kingdom, and priesthood of Christ. It is applied by our Lord expressly to assert his divinity, as that spiritual Son of David, whom David calls Lord, or Jehovah, Matt. 22:44; by Peter, Acts 2:32 36; and by Paul, who hence explains the nature of his kingdom, 1 Cor. 15:25—28, and of his priesthood, Heb. 7:1—28. 8:1. See Hales.

ee The gradual fulfilment of the ancient prophecies of their ancestors must have made a deep impression on the minds of the reflecting Israelites.—By this conquest of Edom, the prediction of Jacob (Gen. 28:40.) was accomplished.

ff Ps. 60 is inserted here on the joint authority of Lightfoot, and the ancient title.—Ps. 103. 'After 1 S. 8:13, this Ps. is to be inserted, being the same in substance as Ps. 60: and as that doth tell in the title, that it was made on Joab's victory; so may it be well conceived that this was made on that of Abishai.' Lightfoot.

gg Pss. 20 and 21 are inserted here on the authority of Calmet. See Horne's Crit. Introd.

hh Ps. 51 is inserted here on the unanimous testimony of commentators.—Ps. 32, it is generally thought, was written by David, after pardon for his adultery. Hales, Rosenm. So was Ps. 33. Hales; and also 103, says the same great authority.—Although God, on David's repentance, pardoned his sin, yet we find a series of temporal judgments were inflicted upon him, both as a just punishment for his crime, and as a solemn warning to others. The remainder of his days was as disastrous as the beginning had been prosperous and flourishing. Rape, incest, murder, and rebellion raged among his children—he was deserted by his friends—reviled by his enemies—banished from his capital—and plunged into the deepest affliction, by the ingratitude and death of his favorite and rebellious son Absalom. Hales.

ii This arrangement of part of 2 S. 14, is made on the authority of Horsley; who observes, vs. 15, 16, 17, should intervene between vs. 7 and 8; being evidently part of the woman's speech about her own pretended affair; and v. 18 should immediately follow v. 14.

jj V. 7. 40 yrs. There is some difficulty in ascertaining what this means. Some read 4. Lightfoot dates the 40 from the first anointing of David, by Samuel; and this solution is certainly preferable to making any alteration in the text. Hales supposes, that the proper reading is 4 yrs. as being the time from the first fomenting of Absalom's conspiracy, till it broke out into open rebellion: but for this there does not seem sufficient evidence. Hales, Lightfoot, Horsley, Patrick.

ll Ps. 7; see the title, comp. with the few preceding vs. of 2 S. 16 mm Ps. 42. In his flight from Absalom, David does not rest till he reaches the Jordan. While reposing on its banks, he composes Ps. 42., and remembers the Lord from the land of Jordan, (v. 6.) In contemplating the waters of its river, he affectingly alludes to his own misery: All thy billows and waves are gone over me. (Lightfoot.) That this Ps. was written at this time, is suggested by Dr. Wells.

nn This Ps. (43) in all probability was composed on the same occasion as Ps. 42. (See Patrick.) Lowth thought 42 and 43 were originally but one: and so more than 30 MSS. The 42 and 43 seem to have been composed at the same time; comp. their last vs. Lightfoot.—Ps. 55. Lightfoot and Hales refer this to Ahithophel's treachery: it is generally considered a prophecy of Judas's treachery, and is so quoted by Peter, Acts 1:20.—Ps. 4. was probably on the same occasion as Ps. 3. Lightfoot has a curious thought on v. 7. David is expressing his confidence in God; and proceeds to say, that his reliance on the providence of God affords him greater gladness of heart, than he felt at that moment when in the midst of his suffering and weariness, his own temporal wants, as well as those of his followers, were so abundantly relieved by the corn and wine of the three wealthy men at Mahanaim, 2 S. 17:27.—Ps. 5 is among those whose date and occasion are quite uncertain. Dr. Edwards conjectures it was composed when David was persecuted by Saul or Absalom. It is more applicable to the latter.—Ps. 62 refers to Absalom's unnatural persecution. Calmet, Horne.—Ps. 163. Written during the war with Absalom. Wells, Calmet, Horne.—Ps. 164. A thanksgiving for David's victories over Absalom, and other rebels. Calmet, Horne.—Ps. 70. Supposed to have been used by David continually during Absalom's rebellion. Wells.—Ps. 71. Generally thought to have been composed by David on occasion of Absalom's rebellion, when David was old and gray headed. Wells, Calmet, Horne, Gray.

oo At this time, when the Israelites had been weakened by two rebellions and three years of famine, the Philistines, thinking it a favorable opportunity of shaking off the yoke, renew the war; but are defeated in four engagements, and are finally subdued. After these deliverances it is probable that David, who had composed Ps. 18. at an early period of his life, when, according to the title, he had been delivered from the hands of Saul, now again applies it, on being rescued from the last assault of his enemies. This appears to account for the differences between this Ps. and the par. pass. in 2 S. 22. (Wells) So I have therefore inserted Ps. 18. after 2 S. 22. We learn by the title, that David recomposed it after all his deliverances, and of course after this last war of the Philistines.

pp David's motive for numbering his people was pride of heart. It is curious to observe the different phraseology of Scripture: in the v. it says, 'God moved him;' in another part, that Satan provoked him: and it is again decidedly spoken of as his own act, for which he was not only accountable, but punished.

qq In Sam. it is said, Joab numbered 800,000 for Israel, and 500,000 for Judah; and in Chr. that he numbered 1,100,000 for Israel, and 400,000 for Judah. In the former list the amount of the standing army is omitted; or, as appears from 1 Chr. 27:23, 24. the returns were completed that were sent in to the king, and the author of Sam. men tions the number according to the list actually given in; and the author of Chr. according to the list not laid before the king, or inserted in the public records, but generally known among the people. See Patrick, Lightfoot, Hales.

rr Ps. 30. Calmet supposes to have been composed on occasion of dedicating the threshing floor of Araunah.

ss The arrangement of the events related in this section varies considerably from their order as proposed by Lightfoot. The difficulty of placing them is very great; but the following considerations appear to warrant the present disposition of the text.

Solomon had been intended by his father, from his very birth, as the successor to the throne. It is generally supposed, that Nathan assured David his son would succeed him, when the name Jedediah, 'Beloved of the Lord,' was given him; and when he was commanded not to build the temple.

When David, however, was now very old and infirm, Adonijah began to assume the honors of royalty, and to consider himself as the successor. Adonijah was David's fourth son: Absalom and Amnon were dead, and his other brother Daniel, or Chileab, was born before David was king. According to the custom of the east, therefore, Adonijah considered himself the eldest son, and heir to the kingdom. Lightfoot ascribes his rash and ambitious schemes to his knowledge of his father's decrepitude; and so places 1 K. 1. before the account of David's address to Solomon. This however does not appear an adequate cause; for if Adonijah really supposed himself the destined heir, the very conviction of his father's infirmity ought to have induced him to remain quiet. Suspicion of David's determination to anoint Solomon as his successor, is more likely to have influenced his conduct. Adonijah, therefore, relying on the attachment of Joab the head of the army, and on that of Abiathar the high-priest, as well as on the silence hitherto maintained in public respecting Solomon, endeavored to form a party too strong for his father to oppose; and so prevent Solomon's advancement.

The promptitude and decision of David defeated this bold enterprise. Though confined to his couch by infirmities, (1 K. 1:47.) he ordered Solomon to be immediately crowned king, and declared partner of the throne: thus investing him with power to punish all conspiracies against the sovereign. This unexpected firmness entirely dispersed the adherents of Adonijah. David, however, not content with this, took another step, which secured the throne to Solomon. David summoned the princes and heads of Israel, and, leaving his couch, went to the assembly, presented Solomon to them as king, and declared the promise of God, that Solomon alone should build the temple, and establish the kingdom as his successor.

After this first assembly, more extensive preparations were made to build the temple: the priests and Levites are called together, and divided into their several courses; they do not appear to have been summoned to the first assembly. It is probable that the chief Pss. composed by David were delivered to the priests and singers. And when all the preparations for the objects David had in view, were completed, the congregation is summoned a second time—the magnificent presents of David to the intended building are recorded—the heads of the nation contribute to the work—a solemn festival was held, at which Solomon was again anointed—and all the princes publicly submitted themselves to him, as before to his father.

tt This Ps. (91) seems, from internal evidence, addressed to Solomon to encourage him to persevere in his allegiance to the King of kings. It describes the security, the reward, and the happiness of religion. I have inserted it, therefore, after David's charge to his Son. It is prophetic of Christ, and is quoted by Him as applicable to Himself. —Ps. 145. This fine hymn of praise was not improbably written towards the termination of David's life; on surveying the wisdom, mercy, and goodness of God both to himself and to all nature.

uu Ps. 72. This beautiful Ps. is generally supposed to have been written when Solomon was appointed king with his father. It is prophetic of the reign of the Messiah: it describes the peaceful glories of the Messiah's future reign; his righteousness; the universal worship to be paid to Him; the perpetuity of his dominion, 'whose name shall endure for ever;' in whom mankind shall be blessed, and whom all nations shall call blessed. Hales, Travell.

vv The charge of David to Solomon has been much misunderstood. He is not directed to put Joab and Shimei to death. These men had become the bitterest enemies to the throne of David and his son. Solomon, therefore, is desired to observe their conduct, and to punish any future treason with death. The expressions v. 6 and 8, 'do therefore according to thy wisdom,' and 'thou art a wise man,' refer to discretionary power which Solomon possessed, and which he was commanded by his father to use rightly.

PERIOD V. The reign of Solomon.

CHAP. I. Reign of Solomon before the Dedication of the Temple. § I. Offering at Gibeon. Judgment of Solomon. Death of Adonijah. Return of Hadad.[ww] 1 K. 2:12. 2 Chr. 1:1. 1 K. 3:3. 2 Chr. 1:2—6. 1 K. 3:5—28. 2 Chr. 1:13. 1 K. 2:13—38. 11:21, 22 with 3:4 and 2 Chr. 1:7—12. § II. Prep. for Temple. Death of Shimei. Solomon's Marriage. 1 K. 4:1[xx]—25.[yy] 2 Chr. 2:1—2. 1 K. 5:1—12. 2 Chr. 2:3—16. 1 K. 13 to end. 4 Chr. 2:17, 18. 1 K. 2:39 to end. 3:1, 2.

ww The events related in this §, took place within the first year after Solomon's accession. The narrative in 1 K., immediately on relating the succession of Solomon, proceeds to the account of Adonijah's death; that in 2 Chr. mentions the offering at Gibeon: which is placed first in the arrangement, as it is to be supposed that Solomon would convoke the people, and offer his sacrifices as soon as possible, after he had succeeded to the crown; and it is probable Adonijah would not desire to marry the Shunammite immediately on his father's death. It may appear strange, that the petition of Adonijah to obtain Abishag should be thought deserving of death; but in those times, the seraglio always descended with the crown, and it was considered as a step to the throne to marry the mistress of the deceased monarch. In requesting, therefore, permission to unite himself to Abishag, Adonijah, in fact, reasserted his pretensions to the crown. Joab, the most powerful military chieftain, and Abiather the high-priest, were implicated in the intended revolt; which it was necessary to check at the commencement. Adonijah and Joab, therefore, were condemned to death, and Abiather degraded from his office. See Michaelis, Comm. &c.

xx By this extension of Solomon's dominions, (v. 24.) the covenant made with Abraham, Gen. 15:18. was fulfilled. See Hales, and the commentators.

yy 'The matter,' says Lightfoot, 'of 1 K. 4: is not of determinate date, tied to any one year, but runneth through the story of many years, for it showeth the growth and continuance of Solomon's strength, establishment, and prosperity in his kingdom; and the evidencing of his wisdom; all the time till his declining to idolatry: and therefore as to the method and place of it, it might be laid any where,' &c. I have accordingly inserted the brief account of his horses, &c. in the section in which his greatness is related—of his wisdom, immediately preceding the book of Prov. and the last v. before the visit of the queen of Sheba.—There seem to have been two embassies to the king of Tyre: one for cedar and different kinds of wood; the other for skilful workmen in brass and gold, &c.—The Jews suppose, that Shimei was put to death prior to Solomon's marriage. Lightfoot.

Chap. II. Building of the Temple. 2 Chr. 3:1.[zz] 1 K. 6:1. 2 Chr. 3:2—9. 1 K. 6:4—8, 15—28. 2 Chr. 3: lat. part of v. 13, 14. 1 K. 6:29—36. 7:13—22. 2 Chr. 4:1. 1 K. 7:23—50. 2 Chr. 4:8—10. 1 K. 6:9—14. 7:51. 6:37, 38 with 1 K. 6:2, 3. and 2 Chr. 3:10, 11, 12, part of 13, 15—17. and 4:2—7, 11 to end.

zz It will be observed that the descriptions of the building of the temple in K. and Chr. differ. Circumstances omitted in one are mentioned in the other. I have endeavored to harmonize the two. The same may be observed of the prayer at the dedication.

Chap. III. Dedication of the Temple. 2 Chr. 5. 7:4[aaa]—7. 6:1—39. 1 K. 8: pt. of v. 50—61. 2 Chr. 6:40 to end. 7:1—3, 8—10. Ps. 47.[bbb] 97. 98. 99. 100. 135. 136 with 1 K. 8:1 to mid. of v. 50, 62 to end.

aaa V. 4. It was the custom both among the Jews, and, before them, among the patriarchs, to offer the sacrifice and then to make their prayer. Immediately after Solomon's prayer, we read that the fire descended and consumed the sacrifices: which, in compliance with the usual custom, must have been first offered. The events of this ch. 8, then, would have taken place in the order in which they are here arranged; the ark is removed into the temple—the sacrifices are slain—the prayer is made—and the fire descends, to prove that these services were accepted by the God of Israel.

bbb Ps. 47. On removing the ark into Solomon's temple, from Mt. Zion, (or into the tabernacle on Mt. Zion. See Wells.) I have inserted it here on the supposition that v. 5. appears to allude rather to the magnificent description in 1 Chr. 5:13.—It is uncertain when Pss. 97. 98. 99. 100 were composed. They are here inserted, from the apparent allusions they contain to the cloud which filled the temple, to the fire which consumed the sacrifices; and to the description in 2 Chr. 5:13.—Pss. 135. 136. The first was supposed to have been sung by the Levites on opening the gates of the temple. The second on the great festivals; one half by one half the choir, the other by either the other half, or by the whole chorus uniting in the words, 'His mercy endureth for ever.' As these Pss. were used in the temple service, and the precise time of their composition is not ascertained, it may be assumed that they were adopted at the beginning of that service, and were composed about this time.

Chap. IV. Other Buildings and Magnificence of Solomon. § I. Building of House of Lebanon. God appears to Solomon. 1 K. 7:1—12. 2 Chr. 7: 11 to end, with 1 K. 9:1—9. § II. Conquests, &c. of Solomon. 1 K. 9:10—14. 2 Chr. 8:1—11. 1 K. 9:24. § III. Song of Solomon.[ccc] ccc Inserted here on the authority of Lightfoot; who observes, that it must have been composed after the building of the summer-house in the forest of Lebanon. He infers this from 4:8. and 7:4. The common opinion respecting this much discussed book, that it is a mystical allegory of the union of Christ and his Church, is supported by the best and most abundant evidence. No comparison is more general throughout the books of Scripture, than this of marriage, to express the love of God to his church. [None perhaps was better suited to sanctify the predominating propensities of that age: and hallow this corner-stone of humanity and of the social progress. The resisting and destroying propensities too, so predominating, were allowed to be consecrated to God in sacred songs. See Moses, the Pss. &c. Ed.] For a full account of this beautiful dramatic poem, the various opinions which have been entertained respecting it, and the division of its contents in the form of scenes, acts, idyls, see Wells, Horne, Gray. [Rob. Calm. and Pref. to Cant.]

Chap. V. Greatness of Solomon. Queen of Sheba's visit. 1 K. 9:15, 16. 2 Chr. 8:12—16, 25 to end, 17. 1 K. 10:14 to end. 4:26—28, 34. 10:1—13, with 9:17—22 and 2 Chr. 8:18. 9:13—28. 1:14 to end, and 9:1—12.

Chap. VI. Wisdom of Solomon. 1 K. 4:29—31. 4:33, 32. The Proverbs, in five parts[ddd] viz. Ist. Part, chs. 1—9. IId. Part, chs. 10—22 to v. 16 incl. IIId. Part, chs. 22. v. 17—ch. 24. IVth. Part, chs. 25—29. Vth. Part, chs. 30, 31.

ddd The 1st part is a kind of preface; it contains a series of admonitions, cautions, and encouragements to the study of wisdom.—The 2d part contains what may with more strictness be called Proverbs: i. e. unconnected sentences, neat, and simple, adapted to the instruction of youth. In part 3d the tutor is supposed to instruct his pupil as if he were present. He drops the style of proverbs, and exhorts in a more connected manner.—Part 4th is supposed to have been selected from a larger collection of Proverbs by the men of Hezekiah; i. e. by the prophets whom he employed to restore the service and writings of the church, as Eliakim, and Joah, and Shebna; and probably Hosea, Micah, and even Isaiah. All these flourished in the reign of Hezekiah, and endeavored to revive true religion among the Jews. Part 5th has only 2 chs. In ch. 30, are the wise observations and instructions delivered by Agur, the son of Jakeh, to his pupils, Ithiel and Ucal. Ch. 31. has the precepts delivered to Lemuel by his mother, supposed to have been a Jewess, married to a neighboring prince, and anxious to establish her son in virtuous principles, and unite him to a wife professing the same regard for religion. Others believe the mother of Lemuel to have been Abijah, daughter of the high-priest Zechariah, and mother of king Hezekiah; others, the mother of Solomon. See Horne, Gray, Lightfoot.

Chap. VIII. Offence of Solomon. 1 K. 11. 1—14, 23—40. Eccl.

[Dr. A. Clarke remarks, that in no character of Scripture are we so much disappointed, as in that of Solomon.] The best analysis of Eccl. except perhaps that of Diodati, (too long to insert here,) is that of Des Voeux [given in Pref. to Eccl.].

Chap. VIII. Death of Solomon. 1 K. 11:41—43. 2 Chr. 9:29—31.

NEW AND ELEGANT VOLUME

ILLUSTRATIVE OF THE SCRIPTURES.

FESSENDEN & CO.

BRATTLEBORO', VT.

PROPOSE TO PUBLISH IN NUMBERS, A WORK ENTITLED, PICTORIAL ILLUSTRATIONS

HOLY BIBLE,

Consisting of beautifully executed ENGRAVINGS, on steel and wood, illustrative of the text, embracing subjects from the Paintings of the Old Masters; authentic Landscape Views of places mentioned in the Bible, as they exist at the present day, from sketches taken on the spot; Cuts illustrative of Scripture Natural History, Botany, Mineralogy, Manners, Utensils, Portraits of distinguished Biblical writers. &c. &c., with full and complete letter-press descriptions of the different subjects.

The whole will be completed in twelve numbers of about 32 pages each, which will be issued once in two months, and form a collection of from 500 to 1000 different Illustrations, selected from a very large number in the publishers' hands.

TERMS.

I. Each number shall contain at least 32 pages of Engravings and letter-press, royal octavo, printed on paper of the best quality.

II. A No. will be issued once in two months, until the work is completed, neatly stitched in a printed cover.

III. The price to subscribers will be Fifty cents per No. payable in advance for each three numbers.

IV. The Nos. as published, will be delivered to subscribers by mail or otherwise, free of expense to them.

☞ Any person forwarding the names of six subscribers to the publishers, by mail at their expense, and enclosing nine dollars, shall receive the seventh copy gratis.

☞ When completed, the whole will form a beautiful volume, to be bound up by itself to accompany any edition of the Bible, or the Engravings may be inserted in any royal octavo Bible.

N. B. Pictorial Illustrations of the Bible cannot be too highly appreciated, especially those of the character here proposed. They serve materially to illustrate the texts, and, in some cases, are almost indispensable to a right understanding of the subject. They arrest the attention of the young, and serve to impress Scripture scenes and subjects on their memory, while they attract the attention of all to the sacred volume. In scarcely any other way can a person spend the same amount to so much advantage for his family.

THE ENCYCLOPÆDIA OF RELIGIOUS KNOWLEDGE;

OR,

DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE, THEOLOGY, RELIGIOUS BIOGRAPHY, ALL RELIGIONS, ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY, AND MISSIONS; CONTAINING DEFINITIONS OF ALL RELIGIOUS TERMS; AN IMPARTIAL ACCOUNT OF THE PRINCIPAL CHRISTIAN DENOMINATIONS THAT HAVE EXISTED IN THE WORLD FROM THE BIRTH OF CHRIST TO THE PRESENT DAY, WITH THEIR DOCTRINES, RELIGIOUS RITES AND CEREMONIES, AS WELL AS THOSE OF THE JEWS, MOHAMMEDANS, AND HEATHEN NATIONS; TOGETHER WITH THE MANNERS AND CUSTOMS OF THE EAST, ILLUSTRATIVE OF THE HOLY SCRIPTURES, AND A DESCRIPTION OF THE QUADRUPEDS, BIRDS, FISHES, REPTILES, INSECTS, TREES, PLANTS, AND MINERALS, MENTIONED IN THE BIBLE; A STATEMENT OF THE MOST REMARKABLE TRANSACTIONS AND EVENTS IN ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY; BIOGRAPHICAL NOTICES OF THE EARLY MARTYRS AND DISTINGUISHED RELIGIOUS WRITERS AND CHARACTERS OF ALL AGES. TO WHICH IS ADDED A MISSIONARY GAZETTEER, CONTAINING DESCRIPTIONS OF THE VARIOUS MISSIONARY STATIONS THROUGHOUT THE GLOBE; BY REV. B. B. EDWARDS, EDITOR OF QUARTERLY OBSERVER. THE WHOLE BROUGHT DOWN TO THE PRESENT TIME, AND EMBRACING, UNDER ONE ALPHABET, THE MOST VALUABLE PART OF CALMET'S AND BROWN'S DICTIONARIES OF THE BIBLE; BUCK'S THEOL. DICTIONARY; ABBOTT'S SCRIPTURE NATURAL HISTORY; WELLS' GEOGRAPHY OF THE BIBLE; JONES' CHRISTIAN BIOGRAPHY; AND NUMEROUS OTHER SIMILAR WORKS. DESIGNED AS A COMPLETE BOOK OF REFERENCE ON ALL RELIGIOUS SUBJECTS, AND COMPANION TO THE BIBLE; FORMING A CHEAP AND COMPACT LIBRARY OF RELIGIOUS KNOWLEDGE. EDITED BY REV. J. NEWTON BROWN. ILLUSTRATED BY WOOD CUTS, MAPS, AND ENGRAVINGS ON COPPER AND STEEL.

PUBLISHERS' ADVERTISEMENT.

THE present is an age, and ours is a country, demanding great condensation and brevity in writers who would secure attention. So active and busy are the habits of the mass of our countrymen, that they have neither time nor patience to turn and peruse the pages of the cumbersome quartos and folios of the 17th century; while a tolerable competency would scarcely suffice for the purchase of the numerous works of which the modern press is so fruitful, on the subjects embraced in this volume. The work then, combining and condensing the most valuable results of the researches of the best writers on any subject, while it will be most likely to be received with favor, will at the same time be best calculated to facilitate the acquisition, and consequently the diffusion of knowledge. With these views the "COMPREHENSIVE COMMENTARY on the Bible was projected; and its unprecedented sale has encouraged the same publishers to offer to the public the present volume. The subjects embraced in this work are interesting to ALL, and as it is not designed to be in the least sectarian, or denominational, it cannot fail to be desirable for all, whether professedly religious or not, at least as a book of reference.

The following are some of the peculiarities of the plan:—

1. It is designed to be a standard and permanent work; and here it is believed will be found collected and compressed in one super-royal octavo volume of upwards of twelve hundred pages, in a shape combining convenience and cheapness, and in a style blending the sweetness of the popular with the richness of the profound, what has heretofore been scattered through more than fifty volumes, and mixed with much of little or no value. Among the works, all the valuable matter of which will be found in this, together with some from which copious extracts have been made, are the following:—

BIBLICAL ILLUSTRATION.

Calmet's Dictionary of the Bible; Brown's do.; Barr's do.; Wells' Scripture Geography; Horne's Introduction; Harris' Scripture Natural History; Abbott's edition of Carpenter's do.; Paxton's Illustrations of Scripture; Draper's do.; Harmer's Observations; Jahn's Archæology; Mrs. Sherwood's Dictionary of Types and Emblems; Burder's Oriental Customs; Josephus' Jewish Customs; Keith's Evidence of Prophecy; Cogswell's Harbinger of the Millennium; Robinson's Biblical Repository; Crabbe's English Synonymes.

ECCLESIASTICAL HISTORY.

Mosheim's History of the Christian Church; Milner's do.; Jones' do.; Waddington's do.; Neander's do.; Murdock's Elements of Dogmatic History; Lord King's History of the Primitive Church; Robinson's History of Baptism; Sismondi's History of the Crusades against the Albigenses.

RELIGIOUS BIOGRAPHY.

Fox's Lives of the Martyrs; Middleton's Evangelical Biography; Jones' Christian Biog.; Davenport's Dictionary of Biography; Universal Biographical Dictionary; Betham's Female Biography; Clissold's Last Hours of Eminent Christians; Ivimey's History of the Baptists; Benedict's do.; Mather's Magnalia; Elliot's American Biography; Allen's do.; Memoirs of American Missionaries; Encyclopædia Americana.

THEOLOGY.

Buck's Theological Dictionary, enlarged by Dr. Henderson; Jones' Biblical Cyclopedia; Hawker's Biblical Dictionary; Watson's Biblical and Theological Dictionary; Christian Examiner; Campbell's Dissertations; Dwight's Theology; Spirit of the Pilgrims; Works of Andrew Fuller; do. of Robert Hall; Douglas on the Advancement of Society in Knowledge and Religion.

CHRISTIAN DENOMINATIONS.

Evans' Sketch of Religious Denominations; Jones' Dictionary of Religious Opinions; Hannah Adams' do.; Robbins' do.; Douglas on Errors regarding Religion; Benedict's History of All Religions; Williams' Dictionary of do.; Ward's Farewell Letters; Edwards' Quarterly Register.

MISSIONS.

Edwards' Missionary Gazetteer;

☞ Many articles are original, especially those relating to the principal denominations in this country, as will be seen on reference to the fourth paragraph below.

2. It is designed for a complete book of reference on ALL religious subjects; to which a person can turn when any thing occurs in reading or conversation connected with Religion which he does not understand, or in regard to which he wishes to refresh his memory, as he would to a dictionary for a definition of a word. Nearly every subject treated in the books which form the basis of this, is touched upon; but those which are of minor importance are very brief, and those of greater utility handled more at length. Articles rarely recurred to will be found here; but it is not burdened with any thing that is altogether useless.

3. In Theology, the general plan of Buck's Dictionary is followed; especially in its evangelical cast and Christian candor, in its copious illustrations of important topics, and its valuable references to the best works on both sides of the question. Watson, Jones, and others, however, have supplied us occasionally with articles of superior value.

☞ The edition of Buck which has been used is the new one lately published in England, edited by Prof. HENDERSON, who has added nearly five hundred new articles, which will be found incorporated in this.

4. The accounts of the History, Doctrines, &c. of different denominations, have been prepared with an aim at the strictest impartiality. Where it was practicable some leading man of the principal sects existing in this country has been employed to prepare the article relating to it; and where it has not been, the matter has been drawn from some one or more prominent writer of the denomination, of acknowledged authority. THE WORK DOES NOT AIM TO EFFECT A COMPROMISE of opinions among the different denominations of Christians, but to present the views of each fully, and in their own words, leaving the reader to form his own conclusions as to which is most correct. This must be a truly acceptable course to all who can respond to the sentiment quoted by Robert Hall, "Amicus Plato, amicus Socrates, sed magis amica VERITAS."

The following are some of the contributors under this head:—

BAPTISM. Pedobaptist Views, Rev. J. TRACY, Editor of the Boston Recorder. Baptist Views, Rev. J. D. KNOWLES, Professor in the Newton Theological Institution.

BAPTISTS. Prepared under the revision and sanction of Rev. Dr. Sharp, Boston.

CONGREGATIONALISTS. Prepared by a member, and revised and sanctioned by Rev. Prof. EMERSON, of Andover Theological Seminary, and Rev. Dr. Wisner, of Boston.

CHRISTIANS. Rev. J. V. HIMES, Boston.

DISCIPLES OF CHRIST, or REFORMERS. ALEXANDER CAMPBELL, of Bethany, Virginia.

FREE WILL BAPTISTS. Rev. S. BEEDE, Editor of the Morning Star, Dover, N. H.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH. Rev. S. W. WILLSON, Editor of Zion's Herald, Boston.

PRESBYTERIANS. Rev. Dr. MILLER, of Princeton Theological Seminary.

PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL CHURCH. Rev. Mr. BOYLE, presbyter, of Boston.

PROTESTANT METHODIST CHURCH. Rev. T. F. NORRIS, President of the New England Conference.

UNIVERSAL RESTORATIONISTS. Rev. PAUL DEAN.

5. To adapt it to popular use, all words in foreign languages have been omitted; or where Hebrew, Chaldee, and Greek terms unavoidably occur, they are given in English characters.

6. Scripture Biography, which occupies a large space in most Bible Dictionaries, is handled here in the briefest manner possible—giving only the characteristic outlines, except when difficulties occur which require to be cleared up.

7. In consequence of the space thus gained, the new department of Religious Biography is made full and extensive; embracing, it is believed, every distinguished religious writer, preacher, and character, including the most distinguished females, and those philanthropists who were actuated by religious principles. Every denomination will find here notices of its most illustrious men, especially such as have lived and died in this country, from its settlement to this time. To every notice of an author a list of his principal writings (so far as possible) is given, with a reference to the best biographies of the individual.

8. As a Dictionary and Gazetteer of the Bible, the work will be found, it is believed, more copious and accurate than any other now in use, adapting it to the wants of the PULPIT and of SABBATH SCHOOLS. In the notices of the various cities and countries mentioned in the Bible, the fulfilment of the Prophecies regarding them, so far as developed, are particularly noticed.

9. The object of the ENCYCLOPEDIA being to do good on evangelical principles, the work preserves throughout, as far as possible, a devotional and practical, as well as a critical, picturesque, and popular character, that it may minister to the heart, no less than to the judgment and the imagination.

10. MAPS AND ENGRAVINGS, as well as WOOD CUTS, have been added to enrich and adorn, as well as illustrate, the work.

On the whole, the amount of information embodied in this work is immense, and it is hoped the matter, by collation, arrangement, abridgment, and addition, has been very greatly improved; and while it will be found interesting and valuable to Families, and those individuals who only desire to acquire general knowledge, to the SABBATH SCHOOL TEACHER and BIBLE CLASS LEADER it cannot but prove an invaluable treasure.

CONDITIONS.

☞ This volume will contain about 1250 pages, Super Royal octavo, be neatly printed, and durably bound. It will be afforded to subscribers at the low price of Any clergyman or other person becoming responsible for six subscribers, shall be entitled to a seventh copy gratis.

NOTICES AND RECOMMENDATIONS

OF THE

ENCYCLOPÆDIA OF RELIGIOUS KNOWLEDGE.

'The Encyclopædia of Religious Knowledge is, upon the whole, a valuable book of reference, and the theological articles are, in the main, good. The work is rich in biographical notices, and contains much useful information respecting the tenets of different sects, which in most cases is supplied by their own writers. The theological student will find it a convenient and useful companion.'

A. ALEXANDER, D. D.
Princeton Theol. Sem., N. J.'

'I regard the Ency. of Rel. Knowledge as a very valuable book of reference. While it is particularly convenient and useful to ministers of the gospel, it will be found to be very entertaining and instructive to others, and is well worthy of a place in every family library.'

B. TYLER, D. D.
Pres. of E. Windsor Theol. Institute, Conn.'

'I have examined the Ency. of Rel. Knowledge in sundry of its articles; and holding in my library its principal authorities, I am ready to say that I much approve it. We have no work which contains, and judiciously contains, so much informing matter at so moderate a price.'

Rev. JONATHAN HOMER, D. D.
Newton, Mass.'

'This volume is certainly an exception to the general style in which compends, summaries, and Encys. are manufactured among us. It bears the marks of care, honest research, and accurate statement. The commendable practice is followed of giving the authorities at the close of each article.

It is not a bookselling expedient, prepared in the haste of a plagiary from English works; but in part original, and in part condensed, and accommodated to suit the general intention of the volume. The department of religious biography is very complete;—a field of labor in which the American Encyclopædia is notoriously deficient. Candor and good judgment are here manifested.

On the whole, we heartily commend this publication to our readers. It will repay many fold the cost of its purchase. No single volume in the language, so far as we know, contains a larger amount of valuable knowledge.' [Biblical Repository and Quarterly Observer.

'We are are confident that this must be a valuable acquisition to any man's library; and one who expects to purchase and use much literature of this sort, we are equally confident, will save both money and time by subscribing for this.

We have Encys. in other departments of science; but we do not know that any thing in the form of a Religious Ency. has ever been published in this, or any other country. A work of this kind has therefore been a great desideratum in the religious and reading community.

So far as we have examined it—and we have devoted some time and care to the subject—the book fulfils the large promise of the title quite as well as could reasonably be expected. It is a vast storehouse of information all the subjects indicated, judiciously selected—condensed, perspicuous, and well arranged; and, what is of great importance, with references, at the end of the more important articles, to works from which more particular information may be obtained. The work is handsomely printed, on good paper; the type is clean and fair, and sufficiently large. On the whole, it is entirely beyond any thing else extant as a convenient book of reference for clergymen, teachers of Bible classes and Sabbath schools, and all, in fact, who wish for any book of reference of the kind to assist them in their biblical and religious reading. It is marvellously cheap. We recommend it confidently. It will not disappoint any reasonable expectations.' [Vt. Chronicle.

'A very useful work, 1300 imp. 8vo pages. Its usefulness in the family, in reading religious intelligence and other publications, and in writing on religious subjects, is obvious. The price, for so large a volume, prepared with so much labor, must be acknowledged very reasonable—cheap.' [N. Y. Evangelist.

'The editorial execution altogether surpasses my expectations, and I am persuaded the work will be extensively popular.

Rev. GEO. BUSH,
Prof. of Ori. Lit. in N. Y. City University.'

'Its plan is very comprehensive, and embraces a variety of information respecting the state of religion throughout the world, which cannot be obtained except by recourse to a great number of original sources.

In regard to the different denominations in our own country, it is necessary only to recur to the names of the gentlemen who furnish the accounts of them, to obtain full confidence in the fidelity with which those accounts may be expected to be composed.'

[Boston Christian Register.

'This work contains in itself a religious library; and as such we consider it one of great value to the Christian public.

The plan of it is happily adapted to make it a book of reference, a convenient substitute, and more than a substitute for many volumes which Christian readers have heretofore had occasion to consult. And from an examination of a large number of articles, the plan appears to have been well executed. Many of the original articles are ably written. Those condensed from other works were evidently prepared with great care and attention, and show the result of extensive reading and patient research.

Its cheapness strongly commends it to public favor.'

[Southern Rel. Telegraph, Richmond, Va.

'The Encyclopædia of Religious Knowledge is deservedly having a large sale.' [Boston Recorder.

'Though it is a large volume, yet in view of its variety and comprehensiveness, it is multum in parvo,—much in a small space,—an ocean of matter in a drop of words. The work has been compiled with immense labor, with great accuracy and uncommon impartiality. Mr. Brown has performed his difficult and delicate task in a judicious manner—in a manner to highly promote the public benefit, and to entitle him to the approbation and gratitude of the community. We are happy to add, that the work has been got up in a handsome style, and in good taste. We should sincerely hope, that the cause of truth and the interest of the religious public may be promoted by its extensive circulation. It should be a companion to the Bible in every family; it should find a place in the library of every Sunday school teacher; and we venture little in saying that, as a work of reference, the minister of the gospel would find it convenient and useful.' [American Baptist (New York.)

'The object of the work is to condense into one volume the most important matter now scattered throughout many expensive publications. The compiler appears to have executed his task with commendable diligence and good judgment. It requires more than ordinary wisdom, in compiling such a work, to determine what to reject and what to retain. As far as we have been able to examine the work, we think the author deserves the credit of a faithful and judicious compiler.—We deem the work worthy of extensive patronage. It is well executed, on good paper, and illustrated with engravings and wood cuts; and we hope the enterprising publishers will be well repaid for their expenditure on this praiseworthy and expensive work.' [Richmond Rel. Herald.

'The general execution of the work is decidedly good. We recommend it for its general excellence, as a most useful book of reference, to families which desire information on religious subjects.'

[Presbyterian (Philadelphia.)

'This work is emphatically what its title imports, a repository of every description of religious knowledge, alphabetically arranged, for easy and familiar reference. It seems to embrace just that kind of knowledge which the ministers of the gospel, and the curious and enlightened Christian of every denomination, requires, relative to the Bible, theology, religious biography, ecclesiastical history, missions and all religions. The amount of matter embraced in about 1300 large octavo pages on these subjects is incalculable—enough, we should think, to fill 15 or 20 volumes of the Family Library. We consider it, in fact, if not the only, the most recent, comprehensive, illustrative, and trustworthy work of reference on all denominational points, and topics adverted to above, extant. It is designed as a complete book of reference on all religious subjects, and companion to the Bible, forming a compact library of religious knowledge: and when its excellence is fully known, it will, we doubt not, find a place in almost every Christian family.'

[N. Y. Weekly Messenger.

'We have recently procured a copy of this excellent work;—it is just such a work as the religious public have long needed. It fills a place that is not occupied by any other work in the English language. We wish one could be placed in the hands of every minister of the gospel throughout our country. This one volume would be to him a valuable library of religious knowledge; he might accumulate a great variety of books before he could otherwise obtain the information which he needs upon various points, and which would be directly available in the great work in which he is engaged. Here he has a condensed, but accurate and satisfactory view of the religious customs and sentiments of the different denominations of Christians; and, notwithstanding their number and diversity, he can in this volume hear them nearly all speak their own language and assign their own reasons.

But besides information with regard to different religions, and the different denominations of the Christian religion, the minister of Christ may here find a distinct and evangelical statement of the great leading doctrines of the Scriptures; which will be no small advantage to any who may have had to enter upon the ministry with but little preparation.

On the same account, this work recommends itself as a most important help to every Bible class and Sabbath school teacher. Indeed, every head of a family, who wishes to acquire and impart to his children correct and enlightened views upon religious subjects in general, should have in his library this Encyclopædia. Were this generally the case, we might soon expect to see a higher degree of religious knowledge in circulation, and fewer misconceptions and misrepresentations respecting the sentiments of different religious denominations.'

[Zion's Advocate (Portland.)

'Few works of more value can be named, even in this time of condensing books. For theological students as a book of reference, and as a family book for youths, to which they may devote their evenings, and imbibe correct information upon the almost boundless field of survey which is connected with the moral and religious condition of mankind, it is unequalled in variety and amplitude of knowledge. We have extensively searched the articles of which it is composed; and can attest to the general fidelity with which the work has been compiled. We have ascertained that the Ency. of Rel. Knowledge comprehends the substance of FIFTY valuable works; all of which formerly were considered necessary to the library not only of a scholar, but also of all Christians who were anxious to obtain accurate and enlarged information of scriptural truth and ecclesiastical history. We can conceive of nothing more beneficial to the American churches than this laborious and grand scheme for the diffusion of religious knowledge.' [N. Y. Protestant Vindicator.

(From the Literary and Theological Review, (New York,) edited by Rev. Leonard Woods, Jr.)

'It is enough to say in commendation of it, that it fulfils the promise set forth in its long, descriptive, comprehensive title. The original articles contained in it are numerous, and of great value. The mechanical execution is excellent, and the whole constitutes, we have no doubt, the completest and most valuable book of reference, adapted to the use of families, Sunday school teachers, and ministers of the gospel, that has ever been prepared and published in this country.'

(From the New York Observer.)

'This volume is on a plan which we believe to be original, and which cannot fail, if its execution be judicious and faithful, to secure to the work extensive popularity and usefulness. So far as we have examined the articles in the work, with a few exceptions we think favorably of the skill, judgment and fidelity with which it has been executed. The names of several of the original contributors are sufficient to warrant the highest expectations concerning the articles which they have prepared.'

FESSENDEN & CO.'S

POLYGLOTT BIBLE

FOR FAMILIES.

THE ENGLISH VERSION OF THE POLYGLOTT BIBLE, in one royal octavo volume of 1300 pages on large type, embellished with Maps and Plates on steel, forming an elegant superior to any one ever published in this country, and suited to all denominations.

THE WORK CONTAINS.

I. The Old and New Testaments, according to the common and authorized version.

II. Upwards of 60,000 Marginal References and Readings, arranged in a most convenient manner in a middle column, between the two of text.

III. The Concordance of the Rev. John Brown.

IV. An Introduction to the Holy Scriptures, giving a brief history of the Bible, and a compendious view of the evidences that the Holy Scriptures and every part of them were given by inspiration of God.

V. A concise Introduction to each book of the Old and New Testaments, showing when, and by whom, and under what circumstances they were written, their genuineness, authenticity, &c.

VI. An Essay on the right interpretation of the writings in which the revelations of God are contained, by JAMES MACKNIGHT, D. D.

VII. Three Sermons on the Evidences of Christianity, by Rev. PHILIP DODDRIDGE, D. D.

VIII. A valuable Geographical and Historical INDEX, arranged in a new and peculiar manner, exhibiting at one view all that is interesting on those subjects in the Holy Scriptures, with references to the maps, and forming a complete Bible Gazetteer.

IX. A new and complete General Index, and a concise Dictionary of the Bible, in which the various persons places, and subjects mentioned in it are accurately referred to, and every difficult word briefly explained.

X. A number of useful and interesting TABLES.

XI. A plate exhibiting side by side the genealogy of our Savior, as given by St. Matthew and St. Luke, and reconciling their seeming discrepancies.

XII. A handsome FAMILY RECORD, engraved on wood.

XIII. It is embellished and illustrated by fourteen beautiful ENGRAVINGS AND MAPS, done on steel, in the best manner.

XIV. There are also in the work a considerable number of WOOD CUTS, illustrative of scripture manners, customs, natural history, scenery, &c.; connected with which are brief explanations, extracted from various authors.

The following are some of the principal advantages of the English version of the Polyglott Bible, over other Editions of the Holy Scriptures, with references.

I. Its originality will preëminently be found to consist in a laborious and entirely new selection and arrangement of References, in which it has been endeavored faithfully to exhibit the Scripture as its own Expositor. The advantages to the sincere reader of the sacred pages, of having constantly before him Marginal References to similar and illustrative passages, are obvious, and fully appreciated by all. 'It were to be wished,' says bishop Horsley, 'that no Bibles were printed without References. Particular diligence should be used in comparing the parallel texts of the Old and New Testaments. . . . . It is incredible,' he adds, 'to any one who has not made the experiment, what a proficiency may be made in that knowledge which maketh wise unto salvation, by studying the Scriptures in this manner, WITHOUT ANY OTHER COMMENTARY, OR EXPOSITION, THAN WHAT THE DIFFERENT PARTS OF THE SACRED VOLUME MUTUALLY FURNISH TO EACH OTHER.' References have, however, heretofore generally been confined either to Bibles of large and unwieldy size, or to those so small as to be useless or inconvenient to people advanced in life. Here is an Edition with References, which, while it is not liable to the objection now almost universally felt, against the inconvenient size and weight of the quarto editions, yet offers in a convenient shape and size, by a judicious arrangement and plan, a type as easily read as that of our largest editions, in the form of an elegant and convenient Family Bible.

II. The References and Readings have been prepared with a strict attention to two things—1. That they should not be merely repetitious, but illustrative,—and, 2. That they should not be complex and crowded, and so numerous as to be tedious and forbidding, a fault with those of Scott and others, but that they should be as full as should be deemed useful and necessary, and a MORE APPROPRIATE AND ACCURATE selection, adaptation, and arrangement, than those in any other edition. So that, while no superfluous ones have been admitted, the most material purposes to be answered by references have been effectually secured.

III. These References have the advantage of being selected from many valuable editions and commentaries in different languages.

IV. All the Marginal Readings contained in the folio and quarto Bibles are introduced; the idioms of the original languages, and also the various senses of particular words or phrases, being instructive and worthy to be known.

V. The advantages of the present arrangement of the references in a middle column, are, that they are more condensed, and yet are plain and easy to be referred to, and are not liable, as those in other editions are, to be cut in binding or worn away by use, nor to be bound so into the back of the book as not to be easily read.

VI. The Concordance will be found highly convenient, enabling any one by looking for a word in a verse or chapter, to turn immediately to it.

VII. The value of the Introductions to the Bible, and the several books, the Indexes, Gazetteer, the new Tables, Maps, &c. will be readily seen, as they all tend to assist the sincere searcher of the Scriptures, in his inquiries. The Wood Cuts and Engravings are valuable, not merely as embellishing the work, but especially as illustrating scripture manners, customs, phrases, &c. and as attracting the attention of the young. An engraving as illustrative of a particular passage, conveys at once to the eye, and more readily and permanently fixes upon the mind, the meaning of that passage, than a page of comment or explanation.

On the whole, the several advantages of the present Edition commend it to the patronage of the community as the best of the publications of the Bible ever offered to them, for compactness and combination of useful matter. Its medium size, not too large for handling with convenience, with large type for the eyes of the aged, are judged to be no trifling recommendations. The Publishers, therefore, look for some considerable portion of public favor towards this enterprise; and they indulge the hope and expectation of obtaining for the Word of God an increased circulation, and, of course, an increased influence.

☞ CONTAINING NO COMMENTS ON THE MEANING OF THE SACRED TEXT, BUT YET COMBINING A VAST AMOUNT OF ASSISTANCE FOR ITS STUDY, EXECUTED IN A BEAUTIFUL STYLE, IT CANNOT BUT BE AN ACCEPTABLE EDITION FOR THE USE OF INDIVIDUALS, AND AN ORNAMENT FOR THE TABLE OF EVERY FAMILY.

☞ It has been highly recommended by eminent ministers of all denominations.

☞ 'The Polyglott Bible,' with the 'Encyclopædia of Religious Knowledge' and 'Bush's Illustrations of the Scriptures,' form together a very complete apparatus for studying the Bible for all who cannot afford or do not desire a Commentary.
